

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. DEATH OF THE SULTAN OF TURKEY.
OBSERVATIONS.

VISCOUNT STRATFORD DE RED-
LIFFE said, that seeing on the bench before him his noble Friend who represented the Foreign Department in that House (Lord Wodehouse), he wished to take the opportunity of asking a question with respect to the recent important event which had occurred at Constantinople.
The death of one Sultan and the accession of another were occurrences which could not fail to attract their Lordships' attention, and to interest them by their bearing on the policy which they had reason to expect from the new ruler. These events had occurred at a crisis of considerable moment, to which the attention of the country, in common with the other

Powers of Europe, might well be directed.
Whatever might be the circumstances to which they must look forward—whether satisfactory or not—whether progressive or reactionary—still very great interests, both of this country and of Europe, were involved in them; and he thought it right that the earliest opportunity should be taken, at least to draw the attention of Parliament to such important subjects. He ventured to do so, not at all in the spirit of any want of confidence in Her Majesty's Government, but for the purpose of calling the attention of the country and of Parliament to a subject which involved interests of vast importance. The history of Turkey during the last two reigns had presented features of great interest, not only to Turkey but to Europe. The reforms so necessary for the Empire were commenced by Sultan Mahmoud. That Sultan showed great qualities of courage and perseverance in adopting those reforms for the benefit of his country which anterior circumstances showed to be desirable.
He had the good fortune—if it might be so called—to put down that body of Janis-saries who interfered with the interests and good government of the country. He put them down with a hand red with blood, and with a sanguinary determination ; but, perhaps, as in other instances in ancient and modern times, it was an act of necessary severity. He also laid the foundation of great reforms in religion ; and, in general, his reign was marked by the recovery of that Imperial power so necessary for the administration of affairs in Turkey. But, at the same time, he was unfortunate enough to have to make great sacrifices of territory to a neighbouring Power ; he had the misfortune to lose a great portion of his navy, and in that branch of the service under his reign there was a great diminution of the power of the Ottoman Empire. He was compelled by circumstances to admit the establishment of the monarchy of Greece, and he was obliged also to leave Egypt in the possession of a rebellious subject. Carrying on their view to the next reign, it was but just to the late Sultan, Abdul Medjid, to say that, notwithstanding the faults which he was free to say marked his character, instead of losing territory, he recovered part of that which his father had lost ; that he carried out that great system of reforms which his father had begun ; and that, in general, he showed a protecting and benevolent spirit towards all the subjects of his Empire and particularly towards the Christians ; he placed the Protestants of the Empire on the footing of the old established religious communities in his dominions, and he proclaimed unlimited liberty of conscience in religious matters throughout the whole extent of his empire. Many other things he did in a similar spirit ; for instance, he abolished torture, and other salutary and humane measures were adopted under his reign—all certainly calculated to soften the impression which might be entertained by those who knew only the less brilliant parts of his character, which he must admit had certainly affected the state of affairs in Turkey. In looking to the character of the present, who, he presumed from unofficial reports, was the brother of the late Sultan, and according to the Oriental custom his heir, it was, of course, of great interest to know how far the policy of the country might be affected by the change. In an arbitrary system of Government the personal character of the Sovereign was of course of great importance. For himself he had no personal knowledge of the present Sultan, as it would have been a great breach of prudence on the part of a foreign representative, especially of the representative of this country, to have interfered in any way during the lifetime of the late Sultan with that system of reserve and retirement to which all the Princes of the Imperial family were subjected. If we were to listen, however, to public report we might perhaps be led to entertain some anxiety on the subject. The new Sultan had been represented as a man of decided and also of a rather violent character ; and he was supposed to be surrounded by persons who would willingly see a reactionary system adopted. At the same time it would be well, in entering on this new reign, if foreign Powers, more especially Her Majesty's Government, were to give him credit for good intentions, and to encourage him if he were disposed rather to carry out the system which had been adopted for some time in Turkey than to place himself at the head of a reactionary party, which would not only prove injurious to him and what remained of his empire, but would also put him at variance with those friendly Powers whose assistance in time of need would be of such importance to him. At the same time, no better moment could be chosen for giving, in a friendly tone and with that moderation which the circumstances demanded, advice which might assist in keeping him steady to those good purposes if he entertained them, or might lead him to a more salutary frame of mind if that were not the case. And it appeared to him that from no quarter could that advice proceed so well as from Her Majesty's Government, acting as it did with other Powers of Europe, who had pledged themselves to maintain, so long as was possible, the independence and integrity of the Turkish Empire, and being at the same time free from any of those suspicions which might attach to the policy of those Powers, who, being neighbours of Turkey, might be supposed to be actuated by interested motives—he said that under these circumstances advice proceeding from the British Government was more likely to recommend itself to the new Sultan's mind than advice proceeding from any other quarter. As he had already said, a change of Sovereigns in Turkey was an event which might very seriously affect the future state of the empire, and, consequently, its relations with this country and it was in this spirit that he had to put his Question to his noble Friend, which he was sure he would answer without difficulty. It was of great consequ that the new Sovereign of the Turkish Empire should be led to believe and to understand that this great country took a real and systematic interest in maintaining his power in so far as it was wielded for good purposes. Not only had we an interest in a general point of view in leading the Sultan's mind to a right course of policy, but we were under obligations to Turkey, which, if we were called on to carry them out, must have the effect of entailing great sacrifices upon us, and put us in a position of great anxiety and danger. Without the policy which it was so desirable to recommend to the Sultan, it was impossible, in his humble opinion, that we could escape from those dangers. It was only by taking up the subject in time, and by pressing upon the Sultan those reforms which had been recommended for so many years, which the Sovereign of Turkey himself had adopted, and which he had proclaimed and recorded in public documents, that we could stave off and avoid these dangers. In the present state of Europe and in the uncertainties which prevailed as to the feeling of other Powers which were interested in that part of the world, and which were likely to be called into activity if England did not at once take a decided line—if England did not take up a proper attitude and show herself prepared to carry out her engagements, and to stand by that empire, her responsibility would be great and she would have to repent of her negligence. He trusted he was not trespassing too much upon the House, but it must be remembered that he had himself been a personal witness of all that had taken place in that country for many years, and without pretending to any superior judgment his personal experience must necessarily give him a stronger impression on these subjects than would be entertained by those who had only viewed the matter at a distance. He did not pretend to enter into the general question of the policy of this country, as to how far in other respects it might be necessary to act with regard to Turkey; but he saw in the strongest point of view the dangers to which we were exposed by any degree of neglect in this country, and that it was the bounden duty of the Government to consider this question in all its bearings, and to do everything in their power, consistent with the interests of the country in other respects, to give effect to those improvements which had been so often discussed, and towards which many important steps had been taken. We had engaged to maintain the integrity and independence of the Turkish Empire, and it was not only the right but the bounden duty of our Government to call upon the Government of Turkey to carry into practical and early effect those reforms which had been adopted and proclaimed throughout the Sultan's dominions, and to the value of which he had heard the strongest testimony given by some of the late Sultan's Ministers. Any neglect on the part of Her Majesty's Government must necessarily carry with it a heavy responsibility, not only on their own consciences but towards the country at large. He wished to ask his noble Friend whether the Government had received any official intelligence or announcement of the accession of the Sultan Abdul Aziz to his brother's throne, and whether any indication had been given of the line of policy which might be expected to be followed under the new reign? There was another point which he wished to mention before sitting down. According to the invariable custom and policy of Constantinople the present Sultan had, during his brother's lifetime, been completely at his brother's mercy; and so the children of the late Sultan would, in like manner, be entirely at the disposal of the reigning Sovereign. He hoped that the present Sovereign, having experienced the kindness of his brother, would, in the same spirit, extend to his children that treatment which the interests of the country and humanity required at his hands.

LORD WODEHOUSE said, he was not surprised at the anxiety displayed by his noble Friend respecting the state of affairs at Constantinople, in consequence of the death of the late Sultan, and the accession of a new one. Such events were of great importance in every country, but especially must they be important in a country like Turkey, where the personal character of the Sovereign was of such consequence. He believed that the account given by the noble Lord from his personal knowledge of the amiable qualities of the late Sultan was perfectly accurate, but he could himself add nothing to that subject. With regard to the new Sultan, who, as his noble Friend observed, was the brother of the late Sultan, and was entitled by the law of Turkey to the succession, the Government had received an authoritative announcement of his accession to the throne, and had also received assurances that it was his intention to pursue the same foreign policy as had been pursued by his predecessor, and, as to the internal affairs of Turkey, that he would inaugurate useful and salutary reforms. At the same time the Turkish Ambassador told his noble Friend the Foreign Secretary, that an Imperial Hatti-Scheriff would shortly be issued, in which a full statement would be made respecting the policy of Sultan Aziz in regard to the internal affairs of Turkey. He would not attempt to draw the horoscope of the new Sultan, but hoped His Majesty would have a fortunate reign, entirely agreeing, however, with his noble Friend as to the extreme necessity of immediate and important reforms being made in the Turkish administration, and especially in relation to its finances. He was confident that if the new Sultan followed the advice which would be disinterestedly given him by his allies, and sought to develop the great resources of his empire, introducing regularity into his finances and selecting and supporting honest men under him, so that their measures might be fairly carried out, it was not yet too late for the Turkish Empire to enter into an era of prosperity.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE said, their Lordships would, perhaps, think it extraordinary that he should venture to join in a discussion on foreign policy, but having in early life passed a great many years in Turkey, and watched the course of British policy towards that empire, he had imbibed a strong opinion on this subject. To his mind no policy was more calculated to weaken the power of any nation than the policy of interference which had been pursued by Great Britain towards Turkey, and which, as he gathered from the speech of the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, it was intended to continue. If they wished to make Turkey strong, they must govern her according to Turkish law. It was idle for a Christian nation to suppose that its advice could ever tally with the tenets of the Koran. The Turkish was a theocratic Government; its laws were supposed to be of Divine origin; and to force the advice of a Christian Government upon the Sultan was to weaken his hands instead of strengthening them—to make him looked upon as a “Giaour” by his own people—as one who was neither Christian nor Turk, but infidel. Such a policy, if continued, would not add to the strength of the Turkish Empire, but would rather bring it to destruction. There was now an opportunity under a new Sultan of inaugurating a new policy. Let the Sultan govern by Turkish law, and according to the wishes and the feelings of the Turkish people; or on the other hand to overturn his Government at once and Christianize his empire. There must not be an attempt to thrust upon Turkey laws which might suit English tastes and English policy, but were quite inconsistent with the customs, habits, and religion of a Mahomedan people. No doubt our laws were infinitely better than theirs, but before those laws could be usefully transplanted into Turkey, and could be of any use for the support of the empire, the Turks must be made Christians.

VISCOUNT STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE said, he should take the earliest opportunity of bringing this subject before the House by a Motion for papers. Without questioning the sincerity of the opinions of his noble Friend (the Earl of Hardwicke) he must say that the doctrines he had just heard from his noble Friend with regard to Turkey were at variance with his own experience there, and with the policy which on both sides of the House had for the last twenty years been adopted towards that country—doctrines, he believed, as fraught with mischief as could well be imagined.

SAVOY AND SWITZERLAND.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON rose pursuant to notice, to call attention to the prolonged occupation of Northern Savoy by France; and to inquire if any and what arrangements have been made, in accordance with Her Majesty's most gracious Speech from the Throne of August last, with a view to give continued force to the engagements of the Treaty of Vienna, in connection with the assumed obligations of the Second Article of the Treaty of Turin, and to secure an effective guarantee for the maintenance of the inviolability and independence of Switzerland? The noble Earl said, there was a twofold question in connection with this subject—first, as to the general annexation of Nice and Savoy; and, secondly, a special and more limited question, with which alone he should trouble the House, respecting the annexation of that northern part of Savoy which had been declared neutral by the Treaties of Vienna, for the purpose of giving Switzerland a good defensive military position. He would not attempt to trace out the various course of diplomacy by which the annexation of Nice and Savoy had been effected; he would not even go into the

neral question respecting that annexation, because, though undoubtedly it was accomplished in violation of treaties, the spirit rather than the letter of those treaties had been broken. But the occupation of Northern Savoy vitally affected the interests of Switzerland. It was not merely that it had been a part of the traditional policy of Europe to commit the passes of the Alps, the keys of Northern Italy, to the hands of a Power strong enough to hold them, but not strong enough to abuse them, but that the possession by Switzerland in time of war of these Northern districts of Savoy had been repeatedly declared by the highest political and military authorities to be both a sufficient and a necessary barrier against foreign aggression. This if it did not actually give them Switzerland a material guarantee for its freedom and independence against any great systematic attack of a large military empire, yet with her spirited population was such that she might for awhile hold her enemies at bay until she could receive the succour which Europe was pledged to afford to her. On the other hand, if these districts were taken away, Switzerland lost her military frontier, and from that moment was open to the first invasion, and perfectly defenceless. It was with a view to these circumstances, and to prevent such a calamity, that in the Treaty of Vienna, the integrity of Switzerland had been declared to be one of the highest objects of policy to the Sovereigns assembled there, and that the contracting Powers agreed that this district should be neutralized, and remain for the time being in the hands of the King of Sardinia. It was in violation of this treaty that the cession had been made by Sardinia to France, and the cession was admitted by France herself to be illegal. The noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, had over and over again declared that it was the object of Her Majesty's Government to maintain this policy as to the independence of Switzerland. It was perfectly true that there had been a great deal of controversy as to the neutralization of this district. France contended that this neutralization was imposed on Switzerland as a burden and an obligation. Sardinia had endeavoured to show that the neutralization had been effected in her interests; whilst Switzerland had uniformly contended, and proved by the undoubted history of the past, that this military frontier was a protection and a privilege; and the Secretary for Foreign Affairs (Lord John Russell) had always endorsed that view. Till last year this district was attached to Sardinia, as neutral territory, and thus gave Switzerland a guarantee for her independence. At the close of last Session the words of the Royal Speech were—

“ Her Majesty trusts that, in any Negotiations which may take place, full and adequate Arrangements will be made for securing, in Accordance with the Spirit and Letter of the Treaty of Vienna of 1815, the Neutrality and Independence of the Swiss Confederation.”

This was the language of the Speech from the Throne on the 28th of August last, proving that the Government felt the importance of the subject of guaranteeing the integrity of Switzerland, and that some arrangements were absolutely necessary for replacing the broken law of Europe. The language of the Government in its despatches was even stronger. Lord John Russell, in writing to Lord Cowley, said the Treaty of Turin could not be considered as part of the public law of Europe, and as such it had not received any formal acknowledgment. By the speech, therefore, of Her Majesty, and by the language of the Government he was justified in saying that the occupation of Northern Savoy where it was not competent for Sardinia to cede or for France to accept that territory unacknowledged and protested against by England remained to this hour a standing breach of the constitutional and public law of Europe. Now, was there no mode of extrication from this difficulty? Italy having had her share in the recent bargain was practically precluded from having any voice in the matter. France claimed the district as her territory. Of late years—he might say it without offence to the French Government—it had, to the exclusion of other objects—almost to the exclusion of literature and science—been imbued more and more with military feeling. Military honours and distinctions were the great objects of public life, and the Emperor, as embodying this feeling, did an act not wholly unpopular, when he drew a prize from this lottery. Still, the position of France was not satisfactory; France herself admitted that the position required an alteration, that she ought to exchange the illegal occupation for one more in unison with public treaties and public law. Though we could not altogether forgive what had passed, yet it might be condoned, provided that the past was, as far as possible, remedied and that the recent annexation was not made a precedent. They required that in spirit, if not in the letter, the public treaties guaranteeing the neutrality of this territory should be maintained. The Treaty of Turin, under which Sardinia ceded it, had broken that settlement. But in that treaty there was one article, by which the Emperor, in accepting the treaty, accepted the obligations imposed in respect of the territory by former treaties, and it provided that France should come to an understanding both with the Swiss Confederation and the other Powers of Europe, for giving fresh securities for the independence and integrity of Switzerland. It ought not to be forgotten that the French Government had not only offered to neutralize the province, but in the earlier stages of the question, had actually offered to abandon to Switzerland Chablais and Faucigny. That was not an isolated promise. The same assurance was given by the French Consul at Geneva, and subsequently M. Thouvenel expressed to Lord Cowley the opinion of the French Government that it was desirable that Chablais and Faucigny should be permanently united to Switzerland. These promises, so clearly and explicitly made, were subsequently modified and withdrawn; but still the French Government continued to express sympathy with Switzerland, and a friendly interest in her affairs. In April M. Thouvenel proposed to this country a plan by which the neutrality of Switzerland should be secured; and, about a month afterwards, he laid down three bases by which the two countries of England and France might unite in securing that independence. He quoted these words in order to show that, though in the first instance the French Government had withdrawn its promises, yet, if any reliance was to be placed in words, there was every disposition to come to an agreement with this country in some equitable arrangement by which the independence of Switzerland might be secured. In the next place, it was highly desirable that the present illegal occupation should as soon as possible be converted into one that was more in unison with the public law of Europe. In the third place, their Lordships must bear in mind that Switzerland desired a military frontier, and not a mere diplomatic guarantee. It was obvious that there was not a single point of comparison between the possession of Northern Savoy by France, and its possession by Sardinia—by the greatest military empire in the world, or a kingdom which only last year was but a third-class Power in Europe. What constituted a sufficiently valid guarantee under the trusteeship of Sardinia was no guarantee at all when it passed under the dominion of France. He had now gone through most of those points which he desired to bring before their Lordships—very imperfectly and briefly he knew; but he trusted he had indicated enough to draw their Lordships' attention to the matter. He should be sorry if the House were to feel that he had brought forward this question merely as a matter of debate, or on light and theoretical grounds—he had done so from a strong conviction of the effect of these events upon the peace of Europe. Every one at all cognizant of the affairs of Switzerland were of opinion that great dangers were now menacing that country. He need hardly remind their Lordships that the natural consequence of a wrongful act was to repeat itself in fresh wrongs; that the wrong-doer was unable to stop in his career, and was impelled forward, step by step, by the agency of causes which, though he was the first to set in motion, he was utterly unable to check. The noble Lord the Foreign Secretary last year expressed most forcibly and truly the dangers which would menace Switzerland if Northern Savoy were annexed to France. That annexation had taken place; and he was bound to say that every one of the dangers forcibly and truly set forth in the noble Lord's despatches had been fully realized. At this moment France had pierced the frontier of Switzerland and overlapped her territory. She was politically and strategically the mistress of the mountains. Chambery was for all practical purposes brought close to the gates of Lyons, and French troops were within a few hours' march of the Lake of Geneva. French agents—he said not from whence they came or by whom they were sent—were trafficking in Switzerland, and Swiss soldiers were negotiating at Paris. In every part of Switzerland there was great fear and apprehension, and a consciousness of the overwhelming force and irresistible influence of France unless they were upheld by the public opinion of other countries. The condition of affairs was now materially changed. Last year there was a French population of 20,000 resident in Geneva, but that was balanced by a population of 20,000 Savoyards. But now those Savoyards no longer owed allegiance to the King of Sardinia, they were the subjects of the Emperor of France; so that, practically, there was now a population of 40,000 Frenchmen in Geneva. Let it not be thought that this was a chimerical objection; for though the Savoyards had been most reluctantly annexed to France, yet now, when the King of Sardinia had cast away the loyalty of 800 years, by a natural revulsion of feeling which their Lordships could understand, however they might regret it, the Savoyards were determined that, as far as lay in their power, if Savoy could not be attached to Geneva, Geneva should be attached to Savoy. But it was not this or any other particular danger that was on the horizon. The whole atmosphere of Switzerland was charged with dangerous influences. What conclusions were they to draw from the recent visit of Prince Napoleon to Geneva?—a visit associated in the public mind with some impending change or territorial aggression. What inferences were they to draw from the rumours that were in circulation throughout Switzerland respecting annexations and redistributions of territory—rumours similar to those that heralded the annexation of Savoy—passing from local journals into the higher circles—then denied, then affirmed, then denied again, and latterly by the Ministers of both Governments; until at last it was consummated? What inferences were they to draw from the fact that the wisest, most moderate, and liberal statesmen of Switzerland were filled with apprehension at the present state of things? In the occupation of Northern Savoy by France there was to be seen overwhelming strength on the one hand and utter weakness on the other. The railways converging on Switzerland might, in the event of hostilities, bring 20,000 troops into that country within twenty-four hours. The fortresses of Switzerland and her military stores were practically unguarded, because, although they recognized the danger, they feared to take those measures of defence which might be construed into a cause of offence. Surely in such a condition Switzerland deserved the sympathy of the Parliament of this free country. She had borne her trials with unexampled constancy; she had fully appreciated her position; she was proof against the most seductive offers; she was proof against taunts that could not be mistaken and threats that were not disguised. She had impartially held on her way, maintaining her rights and vindicating the duties which the treaties of the last fifty years had imposed on her. Europe had laid on her the obligation of neutrality, that there might be one spot in central Europe where the oppressed might find refuge, and whose very neutrality in the heat of a general war might be an argument for, and a pledge of future peace. My Lords, continued the noble Earl, no one ever enjoyed more largely the benefits of Switzerland's neutrality than the present Emperor of the French. I believe that that great Sovereign, since his accession to prosperity and power, has never shown himself oblivious of any acts of personal kindness and friendship which he experienced in the days of his adversity and exile. I hope, therefore, that the generous return which the Emperor has known how to make to individuals will not be denied by him to the country which once afforded him its protection. And when I remember the firmness with which Switzerland in his cause maintained, even at the risk of war, the inviolability of her asylum for political refugees, I cannot bring myself to think until I am, indeed, obliged to do so, that all sense of gratitude is banished from the Imperial Court of France. The noble Lord concluded by putting the question.

LORD WODEHOUSE: My Lords, I do not at all complain of my noble Friend for having brought this subject under discussion; but having listened very attentively to his speech, I must say, I am altogether unable to discover to what practical conclusion he would lead your Lordships. My noble Friend has accurately stated the effect of the despatches written by Lord John Russell, and laid on your Lordships' table during last year, and which informed your Lordships of the exact position in which this matter then stood. In point of fact, that position, as far as I am aware, has in no way changed since those despatches were written. In the month of July last my noble Friend Lord John Russell accepted the proposal of the French Government for a Conference to take into consideration how the 92nd Article of the Treaty of Vienna should be reconciled with the 2nd Article of the Treaty of Turin. The despatch in which he accepted that proposal was laid upon the table. Subsequently, however, objections were made by the Governments of Russia, Prussia, and Austria to an immediate meeting of such a Conference, and in consequence of those objections the Conference was postponed.

My noble Friend Lord John Russell, in stating that Her Majesty's Government acquiesced in that postponement, added that he did so on the understanding that the present occupation of Savoy by France should not be regarded as forming a portion of the public law of Europe. In that position the matter has remained ever since; and my noble Friend opposite, in pointing out, as he has done, in very forcible language, the inconvenience of that occupation, which has not been sanctioned by the public law of Europe, has altogether failed to suggest any means by which Her Majesty's Government could bring about the sanction of it in a manner that would be consonant with their opinions of how the Treaty of Vienna should be upheld. The treaty out of which has arisen the whole of the present controversy was signed, not by England only, but by all the other great Powers of Europe; and, if those other Powers do not think it necessary that negotiations should take place in order that the recent Treaty of Turin should be reconciled with the Treaty of Vienna, it is impossible for Her Majesty's Government, by any act of its own, to bring about any such reconciliation. My noble Friend opposite went at some length into the various questions which were raised in the course of the many discussions that occurred last year, and in much that he said I entirely agree. But it is neither requisite nor convenient that I should now enter again into those various questions and restate our objections to the course pursued by the French Government, which objections Her Majesty's Government not only did not conceal, but which they stated at the proper time in the clearest and plainest manner, and which were set forth in the despatches laid upon your Lordship's table, and also formed the subject of consideration throughout Europe. Indeed, I conceive that, as far as protesting and stating objections went, Her Majesty's Government did all that could have been demanded of them by the strongest opponents of the annexation of Savoy. More than that, I believe nobody ever proposed anything should be done in the matter by this country. That being so, it seems to me that it would neither be consistent with the dignity of England, nor wise and politic, to continue or revive a discussion that can have no practical end, and which we have no power to bring to any useful conclusion. Such a course must tend to prejudice those relations which on every ground we desire should retain their friendly character, and I must say those discussions were entirely exhausted during the last year. I deplore, as much as my noble Friend opposite deplores, that Switzerland should remain in a position which may, undoubtedly, be called an uncomfortable one with respect to this question. It is not only extremely inconvenient that there should be upon her frontier a territory the exact position of which is not defined by the public law of Europe—I mean not recognized by all the great European Powers; but it is, likewise, well known that it is the opinion of Her Majesty's Government that that position is not one that should be recognized. If Switzerland should be able to find any means by which these differences might be reconciled—if she could discover any mode of inducing the French Government to make such concessions to her as she thinks requisite for her security, and as would allay the fears she entertains—none would rejoice more than I should, and I am sure that Her Majesty's Government would do everything in their power to facilitate any such conclusion. My Lords, I feel so unwilling to reiterate objections which are perfectly familiar to all your Lordships, or to enter again into a controversy which has been so fully brought forward in the published despatches, that, notwithstanding that my noble Friend may think I give but a slight answer to his remarks, I must ask the House not to pursue this subject further. I will merely repeat that the matter remains in the same position in which it stood during the last summer; that no negotiations have taken place upon it, because the other great Powers have not thought it desirable to enter into such negotiations; that Her Majesty's Government do not feel themselves able to force those negotiations upon the other great European Powers: and that it would not therefore be consistent with the dignity of this country, or wise and politic, to continue discussions that would lead to no practical result.

ROYAL DUBLIN SOCIETY — GLASNEVIN BOTANICAL GARDEN.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

THE EARL OF CLANCARTY rose to move for—

“Copy of any Correspondence between the Science and Art Department of the Committee of Council on Education and the Royal Dublin Society, relative to the Opening of the Glasnevin Botanical Garden to the Public on Sundays ber with Copies of any Communications from the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland to the Committee of Council on Education or to the Royal Dublin Society upon the same Subject."

The noble Lord, in support of the Motion, addressed the House as follows:—My Lords, the correspondence for which I am about to move I think it right should be laid upon the table of the House, inasmuch as it relates to the conduct and character of the most ancient public institution in the kingdom for the promotion of practical science, I mean the Royal Dublin Society, which for the last century received annual grants from Parliament, but is now threatened with deprivation of part of the public grant as a penalty for the offence, if offence it can be called, of declining to open the Botanic Gardens on Sundays, as a place for public recreation. To this it is that the correspondence relates, and both the manner in which the society has been called upon by the Science and Art Department of the Committee of Council on Education to act in direct opposition to the known feelings of the great majority of its members, as well as the nature of the requirement itself, render it very important that Parliament should be fully informed of the whole transaction. I have noticed the Royal Dublin Society as the most ancient scientific institution in the kingdom. Founded in 1731, it obtained, in 1749, a Royal charter of incorporation, and, carrying on a work of manifest usefulness to the country, it received its first grant in aid from the Irish Parliament in 1761, just a century ago. The sum then given was £2,000, but from that time, acting under the immediate view of Parliament, it received grants annually increasing in amount till in 1800, the year of the Legislative Union of the two countries, it received as much as £15,500. Since that period it has been less liberally assisted. Such of its patrons as continued to be Members of the Legislature could not exercise in its behalf the same influence in the Imperial as in the local Parliament; and the institution itself lost much of its interest with those of its members whom public duty removed to a distance from it, and who could, therefore, no longer, as when Parliament met in Dublin, take part in its proceedings. Among the citizens of Dublin, however, its efficiency was maintained; and, though the Government ceased to aid it as liberally as before the Union, there can be no doubt that the grants that have been annually made, varying in amount, have been given with the object of upholding and encouraging an association of unquestionable public usefulness. It has been the means of developing much native talent in art and manufacture. Its schools, its public lectures in the city and in the provinces, its laboratories, museums, library, and botanic garden, afford aids to education in the cultivation of different branches of science, which are open, almost all, gratuitously to all classes. Its exhibitions of agricultural produce are of acknowledged value, especially its spring shows of pure bred stock, which are the largest and most important in the United Kingdom; and the Lord Lieutenant, as president of the society, has very lately inaugurated the opening of a most interesting exhibition of art and manufacture, affording to the public recreation and improvement, and a valuable stimulus to manufacturing industry. Amongst its members the society includes persons of every party, of every creed, and of every class who take an interest in, and are willing to make an annual contribution of a certain amount towards carrying out, the scientific objects of the association. For such objects, and none other, was the society formed. It does not in any degree partake of the nature of a club. In its reading rooms are found no books or periodicals except such as are connected with science or art; in fact, membership, while involving expense, confers little else than the privilege of co-operating for the public good in the practical development of science. Gentlemen of character and independence so associated, and who for a long series of years have faithfully and efficiently applied themselves, without fee or reward, to the discharge of a public trust, were entitled to be addressed, if not with deference, certainly not in that arrogant and offensive tone of dictation which pervades the letters of the officials of the Committee of Council, by whom they were informed that the Government required that they should take a step with reference to the property they have in charge to which the great majority of them are known to have a religious objection, and to which others, as trustees for the due preservation of the society's property, cannot consent. The requirement on the part of the Government is that because the Commissioners of Woods and Forests have opened Kew and Hampton Court Gardens to the public on Sundays, therefore, the Royal Dublin Society, in return for the grants it has received from Parliament, should throw its botanic garden open for Sunday recreation. The correspondence sets forth the grounds, general and special, upon which the society has declined complying with this requirement, which is further objected to as being in violation of a distinct pledge given to the society in 1854, that, "beyond aiding the society in giving the fullest publicity to its labours, their Lordships would not interfere in its general management." I have been given to understand that it is the opinion of the Government that the observance of the Sabbath should be the same in Ireland as in England and Scotland; that in Scotland opinion is very strong and unanimous in its favour; that in England it is much divided; but that in Ireland, as a Roman Catholic country, it must be taken to be altogether the other way. Such a view of the case, my Lords, is most mistaken, and I totally deny that in Ireland there is any greater disregard of the obligations of the Sabbath than in England. The very small minority of the Royal Dublin Society which, upon a recent division, took the anti-Sabbatarian view, may be taken as an index of the state of public opinion among the educated classes of the city of Dublin upon the question of Sabbath observance; for the society includes among its members persons of every religious denomination. But, if further proof be required of the state of public opinion upon the subject in Dublin, it may be gathered from the result of a public meeting lately held in support of the society's views, from which an address, signed by upwards of 6,000 persons, was immediately presented to the Lord Lieutenant, and from which also, I understand, a petition signed by about 8,000 citizens of Dublin will this day be presented to the other House of Parliament. The Government, I hope, will pause before it sets itself further in opposition to public opinion so expressed, or to religious feelings and convictions regarding the Lord's Day, which, though they may deem them exaggerated, are yet entitled to respect, and certainly better calculated to promote the spread of enlightened Christianity than that disregard of the Sabbath which their present views are, I fear, but too likely to produce. But, passing from the question of Sabbath observance, the argument in favour of opening the Society's Botanic Gardens for Sunday recreation, drawn from the supposed analogy of Hampton Court and Kew Gardens, does not hold, for the circumstances of the two cases are, in fact, widely different. Kew and Hampton Court are large parks which, though they are partly formed into gardens containing many valuable plants interesting to the botanist, are chiefly laid out, and most tastefully so, for public walks, and their situations are very suitable for the purpose. The Botanic Garden of Glasnevin, on the contrary, is comparatively small, and, though designed with much taste and picturesque effect, is primarily laid out for scientific and educational purposes, and so circumstanced in respect of its situation that it would be impossible to secure the valuable plants it contains without the most stringent regulations, and the employment of a large staff of constables to enforce them. Too many facilities for intoxication exist in the vicinity of the great cemetery that adjoins the garden; and the large number of funerals that, I am informed, take place there on Sundays, commonly followed by crowds making holiday of the occasion, would cause the garden to be at times invaded in a disorderly manner, alike detrimental to the property and unprofitable to the people themselves. Even in St. James's Park, where the grassplots and beds are most carefully fenced with strong iron paling, and numerous constables are employed to preserve order—where, moreover, the same incentives to disorder do not exist as in the vicinity of Glasnevin—I find put up at each of the principal entries, by way of warning to the public, a statement of the number of offences of which persons frequenting the park had been convicted within one fortnight, and of the punishments that had been inflicted. There was one person fined for throwing stones at a constable, two others for separate offences of drunkenness and assaulting constables, two more for separate offences of damaging trees, one for disorderly conduct, and one for stealing the eggs of a valuable aquatic bird. The fines varied from 2s. 6d. to £1, with the alternative in each case of imprisonment. How many other like offences may have been committed within the same fortnight by visitors to the park I know not, but certain I am that the Royal Dublin Society does not possess the means, pecuniary or otherwise, that the Commissioners of Woods and Forests can command for procuring order in the public parks. To provide healthful recreation for the working class is, no doubt, a praiseworthy object, and one to which public money may very legitimately be applied, but the Royal Dublin Society does not possess the means of making such provision. Its members are, nevertheless, I believe, animated with sentiments quite as favourable to the interests of the working classes as are those who are styled my Lords of the Committee of Council for Education, and who never until this year raised the question of opening any department of the society to the public on Sundays. The society is, no doubt, desirous that its servants should, as far as possible, enjoy the Sabbath as a day of rest, but on every other day in the week it is their desire and endeavour to make the institution as accessible and as improving to those in humble life as to the middle and upper orders. I believe nobody could better testify to this than the society's president, the Lord Lieutenant, and much as I was surprised at the very unlooked-for requirement of the Committee of Council regarding the opening of the Glasnevin Garden on Sundays. I was much more so at finding it represented that it was made at the suggestion of the Lord Lieutenant, for that noble individual, holding the office of President of the society, and in habits of frequent intercourse with its members, as well as with the society itself, never once intimated to them the views attributed to him; yet not only does the correspondence open with the intimation that his Excellency had brought the subject before the Committee of Council, but in their second letter the committee notice expressly a recommendation he had made upon the subject, against which it is most inaccurately stated that the Royal Dublin Society had more than once urged objections, basing its opposition upon the ground of its being a private society. The charge is untrue in every particular. In the first place, as the Lord Lieutenant never made any recommendation to the society upon the subject, his recommendation never had to be combated; and, secondly, the society never has claimed to be a private society, but has, on the contrary, always considered itself as a public body—a trustee for carrying out the public objects for which it was incorporated by Royal charter. And, with reference to the feeling of the society towards the Lord Lieutenant, I must add, that had any recommendation to that body come from Lord Carlisle, whether as the Queen's Viceroy or the society's president, it would have received the most respectful and careful consideration. In addition to the correspondence between the Committee of Council and the society, I propose to move for copies of any communications the Lord Lieutenant may have made either to the Committee of Council or to the Royal Dublin Society upon the question at issue between them, as it is important to know upon what grounds rest what is asserted regarding the part taken by the Lord Lieutenant. My Lords, it is with much pain that I make the remarks I have felt it my duty to make regarding the correspondence I am to move for. The Government has not, I conceive, acted in a proper spirit by a society that has done the services to the country that have been rendered by the Royal Dublin Society. The attempt to coerce a society of educated and independent gentlemen associated in the discharge of a public trust to act in opposition to their convictions was not a becoming exercise of the power of the Government. The Government, no doubt, does entertain a very strong opinion, though very suddenly taken up, that the society is not justified in adhering to its practice—now of 100 years' standing, and never before questioned—of allowing every week a Sabbath of rest to its officers and servants, and they, therefore, think they should be deprived of part of the annual grant given by Parliament; but if so, the more manly, straightforward, and constitutional course would have been to have reduced the estimate upon their own responsibility, instead of submitting a vote to the consideration of Parliament that they do not intend to support, and the discussion of which will have the effect of raising an anti-Sabbatarian agitation within the walls of Parliament at the expense of a society which has ever studiously avoided mixing itself up with religious controversy. My Lords, I will now conclude by moving that there be laid upon the table of the House copies of any correspondence that has taken place between the Science and Art Department of the Committee of Council on Education and the Royal Dublin Society about opening the Botanic Gardens at Glasnevin to the public on Sunday, together with copies of any communications from the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland to the said Committee, or to the Royal Dublin Society, upon the same subject.

the Royal Dublin Society he felt it his duty to say a few words on this important question. Although he regretted that the Government should feel disposed to withdraw any portion of the grant to that Society, he could not entirely agree in the views stated by the noble Earl opposite. He had himself, at the meetings of the society, frequently advocated the admission of the public to the Glasnevin Gardens on Sunday after Divine service, because he believed there was a large class of artisans who had no other day at their disposal. This society possessed an advantage which all institutions in Ireland did not enjoy, as it was perfectly free from any religious or political bias, and he thought it would be most injudicious to diminish the power of the society to keep up a good botanic garden. The Government were hardly justified in the strong measures which were threatened, and he trusted the Lord President of the Council would give some reassuring statements on the subject.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he should regret any want of courtesy in communications with so important a society as the Royal Society of Dublin; but having again looked over the correspondence, which he had no objection to lay on the table, he could not find in it any discourteous expressions. The question of the opening the garden on Sundays having been brought under the attention of the Government by the Lord Lieutenant, they expressed an opinion that as there was a large annual grant of public money the Irish public ought to derive exactly the same advantage as the English public derived, under the sanction of successive Governments, and under the sanction of Parliament, at Kew and Hampton Court. The objection to the opening of the gardens on religious grounds was taken away by the fact that the Society had been in the habit of admitting the Fellows on Sundays to these very gardens, and the whole of the public on payment to another garden in Dublin under their administration.

THE EARL OF CLANCARTY said, the Royal Society had no control over the garden to which the noble Earl alluded.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he presumed the noble Earl did not deny that the Fellows of the Society were admitted to the Botanic Gardens on Sundays? With regard to the police question, the fact of a memorial in favour of opening the gardens being signed by all the police magistrates in Dublin was a greater authority than any argument which he could use. The same objections which were made now were urged against throwing open Kew and Hampton Court, but the result had shown that the majority of the visitors on Sundays were artisans of this Metropolis and that their behaviour was orderly and unexceptionable. The noble Earl could not wish to make an invidious distinction between the artisans of Dublin and the artisans of London; and he believed that, if they placed confidence in the Irish working people, their confidence would not be misplaced. Since he had been in the House he had been informed by an Irish Peer that when he proposed to throw open his grounds to the public he was warned of the danger of disorder and devastation, but nothing of the sort had happened, and nothing could be more orderly than the conduct of the population so admitted. A deputation representing fifty-nine Irish constituencies of all creeds and all politics had pressed on the Government in the strongest manner the desirability of opening these gardens on Sunday. They had further requested the Government to withdraw the grant in order to compel the opening of the gardens. The Government had declined to take that course, but they had determined to take the very constitutional course of deferring any proceedings until the subject had been discussed in Parliament, as it would be when the Vote for the society was under the consideration of the other House. A petition, signed by 16,000 persons, including the Corporation of Dublin and the police magistrates to whom he had referred, had been presented in favour of opening the gardens, and there was good evidence that a large majority of the people of Dublin concurred in that view. The Lord Lieutenant entirely agreed in the opinion of the Members of the Government on this side of the water, that the gardens should be opened, subject of course to the usual regulations. The Lord Lieutenant differed only in point of detail, being of opinion that a small money admission should be required; but in that view the Government did not concur. Under all the circumstances he thought the decision of the Government was most in accordance with the general opinion of the public.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, that if he had been present at the meeting referred to he should certainly have voted in favour of the gardens being opened on Sundays after Divine service under certain regulations. If these gardens had been supported entirely by the private contributions of the members of the Royal Dublin Society, of course it would have been competent for them to take their own course in the matter ; but the fact was that the Royal Dublin Society was merely the medium for expending the public grant given to these gardens. No doubt there was a strong feeling in Dublin against the opening of the gardens ; but, on the other hand, there was a petition to be presented to the House of Commons from 2,240 electors, and 16,000 artisans of Dublin in favour of their being opened. If Parliament should decide in favour of the opening of these gardens on Sunday, either the Royal Dublin Society must give way, or else notice ought to be given to them by the Government that the administration of the grant would be transferred to other hands.

THE BISHOP OF CARLISLE protested against the sanction of the Government being given to the efforts of persons who were endeavouring to break down the sanctity of the Sabbath. The comfort and consciences of those public servants who were condemned to perpetual labour by the opening of these places ought to be considered. The opening of Kew Gardens led to the running of no less than 93 trains on the Lord's Day, and, of course, to the employment of a very large number of guards, drivers, porters, and other officials. Having mixed much with working-men he knew that they looked to the Legislature to protect them against the consequences which would flow from the sanctity of the Sabbath being broken down.

LORD MONTEAGLE said, that he would be as much opposed to the Motion as the right rev. Prelate if he thought that it tended in the remotest degree to break down the sanctity of the Sabbath. The contrary would be found to be the case. It would be a great boon to the poor house-keepers, artisans, and inhabitants of the Liberties of Dublin, that upon this day of happy rest and enjoyment they should have the opportunity of communing with the works of Nature. Such an opportunity tended to improve the hearts and the feelings of those poor people far more than if they were pent up in their close abodes and banished from all innocent enjoyment, because there were some persons who chose to put upon the Lord's Day restrictions which he did not think were to be found in its origin and the divine ordinance on which the Christian Sabbath rested. There was no reason to anticipate that any mischief would be done to the Botanic Garden if it were opened to the people on Sundays. What was our experience at Hampton Court or at Kew ? What was the conduct of the people in St. James' Park, which was open during the whole Sunday ? He saw in that beautiful garden, on Sundays crowds, including some of the most wretched classes from Westminster, who conducted themselves in the most orderly manner ; often they were assembled in family groups, and he attached much importance to the union of husband, wife, and children, who were probably separated during the week, meeting in happy communion in that beautiful garden on the Sunday. Depend upon it these persons were not the worse Christians for being thus allowed the contemplation of the beautiful works of God. In conclusion, he thanked the noble Earl (the Earl of Donoughmore) for the manly, sensible, and, he would unhesitatingly, add the religious view which he had taken of this question, and hoped that the managers of these gardens would follow his noble Friend's advice, and take an opportunity of reconsidering their decision, if they did not, he hoped the House of Commons would be against them as the declared sense of the House of Lords had now shown itself to be.

THE EARL OF EGLINTON concurred with almost every noble Earl that had spoken, in thinking that it was expedient to open the Glasnevin Garden on Sundays. The Zoological Gardens in Dublin had been open for some years to the public on that day, and hardly an instance of misconduct had occurred in them ; while he believed that their use on Sunday had greatly conduced to the benefit of the people. The interests of religion were best subserved by the promotion of innocent and healthy recreation among the lower classes of the population, instead of leaving them to indulge in the gross vices which prevailed in all great cities. He, however, thought that, as the Royal Society were pledged conscientiously and by opinion to a particular course, the Government should not press them this year to alter their determination, but give them until next year for consideration.

THE BISHOP OF DOWN AND CONNOR said, he would in every possible way guard against the desecration of the Sabbath ; but care should be taken, while upholding its sanctity, to remember the words of Him who said that "the Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath."

What could be more becoming than to give to the Christian people of a Christian country the innocent recreation on a Sunday which was denied them on every other day in the week? The upper ranks of society were able to take recreation on all days; but the working classes in every large town were, for the most part, immured in close rooms, breathing a polluted atmosphere, with no possible means of enjoyment; and, that being so, the upper classes, he thought, could hardly reconcile it to themselves on religious grounds to exclude the poor from enjoying the fresh air and the recreation which such gardens as these naturally afforded. He hoped the executive of the Royal Dublin Society would reconsider this question, and would not deny to their poorer brethren means of enjoyment which they possessed themselves. It seemed to him most desirable that those who had the opportunities of reading the will and mind of God in His holy book should also have opportunities of contemplating the works of His hand in the other great book—the book of Nature, remembering that “the earth is the Lord’s, and the fulness thereof.” He trusted that the Government grant would not be withdrawn, and that the result of a calmer consideration of this question by the Royal Dublin Society would render such a step unnecessary. He admitted it to be an evil that by the opening of holiday places on the Sunday a certain number of officials were employed; but this objection would apply less to the Glasnevin Gardens than to any other, for there was no railway, and only two or three attendants would be required; and, that being so, he thought the conscientious scruples of a few persons should not stand in the way of doing a great public good. When they considered the many evils to which the populations of large towns were exposed on Sundays, they must admit that it was an advantage to remove them as far as possible from those unholy temptations. He must express a hope that public places of this sort would not be closed on that day.

THE EARL OF CLANCARTY said, that those who entertained religious scruples upon that subject were entitled to the greatest respect.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he would immediately put himself in communication upon the matter with the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, who had the most friendly feeling towards the Royal Dublin Society, and he hoped that by that means some satisfactory settlement of the question would be effected before the Vote came on for discussion in the House of Commons.

IRREMOVABLE POOR BILL.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, a misapprehension prevailed that the Bill introduced a new principle into the law of settlement. It introduced no new principle, but simply carried out more effectually the beneficial objects of a Bill passed in the last year in which Sir Robert Peel held office, and of a Bill subsequently passed. That Bill was recommended by Sir Robert Peel, partly for the benefit of the poor, but chiefly to compensate the agricultural interest for the losses they apprehended from the withdrawal of protection. At that day the burden of the poor was greatly aggravated from the circumstance that they used to leave the villages and go to the manufacturing towns when trade was prosperous, and in seasons of distress return to the agricultural districts. The Bill of Sir Robert Peel provided that no poor person who had resided for five years in any place should be chargeable on the place of his settlement, and by the 11 & 12 Vict., it was provided that the charge of that new class of paupers should be cast upon the common fund of the union, and not be a charge upon the parish. The principle of the Bill was subsequently extended by a Bill introduced by Mr. Buller to other classes of paupers. The common fund was levied on each parish on an average of its payment of poor rates for three years. Soon, however, became evident that there must be an alteration of the principle by which that common fund was constituted. As the poor were to be maintained by establishment, and were to have the services of union officers, it was thought at first only fair that the parishes should pay in proportion to their demand for that service. So long as that was the only charge cast upon the fund there was no complaint. But when other charges were cast upon it, it became necessary to constitute the fund differently, and to render liable the property of the union. It was, therefore, deemed necessary by the late Government to institute an inquiry to ascertain what grounds there were for the complaints which had never ceased to be made by the parishes for the charges cast upon them. Accordingly, in 1858, a Committee was appointed to inquire into this subject, and that Committee came to certain Resolutions, on which and on the evidence taken before it the present Bill was founded. The first of these Resolutions was that the period of residence should be reduced from five to three years; the second, that the area of residence should be extended to the unions; and the third, that some improvement should be made in the mode of raising the common fund. The reduction of the period of residence and the extension of the area seemed to be generally approved. It was exceedingly difficult at present for the parochial authorities to discover whether a man had a five years' residence or not; but the fact would be much easier ascertained if a three years' residence was provided for, and the proposal for three years was made in deference to the wishes of the Committee. If the shorter time were agreed to it would be a means of circulating labour, while at present the law was little else than a trap to deceive the poor. If the House believed there was any good in the inquiries of Committees it would have no hesitation in passing this measure. The most important change proposed in the Bill was that in the 9th Clause, by which the common fund would be levied, not on the average of three years' relief given by a parish, but according to the valuation of the rateable property. In the Committee a proposal was made by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Estcourt), and agreed to, to combine the element of population with that of the rateable value of property, and his right hon. Friend had given notice that he would move in Committee an Amendment to that effect. That was a proposal to which he could not agree, and he hoped it would not be sanctioned by the House. It was unnecessary to tell the House that at present the relief of the poor fell very unequally upon parishes. It often happened that wealthy parishes had the advantage of the labour of the poor, while some adjoining poor parish had to bear all the burden of their relief when they required it. This injustice was not one that arose between the conflicting interests of the trading and agricultural districts, or between town and country parishes. The injustice was often experienced in the case of two parishes situated in the same district. For instance, in the parish in which the Bank of England was situated there were almost no poor. In the parish in which St. Catherine's Dock was placed few poor were to be found; while adjoining parishes from which the labour came were swarmed with them. The same state of circumstances occurred in agricultural districts, so that one or two fortunate proprietors were frequently exempted from the support of the irremovable poor, while their neighbours were overburdened. He believed the new mode of contributing to the common fund proposed in the Bill, by the rateable value of each parish, would do much to remove the injustice that now existed. The new proposal had the recommendation of those in all parts of the country who were best able to judge of its probable effects. He thought the measure an exceedingly moderate one; and should it be rejected by the House, he begged them to remember that there was an organized movement for an equalization of poor rates all over the country, and that they would act wisely in not giving strength and energy to such a movement.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do leave the Chair."

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, that no notice of any Amendment having been given, he apprehended that it was not intended to offer any opposition to the Bill. He, for one, was ready to give his best support to the Bill, because, with one exception, he thought its clauses would tend to simplify the administration of the Poor Law, would benefit the poor, and be a relief to the guardians. He believed that the Select Committee to which the right hon. Gentleman had referred was most impartially constituted; and its decisions certainly had nothing about them of a party character. They had viewed the question simply as one of local administration. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that it was fair to make the rateable value the basis of the assessment for the common fund, but he thought at the same time that the element of population ought to be added with the rateable value, and then they would have a satisfactory result. The Amendment which he had carried in the Select Committee, which the right hon. Gentleman had omitted from his Bill, and which he should move to restore, was to combine population with rateable value in calculating the share of each parish's assessment. Take the case of two parishes, each rated at £10,000 a year, but in which there was a population in the one case of 10,000 and of 1,000 in the other. The right hon. Gentleman proposed to assess both alike; but he (Mr. Estcourt) would assess one at £10,000 and the other at £11,000—that is to say, he would add to the rateable value £1 per head of the population. On the face of it, the parish which had the larger population would be likely to make a greater demand upon the common fund than the other. He contended, therefore, that the Resolution which he had carried in the Select Committee, and which he should endeavour to introduce into the Bill was required by the principle of common fairness. With respect to the accusation which had frequently been made, that cottages were pulled down, or were not built, because the landowners and farmers wished to relieve the parish of the poor rate—in his belief that accusation was utterly false. The real reason why such cottages were not built being, that as speculations they were not remunerative. Cottages were usually built by speculators, and it was asked why could not landlords do the same? The answer to that was, that the landlord refused to screw out of the cottager the same amount of rent which persons not connected with the land had no hesitation in doing. He thought, therefore, that the accusation which had been brought against the landowners in this respect was a most unjust one. They did not build cottages, not because they wished to avoid the introduction of a class of persons liable to become chargeable to the union, but simply because the building of cottages was not remunerative to them. It was said that the Amendment would not lead to any practical result. But even admitting that, he contended that it would be good policy to adopt it, because if they did not do so, all charges would be put upon the common fund; and if that were done, it would lead to union, to county, and even to national rating. No doubt there would be much theoretical benefit in adopting a national rate; but it would at the same time tend to much practical mischief, because it would entirely destroy the idea of responsibility, and the consequent wise and judicious management of the fund. It was exactly because we had small areas, and that every one in a neighbourhood knew the nature of every item he had to pay in the shape of relief, that such excellent results in the administration of the new Poor Law had been obtained. It was easy to say that the parochial system was a remnant of feudalism; but it lay at the root of the Poor Law, which, notwithstanding all the attacks that had been made upon it and all the obloquy that it had excited, had admirably fulfilled its object. With regard to lunatics, it had been proposed to place them on the common fund, because by so doing it was hoped that it would encourage sending them at once to the asylum, in which case they should stand a chance of being amongst the 75 per cent who were cured, if they were subjected early enough to proper medical treatment; whereas if the expense were left on the parishes they would be apt to keep them in the workhouses till their cases had become hopeless. When they went into Committee on the Bill he should have opportunities of explaining his views on all the points to which he might wish to address himself, and would not, therefore, now enter upon all the topics introduced into the Bill.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said, he rose to make an earnest appeal to the House not to enter into a general discussion of the subject with the Speaker in the Chair, but to proceed at once to the Committee, when each individual clause could be discussed. He himself being responsible for a great change in the Poor Law, he naturally took a deep interest in the subject, and especially in the measure before the House, which would affect the poor as well as property, though they did not seem so directly represented in it. He had served on the Select Committee, and was under the full impression that they would go into Committee on it to-day; and although it was natural enough that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board would make some explanation of the measure in moving that it be committed, he did not think the present time was a proper one to discuss its principle and, therefore, he entreated the House ceeded at once to the consideration of the Bill in Committee.

MR. HERBERT said, he had voted in Committee for the Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Sotherton) with respect to population, but he had done so under a misapprehension. He had been greatly influenced by the evidence of the right hon. Gentleman; but on further consideration he was satisfied that he had been in error.

MR. KNIGHT said, he must protest against any attempt to choke discussion on the Bill, which went further than that of Mr. Baines, and which the country had not had an opportunity of considering. It had been read a second time at half-past one in the morning without a word of explanation as to its objects, and now they were asked to proceed with it without any discussion. The effect of the Bill would be to establish union rating in more than half the parishes of England in one year; and it would transfer many millions of property from the hands of one class to those of another. The real question was whether the poor were to be supported in small or large areas—in neighbourhoods, or in large masses? Large areas had often been tried and had always broken down. In the very first instance the Poor Law was established with petty sessional divisions. After a few years it was necessary to reduce the area to parishes; and even those were afterwards divided in some cases into townships. In Ireland and Scotland large areas had at first been tried and had signally failed. Those large areas had been reduced, and then the Poor Law had worked admirably. The House had actually passed a Bill that very Session for the purpose of dissolving combinations of parishes in Scotland. In Norwich, where forty-three parishes had been united for rating purposes in the reign of Queen Anne, the Poor Law had failed; and the City was more heavily taxed than any other part of the country. In the City of London, where the parishes were ridiculously small (some of them being only half an acre in extent) the Poor Law had not broken down. There were in fact in the City ninety-eight parochial staffs to look after the poor instead of one; and the work was, therefore, well done. Even the existing law of irremovability had worked ill. More out-relief was allowed to the union poor, and they were much worse attended to than the parish. There had been very few complaints of the Poor Law except from places like Norwich.

In London the only complaints were from St. George's-in-the-East and Fulham, where the work-people, the dock-labourers, and the market gardeners, were paid, not by the day, or by the week, but by the hour; and the meaning of the outcry was that the public should pay their wages for them. Other parishes, even while they complained of the inequality of the rating, admitted that they had never paid so little. A union rating would not remedy their complaints, because there would be some which would only pay 6d., whereas others would pay 3s. 6d. or 4s. The case of overburdened parishes had altogether broken down. The worst case at starting was Spalding, but it turned out that the labourers from Deeping Fen carried into the town £10,000 a year in wages. Spalding had, moreover, all the retail trade of the district. The rateable value of the town had risen from £17,000 in 1815 to £66,000 in 1843, and the poor rate had been gradually becoming less, so that with all its grievances Spalding was growing fat. All the other cases had broken down in a similar manner. It would be far better, both for the poor and for the ratepayers, to extend the rating all over the kingdom at once, and have a national rate; for a national rate would be far less injurious to individuals than a union rate would be, and which, as he had pointed out, would effect an immense change in property, whereas from its greater diffusion a national rate would not. It was idle to attempt to smuggle the Bill through as a small measure, and he sincerely hoped that the House would not interfere with the five years' settlement.

MR. LOCKE said, that he understood the right hon. Gentleman to say this Bill involved no great principle, and that any discussion upon it might take place on going into Committee. Now, it appeared that it involved great and dangerous principles, and was very much objected to by his constituents of the borough of Southwark, whom it would materially affect. The 1st Clause said the chargeability should be on the union; but in the borough of Southwark all the large parishes were unions of themselves. Where the Bill read "union," the people of Southwark read "metropolis." They complained that the poor lived, to a great extent, in their parishes, while those in other parts of the Metropolis, who enjoyed the benefit of their labour, paid nothing for their support. Legislation had driven the labouring classes into poor parishes, and to that extent benefited the rich. The Earl of Derby had over and over again called the attention of the House of Lords to the removal of numbers of poor by the making of railways; but by the metropolitan improvements many thousands of poor persons had been driven over the water, where there was space for the erection of a class of houses suitable for the poor. No less than 2,000 poor persons were removed when Victoria Street was opened up, and when the Dean and Chapter were remonstrated with, and asked, "What is to become of the poor?" the reply was, "That is their look out; they must go over the water to Lambeth;" and so, nolens volens, they were obliged to move. The same removal of poor was occasioned by other metropolitan improvements, commencing with Oxford and Regent Streets, while the same thing was about to be done in the removal of a large number of poor people's houses in the neighbourhood of the Strand, in order to provide for new law courts. It was not, therefore, necessary to travel down to Spalding and other distant places to point out the evil. All that the people of Southwark asked was that as legislation had created these evils, so legislation should provide a remedy. The Bill declared that a person should be irremovable after a residence of three years. This made matters worse, and his constituents, therefore, recommended that the area of rating should be extended to the whole Metropolis.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON observed, that the Bill was one of great importance in three different respects, and required the careful consideration of the House. In the first place, it introduced union rating. Now union rating might be a good or a bad thing, but it was undoubtedly a change in the law of the country, and ought not to be introduced without a full and free discussion of the principle it involved. In the second place, the Bill involved the interests of the removable poor throughout the country, which was a matter of no slight importance. In the third place, it touched the interests of a much smaller class numerically, but still a class which, like every other class, was entitled to justice — he meant the proprietors of extra-parochial places; and it touched their interests in the face of a distinct pledge given by the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie) in 1857, that their interests should not be further interfered with than by the last Poor Law Bill. Those were all important questions, and it should be also remembered that the Bill passed the second reading at two o'clock in the morning, without any discussion, and in consequence of an appeal made by the Government, which was consented to by his right hon. Friend the Member for Wiltshire, on the clear understanding that before the Bill went into Committee its principle should be fully discussed. And now, when they had scarcely entered into the discussion the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle, one of the most experienced Members in the House, proposed that all discussion should be stopped. He could not allow such a course to be adopted without saying that it was a most unusual one, would form a most objectionable precedent, and would make the House extremely cautious how they acceded to the wishes of the Government on an understanding which might not be afterwards adhered to. With regard to the merits of the Bill he had always taken rather a different view of the first question to that of a great many of his hon. Friends on that side of the House; for he had been disposed to favour the adoption of union rating, thinking it might be an improvement on their present Poor Law system, and, therefore, so far as that principle was involved, he was not inclined to take exception to it in the Bill. He was also of opinion that the five years' Act had proved a great and valuable boon to the labouring classes in this country; that it had worked extremely well, and accomplished the end for which it was intended. He raised no objection to the reduction of that five years to three, believing that it would be advantageous to a still larger class of people. With reference to the extra-parochial part of the question, all he asked was that the understanding which had been come to should be adhered to, and that burdens should not be thrown upon the proprietors which they could not be called upon in reason or justice to bear. On that point, when the Bill went into Committee he should move an Amendment.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he did not see that the right hon. Baronet was justified in the observation that he had made in regard to the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle. The object of the right hon. Gentleman was not to stifle discussion, but that the discussion should be attended with some benefit, and not pr

a mere waste of time. He wished the full discussion should take place on the clauses, so that when they suspended their sitting they would at least have made some progress. He could not agree that there was such a change of principle as had been indicated, and at all events, as all the observations which had been made had reference to particular clauses of the Bill, they might as easily have been made in the Committee.

MR. WALTER said, he acquiesced in the principle of the Bill. He had always thought that union rating was a necessary consequence of the principle of union management, which was put forward as one of the principle advantages of the new Poor Law. He was no admirer of the new Poor Law, but the principle of union management which it introduced was a new principle, by which the old parochial system was broken up and demolished. It had always appeared to him that the area of rating should coincide with the area of management. Some hon. Gentlemen seemed to think that there was no ground to be taken up between national rating and parochial rating. He did not see the question in that light. If the area was not too large for purposes of management, why should it be considered too large for the purposes of rating? If the labour of the country was so equally distributed through all the parishes that every man lived in the parish in which he worked, there would be no difficulty in the case. But that was not so. The theory of the Poor Law was that a man was, or ought to be, relieved in a particular locality, not merely because he resided in that locality, but because he worked there. Now, the tendency of parochial rating in small parishes had been to discourage the building of small cottages, and to enable landlords to avail themselves of the labour of persons living in other parishes. That was a system opposed to justice and sound policy. He thought there was a great deal of force in what the hon. and learned Member for Southwark (Mr. Locke) had said when he urged that the Bill did not go far enough, and that the rating of the metropolitan parishes should be extended to some larger area—he would not say an area including the whole Metropolis, but certainly one going beyond the range of single parishes. With regard to the details of the Bill, he would make no remarks upon them till they went into Committee.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, that he did not think that the country or the House would object to the time that had been spent in discussing the principle of the Bill. Having had a considerable experience in the working of the Poor Law he thought that the principle of union rating would have a fatal effect upon rural districts. He did not understand the argument of the hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter) with regard to the Metropolis: for if the rating area of the Metropolis was to be extended at all, the whole Metropolis must be introduced, and he need hardly say what a state of things that would originate. The great inducement of guardians in rural districts to attend was to prevent the ratepayers from being imposed upon; but if the area was enlarged to the whole union that feeling would be greatly weakened. As to the Metropolis, if there was only one board of guardians, the work would soon become so onerous and so little honourable that it would practically fall into the hands of very few persons, and those probably not the best qualified for the task. If any one would move that the Bill be committed that day three months, he should give the Motion his most earnest support.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE said, the main principle of the Bill was to extend the beneficial influence of the law of irremovability, and the principal objection urged to it related to the question of rating. He thought that a point which could be very well considered in Committee. The Bill left Southwark in exactly the same position in which it now stood.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he was very strongly in favour of the Bill, which he believed would most favourably affect, not only the pauperised, but the non-pauperised portion of the labouring poor. It was a great hardship that there should be such a temptation, not to the landlords—who he believed would always resist it—but to the farmers of a district, to resist the building of proper houses for their labourers. No more fruitful source of demoralization existed than this system of open and close parishes. It seemed to him that the chargeable area should be made co-extensive with the employing area. There were reasons also which operated very strongly in large towns which made this Bill most desirable, and his constituents in Bradford had urged him to support it.

SIR HARRY VERNEY contended that the Bill would have a prejudicial effect on the labouring poor. There could be nothing more desirable than the improvement of the cultivation of the soil, and the Bill would militate against such improvement, because if two parishes were contiguous, and one was well cultivated and the other not, the one that was well cultivated would have to bear the burden of the badly cultivated one. They were all agreed as to the removal of the poor, but he hoped the House would not agree to the proposal for union rating. Indeed, he regretted that the right hon. Gentleman had not divided his Bill into two parts.

MR. CAYLEY said, there were principles in the Bill that involved neither more nor less than confiscation, and the destruction of the principle of local self-government. The country was not prepared for a union rating, or for an equalization of rates. They were in point of fact by this Bill striking a blow at the root of the parochial system. The only grievance they had a right to complain of was the system of close parishes; but surely the right hon. Gentleman was ingenious enough to find a remedy for that evil without altering the whole incidence of the Poor Law. Therefore, considering that the Bill was one of an extremely dangerous character, he would give the hon. Member for Westminster an opportunity of opposing the present further progress of the Bill. He moved that the Bill be committed that day three months.

MR. WARNER seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee,"—instead thereof.

MR. HENLEY said, he was surprised that the proposition of the right hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir James Graham), to go at once into Committee, should have been supported by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, because when the right hon. Gentleman, the President of the Poor Law Board, brought the Bill before them, he went minutely through every clause; but not content with that he did his best to pull the proceedings of the Committee all to pieces; and then, when it was proposed to discuss the measure, up jumped the right

hon. Baronet, the Member for Morpeth, and said, "Oh, let us get on; you can discuss it very well in Committee." The right hon. Gentleman told them that there was not a single reason which was advanced in favour of the five years' irremovability which did not apply with tenfold force to the proposed three years' irremovability; but if so it would apply with fifty times more force to a proposition for irremovability, with no limitation as to the period of residence, and as sure as a stone set rolling on the side of a hill would roll to the bottom, the union ratings would extend to county ratings and national ratings. With irremovability they must necessarily have a national rate; but, as it had been well said, with a wide area it would be impossible to check pauperism. In a small area the employers did not discharge their workpeople in the winter months. Taking the Saturday night and the rate together, there was not that difference between the two classes of parishes which people supposed; and it was a singular fact that in what were called town parishes, where the rates were high, the rent of land was also high—a sufficient proof that there was more equality than was imagined. He really did think, then, that the House should take a little more time before they proceeded with the Bill, and should afford the country a better opportunity of considering the question. The Bill, indeed, had been so curiously managed that the country knew nothing at all about its nature and what its effect would be, and, therefore, he had had but little communication from his constituents on the subject. It would not be just and right to do away with irremovability to the extent proposed, without some shifting of the burden, and at present they had had no Returns to show how far the incidence of rating would be changed, and what had been called confiscation would take place. From a communication which he had had with the clerk of one of the boards of guardians of a parish contiguous to Oxford, it appeared that it would increase the proportion of the common charge of that parish from one-eighth to a third. Therefore, he did not think it either just or right to run such a risk as they would of ruining parishes, if they passed the measure in the absence of all information. It was an unsatisfactory thing that they were asked to pass a Bill on the mere faith of the Report of a Committee, when a Member of the Government immediately afterwards go up and pulled the Committee to pieces. As to a union rate it would make people wholly careless of what became of the poor. The area would be so large that it would induce a general carelessness, and labourers would be paid off even to half a day, and packed about their business with a total indifference as to what became of them. He was opposed to a national rating, and should be extremely sorry to see the parochial system broken up. For these reasons he should vote for the delay of the measure.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: This Bill is only a Bill to facilitate the development of principles recognized in our existing laws, but as it has been said that the country and the House are ignorant of the grounds on which it rests I shall take the liberty of making a few observations regarding it. The first Act of Parliament referring to this matter originated with Sir Robert Peel, who stated, in bringing forward the repeal of the Corn Laws, that there were certain securities he wished to afford to the agricultural interest, and that one of these was the principle of irremovability. An Act was passed in 1846, by which a person residing for five years in a parish should be irremovable, but that Act did not in any way interfere with the law of chargeability as regarded the irremovable poor. In 1847 a Bill was introduced, which first established the principle that the relief of the poor made irremovable by the Act of the previous Session should be charged to the common fund of the union, and not to the parish. That Bill was afterwards extended by Mr. Buller to other classes of poor, including lunatics and the casual poor, and I may here state that the common fund was to be made up by assessments based on the average of relief given in each parish for the previous three years. Now, what are the changes proposed in the present Bill? The first change is to diminish the term of five years, which constitutes irremovability, to three years. That is a question of degree, not of principle. It is embodied in the Scotch law, where it is known as the principle of industrial residence. The right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) says that if you once make this change you will be led further, and will ultimately come to the abolition of all settlement. [MR. HENLEY: I said, irremovability.] I consider the terms to be the same. The very essence of settlement is the power of removing a man from a place where he is now chargeable. I am so much a heretic as to wish to see the law of settlement entirely gone. I believe its abolition to be perfectly practicable and safe. There is no connection between the law of settlement and union rating; and the abolition of settlement is perfectly compatible with chargeability. According to the law of Ireland a poor person is chargeable to the electoral division in which he resides, and there is no law of settlement in Ireland. In this case Irish legislation has been founded on our English experience. The second change proposed by the Bill is that when a person has resided three years in a parish that residence will confer the benefit of a residence in the union. It will prevent him from being removed in many cases in which he is now liable to be removed. I am not alone in being an enemy to the law of settlement. Mr. Pitt, in 1796, declared himself to be opposed to what he called the "striking grievance" of the law of settlement, and if he had been allowed to legislate according to his own views, he would have abolished the law of settlement altogether, having founded his views, no doubt, on a well-known passage in Adam Smith's Wealth of Nations. The first two changes in this Bill, then, cannot be considered very dangerous. The third change is contained in the 9th Clause, and it alters the principle on which the union charge is calculated. The charge for the maintenance of persons on the common fund is diffused over the different parishes of the union. What the clause proposes is to calculate the common charge, not according to the average of three years' relief, but according to the valuation or absolute property of each parish. It is merely a change in the mode of calculating the constituent elements of the common fund, and it is, I admit, a fair question for the consideration of the Committee. Wherever there is a common fund raised there the advantage of an area having a unity of management will be experienced; and it seems to me a fair principle that you should make the charge equally on all the property of the union. I cannot subscribe to the doctrine that if we admit the principle of calculating the common fund in the way I have described it leads, by any logical or probable consequence, to the introduction of national rating, or rating on any large area. No person can be more strongly opposed to national rating, or even county rating, than I am, but I believe that a union rating is within a manageable area. I believe with the hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter) that there is an essential distinction between that and a larger area, and I cannot believe that the House of Commons will be deterred by any fear of national rating from changing the assessment now based on pauperism to one based on the absolute value of property. There are halting places between a parochial and a national rate which we may prudently occupy, and I hope that will be the opinion of the House.

MR. BARROW said, that the Bill proceeded altogether on the principle of union rating, and he objected to deparochializing the parishes as much as he did to national or county rating. It was quite fair that in the first instance a common fund had been raised on the averages of the individual parishes, because at that time they required money to build the workhouse, but what he objected to was that when the irremovable poor became union paupers the charge was still placed upon the parishes, instead of on the whole of the union. That was unfair in the highest degree, inasmuch as many of the parishes of different unions returned no average charges, and, therefore, escaped liability altogether. He thought they ought to go into Committee to remedy that evil.

SIR BROOK BRIDGES said, he believed that there would have been stronger representations on both sides of the House with regard to the Bill if it had been made more thoroughly known to the country. He considered that the present parochial system gave enormous advantages to the poor man, and that those advantages would disappear entirely with the enlargement of the area. The farmer would no longer continue his exertions to employ labourers all the year round, and he believed that this was the thin end of the wedge to introduce union ratings and extended area, which he looked upon as an unmixed evil, and, therefore, he should vote for the Amendment.

The House divided:—Ayes 187; Noes 44: Majority 143.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again on Monday next.

MOVEMENTS OF THE CHANNEL FLEET.—QUESTION.

MR. TORRENS said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether it is intended that the Channel Fleet, or any portion of it, are to anchor in Belfast Lough during the cruise of the Fleet this Summer?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that no orders had been issued to the Channel Fleet to put into any port in particular.

HARBOURS IMPROVEMENT BILL. QUESTION.

MR. GREGORY said, he would beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, Why the Clauses which he intimated would be added to the Harbours Bill, to enable Harbour Commissioners in Ireland to borrow money for the Improvement of Harbours in that country, have not been added; and, whether any such Clauses were sent to the Irish Office for consideration; and, if so what course was taken there about them?

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that the Government were desirous of extending the districts in Ireland to rate themselves, and so afford a security for loans under the Harbours Improvement Bill, and a Clause had been prepared for that purpose by the Board of Works in Ireland. It was afterwards sent to the Irish Law Officers of the Crown, and they saw a great deal of difficulty with regard to the question, because it would provide new areas of taxation; so that on the whole the Government had thought it better to give up the Clause, rather than delay the passing of the Bill. But so far as the measure itself went, whatever advantages were possessed by England would be extended to Ireland. The object of the Board of Trade was to extend a special advantage to Ireland, and he was sorry they had failed to do so.

PLANS FOR THE NEW FOREIGN OFFICE.—QUESTION.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he had on the Paper a Notice to ask the First Commissioner of Works, When he will submit the Gothic and Italian Plans for the new Foreign Office to the inspection of Members, and whether he will name a day on which the decision of the House on the question of style shall be taken? but since he had given notice of this question, the right hon. Gentleman had deposited Italian plans in the Tea-room of the House of Commons; therefore, he would merely ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he still adheres to his decision not to exhibit some of the intermediate designs, which, he understood, have been viewed with considerable favour? He had a second request to make—namely, inasmuch as the number of new buildings was now so great, that his right hon. Friend, after communicating with the noble Lord at the head of the Government, will name some day for the discussion of the still disputed question of the styles?

MR. COWPER said, that the designs for the elevation in the Italian style recently made by Mr. George Gilbert Scott were now in the Tea-room. As the noble Lord also wished to have the Gothic plans, he (Mr. Cowper) had endeavoured to select those which he thought most calculated to meet the noble Lord's wishes. The last Gothic designs were now in the exhibition of the Royal Academy. Considering this, he (Mr. Cowper) thought the noble Lord might wish to compare those which originally obtained the premium. With regard to the time for taking this discussion, he thought the legitimate opportunity was when the House was called upon to vote a sum of money in the Estimates for these buildings. He (Mr. Cowper) could not say when that Estimate would be taken, but it would come on in its order, in proper course, in the Miscellaneous Estimates. Due notice would be given of the day when these Estimates would come on.

LORD ELCHO said, that at the present moment there were in the tea-room two designs—the Gothic design, which was originally drawn by Mr. George Gilbert Scott; and the Palladian design. There was also the amended Gothic design, and a round-arched Italian design; so that those who were in favour of the Gothic style might contrast it with the Palladian, and with the round-arched early Italian. The Gothic designs of last year were in the Royal Academy. Had the right hon. Gentleman any objection to exhibit the amended as well as the original Gothic designs if the Royal Academy would consent to their removal? Also would the right hon. Gentleman state with some greater degree of certainty the day when the Vote was likely to be taken in the Miscellaneous Estimates?

MR. COWPER said, with regard to the time when the Vote would be taken, he could only say it was the tenth Vote of the first class. The Votes would be taken in order, and when the ninth was disposed of, the tenth would come on; but how much time would be consumed in passing the first nine Votes was more than he could say. With respect to the exhibition of the designs, he would consult with his noble Friend, and endeavour to meet his wishes.

COMPULSORY REMOVAL OF POOR TO IRELAND—QUESTION.

MR. HENNESSY said, he rose to ask the Lord Advocate, Whether his attention has been called to an Order of the House for "Copies of all Informations and other Documents relating to the compulsory removal of Rebecca Kearney to Ireland from Glasgow;" and whether, inasmuch, as such Return does not contain the "Informations" and "Orders" required by Law in all cases of compulsory removal of poor persons to Ireland, he can furnish the House with any explanation on the subject?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he regretted that he could not furnish the hon. Member with the information wished for. In the Return of the Board of Guardians from the parish in Ireland he found a Resolution that the Poor Law Commissioners in Ireland should be requested to apply to the Board of Supervision for information respecting Rebecca Kearney. They had not, however, received any such application. He (the Lord Advocate) had applied to them, and they had informed him that her removal had been effected without their intervention. At that moment he did not know from what parish Rebecca Kearney had been removed, but as soon as he received information on the subject he would communicate it to the House.

THE GARIBALDI FUND. RESOLUTION.

Order for Committee (Supply) read;
Motion made and Question proposed,
"That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he rose to call the attention of the House to the proceedings of a society advertised as the Garibaldi Fund for the Unity of Italy, which was presided over by the hon. Member for the Ayr District of Burghs, while other Members of the House were on the committee of management. He intended no disrespect to the Members of the House whose names he should have to mention, nor did he desire to excite any angry discussion upon the affairs of Italy. The position of affairs in that country was much too critical for any hon. Member to desire to excite any great difference of opinion upon the subject, and it was on that account that he must protest against the conduct of certain hon. Members of that House in associating themselves with committees such as that to which he should have to refer. As to mere opinions upon foreign affairs, he might hold to old traditions and old monarchies, while other hon. Members of a more speculative turn of mind might prefer new alliances and young republics; but he trusted that the course which had been adopted by the committee, the conduct of which he was about to call in question, would meet with the reprobation of the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, who had recently on one or two occasions spoken of Austria in terms which were much more likely to be beneficial to this country than those which he adopted in the early part of last year. The advertisement of the committee to which he referred, and which appeared in the columns of The Times, was as follows:—

"Garibaldi Fund for the Unity of Italy.—Committee:—E. H. J. Crawford, Esq., M.P., chairman; W. Coningham, Esq., M.P.; J. Stanfield, Esq., M.P.; J. White, Esq., M.P.; Gore Langton, Esq., M.P.; P. A. Taylor, Esq.; W. Austin, Esq.; W. J. Linton, Esq.; Frederick Lawrence, Esq.; W. H. Ashurst, Esq., treasurer; and J. Hale Barker, Esq., hon. sec."

It would go abroad that such a committee as that existed, and that Members of that House were members of it, and how prejudicial must that be to the interests of England in foreign countries! What were the objects of the Committee? The advertisement said—

"The emancipation of Italy has yet to be accomplished. One step towards it was made by the annexation of Tuscany and the Emilia to Piedmont. The expulsion of the Bourbons from Naples and the extension of the Constitutional Government of Victor Emmanuel to Southern Italy, formed the second step. It yet remains to free Venice and install the Italian Government at Rome. To promote this end the above committee has been formed at the desire of Garibaldi, and will act in concert with the Central Italian Committee at Genoa. Its object is to collect funds, and, in Garibaldi's own words, 'to take whatever steps may seem advantageous for vindicating to the British people the aims of the Italian patriots, and otherwise promoting the interests and independence of Italy.'"

["Hear, hear!"] Hon. Gentlemen cheered that sentiment, and they had a perfect right to hold that opinion as to what might be for the interests of Italy; but what he protested against was that a committee composed of these gentlemen should raise subscriptions to be sent to a country with which we were in strict alliance, in order to rob it of part of its territory. Last year the subject of another Garibaldi Committee was brought before the House by his hon. Friend the Member for the King's County (Mr. Hennessy); and he would prove, from the observations which were then made by the Solicitor General and the late Attorney General, that at any rate this committee must be considered illegal. The hon. and learned Solicitor General said—

"I do not deny that in the case of a foreign loan attempted to be raised here for the purpose of fomenting revolution in a foreign country in amity with us, the Court of Common Pleas, in an action on the contract, has held that the contract could not be enforced, being tainted with the character of illegality."—[3 Hansard, civill. 1876.]

That was a case in point; a fund was being raised for the purpose of exciting revolution in a foreign country with which we were in alliance. The late Attorney General (now the Lord Chancellor) spoke more strongly. He said—

"I quite agree, therefore, that according to the common law of England any subjects of the Queen who, either directly or indirectly, may supply money in aid of the revolt of subjects of any nation or Power with whom we are in alliance commit an offence at common law. . . . As hon. Gentleman has said that the committee formed for the collection of subscriptions is open to an indictment for conspiracy. I must, however, observe that, according to the papers, almost the whole of that committee is constituted of foreigners. Now, I do not mean to say that the principle of the law does not extend its prohibition to all persons who are permanently resident in this kingdom, and who owe allegiance to, as they receive protection from, the Crown, but I do not believe that principle has ever been established upon authority."—[3 Hansard, civill. 1881-1883.]

It was evidently the opinion of Her Majesty's late Attorney General that the committee then complained of was only not illegal because it was composed of foreigners, but that a committee of Englishmen would have been decidedly illegal. How much stronger was the case when the committee was composed of Members of that House? He would not for a moment go into a discussion of the merits or demerits of the King of Naples or those of the Papal Government. All he desired was that the principle of non-intervention should be carried out honestly and fairly. He simply said that we had no right to interfere at all in the matter. Suppose a subscription was being raised to restore to their country the Princes of the House of Orleans—a family which had endeared themselves to the people of England by the nobility of their character and their benevolence—would not representations be made by the French Government, and would they not be attended to by that of England? But then it would be said the Government of France was a powerful Government, and one with which we could not trifle. Again, suppose the members of the French Senate formed themselves into a committee to collect money to revolutionize Ireland or the Ionian Islands, would not the English Government insist upon such a committee being broken up? Let them act on the Continent upon the principles of justice, and adhere strictly to a policy of non-intervention. More especially was that necessary now, for what had been the state of Italy since the death of Count Cavour? They read in The Times the other day that twenty-three men had been shot at Syracuse, that two villages had been burnt by the Piedmontese, that all the inhabitants had been deported, and that five had been shot. Outbreaks were occurring in every part of Italy. The present state of things was at once the eulogy and the condemnation of Count Cavour. It was the eulogy of his abilities as a Minister because he, and he alone, with the aid of Garibaldi, produced the revolution in Italy. It was his condemnation, because every Italian paper now stated that no dependence could be placed on the stability of affairs in Italy. With respect to Sardinia, what had they to trust to? Hon. Gentlemen thought that they had the support of The Times, the most influential paper in this country; but, although that journal was now favourable to what was called Italian unity, it on the 2nd of March last thus described the conduct of Sardinia during the last two years—

"An able publicist may convict Sardinia of a gross violation of Vattel or even of higher authorities. Sardinia entered into a war against Russia, not being a party to the Treaties respecting the Porte. Sardinia provoked Austria deliberately, and Austria fell into the trap laid by her army. Sardinia took advantage of the popular commotion to annex Tuscany and the Legations, although the Grand Duke and the Pope had taken part in the war of 1859. Sardinia invaded the Papal States without a declaration of war and under a shallow pretext. Sardinia connived at the expedition of Garibaldi, and reaped the fruits of his daring enterprise. Sardinia is probably now meditating how she can reduce the most ancient Sovereignty in Europe to a name, and annex the city of Rome to her rapidly extending dominions. Finally, she threatens an attack on an empire with which she made a solemn peace less than two years ago, and does not conceal her desire to wrest the Province of Venice from its legitimate master."

Every hon. Gentleman had a right to sympathize, if he chose, with the desire for what he (Mr. Cochrane) considered an impossibility—a united Italy; but with regard to a nation so important to this country, as the noble Lord had declared Austria to be, with whom we were so perfectly in accord as to wishes and objects that an eminent man remarked that the battles of Solferino and Magenta were as fatal to us as if fought on the soil of Sussex or Kent, he protested against any steps being taken to disturb what slight chance of repose existed in Northern Italy. The noble Lord's despatch to Sir James Hudson, written on the 21st of March, exhibited an admirable spirit. The noble Lord said—

"The obligations of the various States of Europe towards each other, the validity of the treaties which fix the territorial circumscription of each State, and the duty of acting in a friendly manner towards all its neighbours with whom it is not at war—these are the general ties which bind the nations of Europe together, and which prevent the suspicion, distrust, and discord that might otherwise deprive peace of all that makes it happy and secure. It is not without a purpose that I have made these general observations. My despatch of the 31st of August last need not here be repeated, but the sentiments there expressed continue to animate Her Majesty's Government. After the troubles of the last few years Europe has a right to expect that the Italian Kingdom shall not be a new source of dissension and alarm."

Those were excellent sentiments. But, on the one hand, while Europe entertained expectations with regard to the Italian Kingdom, Italy had a right to require that those occupying high places in this country should not conspire to raise war against a country with which we were in strict alliance.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words—

"The existence of any Society, formed for the purpose of raising funds to assist a revolutionary party in any Country with which we are in strict alliance, is inconsistent with the principle of non-intervention."

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: It is hardly necessary for me to answer the hon. Gentleman at any length. I thought some person who was more directly aimed at by the hon. Gentleman would have risen to speak with regard to this Garibaldi Fund. So far from being a revolutionary association, I believe the purpose for which the Garibaldi Fund was set on foot was to support the Italian Government. I cannot say that I approve of it, or that I think it desirable to maintain that society, but I really do not think it is a matter which requires the attention of the House at all.

LORD JOHN MANNERS: Do I understand it to be the noble Lord's impression that this society was formed for the purpose of maintaining the status quo in Italy?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I really know so little about the society that I am unable to answer the noble Lord's question.

LORD JOHN MANNERS: Perhaps the noble Lord will not think it beneath him to institute inquiries and satisfy his mind whether this is really an innocent society, or whether its object is to raise civil war in the dominion of a friendly Power?

MR. SLANEY said, he thought inquiry perfectly unnecessary, as the Italian Kingdom had now been recognized.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, he could not agree with the hon. Member, and he wished to point out one inconvenience which resulted to Englishmen from this direct violation of good faith, and the principle of non-intervention. The habit of foreign travel is known to be much improving, and to be most popular in this country. Many English families are in the habit of visiting the Austrian dominions, heretofore they had always been received with great courtesy and kindness, and were looked upon as friends and allies. But a great change has lately taken place. Since the establishment of societies, such as this one, headed by the five gentlemen already named, and since English travellers and writers have declared themselves to be such warm partisans of the enemies of Austria, and so openly express opinions antagonistic to the Austrian Government, and completely subversive of the existing state of things, they have ceased to be regarded as citizens of a friendly state. Recently an English gentleman and his family were exposed to great inconvenience. What was the history of the case? They wanted to proceed to a part of Austria little visited by travellers from the Kingdom of Sardinia, and, their baggage being subjected to a very close search, there were found among it some photographs of Garibaldi. [Laughter.] Hon. Members might laugh, but it was really no joking matter for English travellers, as this party found—for they were immediately surrounded by police and treated with the greatest harshness. He believed they owed all this discomfort to the hon. Gentleman and his four colleagues; for the subscriptions to the Garibaldi Fund were for the avowed purpose of creating civil war; and this English family having been led by their natural admiration for a very remarkable individual to possess themselves of his likeness, were exposed to the suspicion of being agents of this improper and revolutionary society. He believed hon. Gentlemen who had become supporters of this society were merely actuated by a desire to see their names figuring in the public papers with that of a great man; and if any of them regarded the matter in any more serious light he would ask, did they believe they were going to take the Quadrilateral? The noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office must surely feel that existence of such a society was contrary to his own sense of good faith and honourable English feeling, and he trusted that he would take steps to put an end to such a nuisance.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he felt it difficult to express in Parliamentary language his opinion of the answer which had been given by the noble Lord. Could he mean to tell the House as a gentleman that he believed the only object of this society was to maintain the status quo in what was now called the Kingdom of Italy? A great many things were publicly said under the guise of debating dexterity which he would pay the noble Lord the compliment of declaring that he would shrink from averring in private. The character of the society was stamped by the name which he bore—that of Garibaldi—the most aggressive man in the world. What danger threatened the Kingdom of Italy that it could be said this was merely a defensive organization? The noble Lord, surely, had not heard the advertisement, which stated distinctly, "It yet remains to free Venetia and to instal the Italian Government at Rome." If that did not mean aggression against the Emperor of Austria and the Pope there was no meaning in the English language. If the noble Lord heard the terms of the advertisement, he was still more astonished at the reply which he had ventured to give. We were ace with the Courts both of Austria and Rome. It was true the Queen had no ar representative at Rome, but there a diplomatic agent, a near relative of the noble Lord, who resided on the spot, practically there could be no doubt the Pope was recognized as the law- sovereign of his dominions. The Emperor of Austria had a representative in London, and we had one in Vienna. Now, maintained, without fear of contradiction by the hon. and learned Solicitor General, that any person within these realms, whether actually subjects of the Queen, or temporarily resident beneath her sway, levied money for the purposes of aggression against any Sovereign at peace with the Crown of England was guilty of offence against the law of England. He would not go into the question of the annexation of Italy, for he hoped before the debate closed they should have an opportunity of discussing fully and fairly the important events which had taken place in that country; but he must observe that the noble Lord, when he detailed what he believed to be the state of things in the Kingdom of Naples, spoke doubtless what he believed, though it was the reverse of

To prove what he said he would produce an authority hostile to the Bourbons, the King of Naples, and friendly to the revolutionary party; and he would ask the noble Lord whether in the letters to The Times' correspondent, who wrote in the strongest manner, not only as an observer but almost as an advocate, proofs of the grossest oppression were not visible, showing that Naples had been treated as a conquered country? It was perfectly evident that the Piedmontese came as invaders and were welcomed as such; everything which had transpired proved such a statement to be utterly false. They came by false pretences, by treason, and by oppression, and they kept down the people on their arrival by the rigour of military discipline and by the cruelty of military executions. They knew from the reports sent home by The Times' correspondent, that there was anarchy in Sicily and Sicily, and that in those countries there was no law at all. The subjects of the King of Naples who vowed to maintain their rights were called "brigands;" but call them what you might, there was no doubt that they were opposed to the Piedmontese, and that the latter had shot scores—hundreds of men for no crime but loyalty. It was equally certain that the prisons were full. One viceroy after another had been sent from Turin to keep the peace in those countries, and yet there was no safety for life or property. That was the liberty which the noble Lord's friends had brought to the people of Southern Italy; that was the freedom which that people were forced to accept by the bullet and the bayonet. That the votes for annexation were mere folly and delusion was perfectly well known. The noble Lord was aware of it. He knew that they were worth as much as, and not more than, the votes received for the annexation of Nice and Savoy. Everything which had happened since the annexation itself showed how worthless was that ceremony of taking votes, and that the votes themselves did not express the feelings of the people. All that had occurred since showed that the people desired the return of the Sovereign, and they would yet see his return. The people were at present very cruelly treated; and, therefore, his observations bore directly on the Motion of his hon. Friend, because they went to show that if hon. Gentlemen to whom the Motion alluded were banded together for the purpose of aiding in the further conquest of Italy by the Piedmontese, they were banded together to extend the same system of cruelty, dishonesty, and revolutionary aggression which now prevailed in what was called the Kingdom of Italy, in Sicily, and Naples. The state of things now existing in the South of Italy could not last, and ought not to last. It was impossible to know anything of what was going on in that part of Europe without feeling that it could not last.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that with sincerity he could say that he was as ignorant as his noble Friend had professed himself to be of the organization, combination, and objects of the society to which particular reference had been made; but he must observe that the proposition contained in the Motion before the House was not directed in form, and ought not to be regarded as directed, against the particular society to which the hon. Member for Honiton had thought fit to call the attention of the House. It was what might be called an abstract proposition of international law, and it was to this effect—that the formation of any society established for the purpose of raising funds to assist any revolutionary party in any country with which Great Britain was in strict labouring classes into poor parishes, and to that extent benefited the rich. The Earl of Derby had over and over again called the attention of the House of Lords to the removal of numbers of poor by the making of railways; but by the metropolitan improvements many thousands of poor persons had been driven over the water, where there was space for the erection of a class of houses suitable for the poor. No less than 2,000 poor persons were removed when Victoria Street was opened up, and when the Dean and Chapter were remonstrated with, and asked, "What is to become of the poor?" the reply was, "That is their look out; they must go over the water to Lambeth;" and so, nolens volens, they were obliged to move. The same removal of poor was occasioned by other metropolitan improvements, commencing with Oxford and Regent Streets, while the same thing was about to be done in the removal of a large number of poor people's houses in the neighbourhood of the Strand, in order to provide for new law courts. It was not, therefore, necessary to travel down to Spalding and other distant places to point out the evil. All that the people of Southwark asked was that as legislation had created these evils, so legislation should provide a remedy. The Bill declared that a person should be irremovable after a residence of three years. This made matters worse, and his constituents, therefore, recommended that the area of rating should be extended to the whole Metropolis.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON observed, that the Bill was one of great importance in three different respects, and required the careful consideration of the House. In the first place, it introduced union rating. Now union rating might be a good or a bad thing, but it was undoubtedly a change in the law of the country, and ought not to be introduced without a full and free discussion of the principle it involved. In the second place, the Bill involved the interests of the removable poor throughout the country, which was a matter of no slight importance. In the third place, it touched the interests of a much smaller class numerically, but still a class which, like every other class, was entitled to justice — he meant the proprietors of extra-parochial places; and it touched their interests in the face of a distinct pledge given by the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie) in 1857, that their interests should not be further interfered with than by the last Poor Law Bill. Those were all important questions, and it should be also remembered that the Bill passed the second reading at two o'clock in the morning, without any discussion, and in consequence of an appeal made by the Government, which was consented to by his right hon. Friend the Member for Wiltshire, on the clear understanding that before the Bill went into Committee its principle should be fully discussed. And now, when they had scarcely entered into the discussion the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle, one of the most experienced Members in the House, proposed that all discussion should be stopped. He could not allow such a course to be adopted without saying that it was a most unusual one, would form a most objectionable precedent, and would make the House extremely cautious how they acceded to the wishes of the Government on an understanding which might not be afterwards adhered to. With regard to the merits of the Bill he had always taken rather a different view of the first question to that of a great many of his hon. Friends on that side of the House; for he had been disposed to favour the adoption of union rating, thinking it might be an improvement on their present Poor Law system, and, therefore, so far as that principle was involved, he was not inclined to take exception to it in the Bill. He was also of opinion that the five years' Act had proved a great and valuable boon to the labouring classes in this country; that it had worked extremely well, and accomplished the end for which it was intended. He raised no objection to the reduction of that five years to three, believing that it would be advantageous to a still larger class of people. With reference to the extra-parochial part of the question, all he asked was that the understanding which had been come to should be adhered to, and that burdens should not be thrown upon the proprietors which they could not be called upon in reason or justice to bear. On that point, when the Bill went into Committee he should move an Amendment.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he did not see that the right hon. Baronet was justified in the observation that he had made in regard to the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle. The object of the right hon. Gentleman was not to stifle discussion, but that the discussion should be attended with some benefit, and not pr

a mere waste of time. He wished the full discussion should take place on the clauses, so that when they suspended their sitting they would at least have made some progress. He could not agree that there was such a change of principle as had been indicated, and at all events, as all the observations which had been made had reference to particular clauses of the Bill, they might as easily have been made in the Committee.

MR. WALTER said, he acquiesced in the principle of the Bill. He had always thought that union rating was a necessary consequence of the principle of union management, which was put forward as one of the principle advantages of the new Poor Law. He was no admirer of the new Poor Law, but the principle of union management which it introduced was a new principle, by which the old parochial system was broken up and demolished. It had always appeared to him that the area of rating should coincide with the area of management. Some hon. Gentlemen seemed to think that there was no ground to be taken up between national rating and parochial rating. He did not see the question in that light. If the area was not too large for purposes of management, why should it be considered too large for the purposes of rating? If the labour of the country was so equally distributed through all the parishes that every man lived in the parish in which he worked, there would be no difficulty in the case. But that was not so. The theory of the Poor Law was that a man was, or ought to be, relieved in a particular locality, not merely because he resided in that locality, but because he worked there. Now, the tendency of parochial rating in small parishes had been to discourage the building of small cottages, and to enable landlords to avail themselves of the labour of persons living in other parishes. That was a system opposed to justice and sound policy. He thought there was a great deal of force in what the hon. and learned Member for Southwark (Mr. Locke) had said when he urged that the Bill did not go far enough, and that the rating of the metropolitan parishes should be extended to some larger area—he would not say an area including the whole Metropolis, but certainly one going beyond the range of single parishes. With regard to the details of the Bill, he would make no remarks upon them till they went into Committee.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, that he did not think that the country or the House would object to the time that had been spent in discussing the principle of the Bill. Having had a considerable experience in the working of the Poor Law he thought that the principle of union rating would have a fatal effect upon rural districts. He did not understand the argument of the hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter) with regard to the Metropolis: for if the rating area of the Metropolis was to be extended at all, the whole Metropolis must be introduced, and he need hardly say what a state of things that would originate. The great inducement of guardians in rural districts to attend was to prevent the ratepayers from being imposed upon; but if the area was enlarged to the whole union that feeling would be greatly weakened. As to the Metropolis, if there was only one board of guardians, the work would soon become so onerous and so little honourable that it would practically fall into the hands of very few persons, and those probably not the best qualified for the task. If any one would move that the Bill be committed that day three months, he should give the Motion his most earnest support.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE said, the main principle of the Bill was to extend the beneficial influence of the law of irremovability, and the principal objection urged to it related to the question of rating. He thought that a point which could be very well considered in Committee. The Bill left Southwark in exactly the same position in which it now stood.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he was very strongly in favour of the Bill, which he believed would most favourably affect, not only the pauperised, but the non-pauperised portion of the labouring poor. It was a great hardship that there should be such a temptation, not to the landlords—who he believed would always resist it—but to the farmers of a district, to resist the building of proper houses for their labourers. No more fruitful source of demoralization existed than this system of open and close parishes. It seemed to him that the chargeable area should be made co-extensive with the employing area. There were reasons also which operated very strongly in large towns which made this Bill most desirable, and his constituents in Bradford had urged him to support it.

never induce an English jury to convict any one brought before them for subscribing to such a society.

SIR JOHN WALSH said, he thought it would be extremely difficult for the Government to interfere with advantage in the matter, or to institute a prosecution against the society. But the Government might interfere in an indirect manner—by the more open and decided expression of their opinion in that House against a course of conduct and policy on the part of private individuals which seemed likely, if it became general, to involve the country in great difficulties with foreign Powers. The tendency of that and all similar proceedings was to compromise the character of the country, and render England unpopular on the Continent. A great moral responsibility, therefore, rested on persons who set up this sort of private society to carry on a kind of buccaneering expedition. He trusted that they would succeed in eliciting from the Government some strong expression of disapprobation of that kind of private war-making. It was in itself a breach of the common law of the country, it led to a breach of the law of nations, and might mix up the country in a foreign struggle which it might be our wish and policy to avoid. Suppose a society of the same kind was to arise for the purpose of taking a part one way or the other in the delicate and difficult questions now at issue on the other side of the Atlantic. In the present state of exasperated feeling against this country which at the present moment existed so causelessly in the Northern States, what would be said if a society, headed by a Member of Parliament, and containing other representatives of the people among its members, evinced a disposition to interfere on one side or the other? Why, such a society would defeat the whole policy of the Government, and probably plunge the country into a disastrous war. A course of conduct which would be wrong in that case was equally objectionable in the present instance. A policy of non-intervention in Italy was, he believed, the policy of England, and individuals were bound to concur in that general policy.

MR. CRAUFURD said, he did not suppose that the House would follow the course which it was now called on to take; and if the society to which he had the honour of belonging was so heinous in its character, the proper course of proceeding would be that which the law pointed out. The hon. Member for Honiton (Mr. Cochrane) drew attention to a particular society, and asked the House to pledge itself to an abstract Resolution, which impliedly seemed to impute revolutionary designs to that society. The hon. Member, however, had stated no facts against the society, and, if the hon. Member had, he would not have entered upon his defence in that House, for it was not his duty to implicate the House in any expression of feeling, either of sympathy or otherwise, with reference to the policy which as a private member of society he thought proper to pursue. He felt grateful to the hon. Member for having so effectually advertised the society while laying no ground whatever for a Resolution condemnatory of it. He believed that the House would not be willing to entertain the suggestion made by the hon. Member, in language so vague and general that, if affirmed, it could lead to no practical result.

MR. HENLEY said, that if the Amendment moved by the hon. Member for Honiton were not withdrawn the House would be placed by it in rather a curious position. Hon. Members had listened to a speech and had heard an advertisement read, but he could not connect the Amendment with either one or the other. The few lines of which the Amendment consisted appeared to express something very like a truism, and he did not know whether the Government meant to negative that truism.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL explained that the Government would vote in favour of the question that the words proposed to be left out of the original Motion—namely, that the Speaker leave the chair—should stand part of the question.

MR. HENLEY observed that that was a way of getting rid of the difficulty by a sort of side-wind, but it was very like negating a truism. In the existing state of things in the world he certainly did not think that it would be a very convenient course to negative a proposition such as that before the House, but upon the whole he thought it would be a good thing if it could be got rid of by a side-wind, in consequence of the way in which the question would be put.

MR. MALINS said, he concurred with the hon. Member for Radnorshire (Sir John Walsh) that there was great inconvenience in the establishment of societies of the description referred to. He much regretted, therefore, that his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General should last year have given it as his opinion that such societies were not absolutely illegal. He was glad to find that his hon. and learned Friend, who was undoubtedly a year older, had also become wiser, and had found out that it was no part of his duty to answer abstract principles of law. His sympathies were strong with the Italians in their attempt to maintain their liberties; but he supported the principle of the strictest non-intervention in these matters. He asked, however, if societies were formed to collect subscriptions to aid particular parties struggling in a foreign country, whether it could be said that strict neutrality was preserved in this country? Supposing such things to be permitted, societies might be established here avowing themselves the respective partizans of the American Northern and Southern States, and the result might be a struggle between the contending parties in this country. If the present proposition went to a vote he felt it would be impossible to negative a truism; and he thought the course suggested by the noble Lord would be the proper course to adopt, but he trusted that the hon. Member for Honiton (Mr. Cochrane) would not insist on going to a division. The best way to avoid all misconception on the subject was, he thought, that his hon. Friend should withdraw his Motion.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL, in explanation, said it was a mistake to suppose that he had at any time pronounced an opinion in public as to the legality or illegality of such societies as those in question.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he would withdraw his Motion in deference to the general feeling of the House.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I wish to take this opportunity of calling the attention of the House to the present state of public business, and in doing so hon. Members will not, I trust, think I am unduly interfering with the course of that business which stands for this evening on the paper. We are now come to the 28th of June, and there remain, I believe, 200 Votes in Supply yet to be disposed of, besides which there are a great many Bills of considerable importance, and which it would be very undesirable to drop owing to the circumstance that the House had not sufficient time to deal with them, still awaiting our consideration. So far as the Votes in Supply are concerned it is not, of course, for the Government to suggest to hon. Members the expediency of suppressing any observations which they may deem it to be their duty to make whenever the rules of the House admit of their doing so, but I would at the same time remind them that each of the last two Votes in Supply occupied the greater portion of an entire evening, and that if it should be thought necessary to discuss the remaining 200 Votes at equal length, a considerable amount of time must obviously elapse before we can bring our labours in Supply to a close. Now, the only conclusion which I wish to draw from that statement is, that when the Motion that you, Sir, leave the Chair in order that the House may go into Committee of Supply is made, it would be desirable—except, perhaps, on Fridays, for of those days I will not say anything, inasmuch as they are avowedly set apart for those amateur discussions in which we hebdomadally indulge—that hon. Members should refrain from interposing Motions except they happen to relate to matters of really urgent importance or are of a nature which may reasonably be expected to lead to some practical result. Mere statements of opinion on general questions it would, I think, be for the advantage of the public business, on those occasions, as far as possible to avoid. I may add that there are now lying on the table Bills of great public utility which it would be very undesirable that we should not pass this Session, and if, owing to protracted discussions on going into Committee of Supply, those Bills should be thrown over to a very late period of the Session, many hon. Members will complain—and not, perhaps, without some reason—that they are called upon to deliberate upon important measures at a time when the attendance in the House is small, when those who are interested in the business under discussion are away, and they will in all probability urge on the Government the postponement of those measures to another year. That course being, as a matter almost of necessity adopted, the House of Commons as a body, and the Government as forming part of it, are reproached with having done nothing, and with having allowed the Session to go by without passing any measure of great public utility. That, however, is, in my opinion, a reproach which is very often unjust so far as the Government are con-earned, and which is not, I think, quite fair as far as regards the House of Commons in the aggregate. Hon. Members will, I trust, excuse the liberty which I have taken in making these suggestions, and will be as sparing as possible in the exercise of their privilege to raise discussions upon the Motion for going into Committee of Supply.

Mr. BLACK said, he was of opinion that the noble Lord had not made the observations which had just fallen from him one day too early; and, as an example of the necessity for adopting the advice they contained, he might refer to the inconvenience to which he, as well as other hon. Members was subjected, by the circumstance that public business of importance was not proceeded with—owing to the interposition of Motions on every variety of subject—in the order in which it was set down on the notice paper. That very evening no less than fifteen such Motions stood in the way of the House going into Committee of Supply, while upon the last occasion on which the order for Supply stood at the head of the list a single Motion, the discussion of which occupied five mortal hours, but ended like a flash in the pan, intervened to the detriment of the public business, while a most important measure, the Scotch Industrial Schools Bill, could not be brought on until just a quarter of an hour before midnight. Now, he had heard it advanced as a charge against the Government that they did not take steps to keep a House on those occasions; but he could quite understand how it was that hon. Members kept away in the early part of the evening when they knew that the really important business set down for consideration was not likely to come on until an advanced hour of the night. There, were, he might add, on the 21st ult., twenty-nine Motions on the paper on going into Committee of Supply, of which eleven stood in the names of Irish Members—a fact which showed how zealous they were in the discharge of their Parliamentary duties. He trusted, however, the remarks just made by the noble Lord would have some effect in making hon. Members somewhat more chary of bringing forward such Motions, while he would also express a hope that hon. Gentlemen would endeavour to compress their addresses to the House within as small a compass as possible.

Mr. VINCENT SCULLY said, he did not think that Irish Members had taken up any undue share of the time of the House. The noble Lord said that there were still 200 Votes of Supply to be taken. He (Mr. Scully) at the end of last Session gave notice of a Motion, which was placed on the records of Parliament, that all the Votes ought to be taken before the 1st of May, but he had not seen any attempt on the part of the Government to bring them forward. The noble Lord had, with his usual tact, selected the time for making the suggestions which had just fallen from him most admirably, seeing that while every word which he had uttered was sure to go forth to the public, there was not a single Member sitting on the front Opposition bench, and the only distinguished Member of the Opposition (Mr. Henley) present was actually walking out of the House. Indeed, the only undoubted supporters of the Conservative party upon whom the noble Lord on looking across the table could fix his gaze were the hon. and learned Member for Wallingford (Mr. Malins) and the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Ball), so that it might very fairly be said there lay before him a perfect vacuum. With such a prospect to encourage him the noble Lord was kind enough to concede to private Members the privilege of indulging themselves on Fridays, while the other days of the week he wished to absorb for Government business. As the Government did not support his Motion for inquiry into the evictions, the matter would have to be brought forward in another form. He had another very important notice to bring forward on going into Committee of Supply. It was to move for a Select Committee to inquire what was the best mode of securing authentic and accurate reports of the debates in the House. Nothing could be more ridiculous and absurd, for instance, than the reports in the morning papers of the debate on the Indian Bills last night. It was impossible to conceive anything more imperfect or contrary to what really occurred. That was clearly a very important subject, and he could not understand why the noble Viscount should wish to shirk a debate on it. In the absence of hon. Gentlemen opposite he protested against the suggestion that Members should give up their independent Motions, and allow the Government to do what they pleased.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, I hope the House will attend to the speech of my noble Friend, and not to that of the hon.

Member who has just spoken. I cannot help being struck with the great change which has taken place in the proceedings of this House, more especially in regard to Supply. It is, no doubt, the true constitutional doctrine that hon. Members have a right to discuss any matter of grievance, important questions of any internal or external policy, before going into Committee of Supply, but that principle has been employed in order to introduce abuses, which, I think, cannot be allowed to exist any longer. The very purpose of Supply is defeated by these interruptions. The hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. Williams) has said very often and very truly that there is nothing more important in this House than the Supplies by which all our great establishments are maintained, and which are the cause of the burdens which the country has to bear; but, if these questions do not come on till half-past eleven or half-past twelve at night, it is quite impossible that they can be discussed. The hon. Member for Lambeth and others who take an interest in these matters are either obliged to make speeches in an impatient House, or to give way to a Vote against which they have many reasons to allege. This is, perhaps, the most important business which the House has to perform, and yet it is entirely set aside, not in order to consider some important grievance or grave question of policy, involving possibly the existence of a Government, but in order to discuss some question of detail which might be brought forward on a notice day, and which probably is hardly worth the attention of the House at all. I have a very strong impression on my mind that, although the Committee which sat early in the Session did not think it desirable to recommend the change, the time will come when that good practice will be extended to Supply which prevails with regard to Bills; that, after the House has once gone into Committee on a Bill, when the Order of the Day is read, you, Sir, should immediately leave the Chair on the question of Progress. If the House knew that at five or six o'clock the Committee of Supply would come on, and that certain items would be considered, hon. Members would be in their places prepared to discuss them. Some process of that kind must certainly be adopted if the House means to maintain its character and to resort to its old mode of proceeding. There are days for notices when private Members can bring forward their Motions. There is another point of material importance which deserves to be mentioned—I mean the introduction of Supply at an early period of the Session. There are certain forms and proceedings which take up about ten days at the beginning of the Session, and which, according to an old constitutional maxim, require to be gone through before the House can deal with the Estimates. I think, however, that on the second day of the Session, on the Report of the Address, the House might pass the Resolution “that a Supply be granted to Her Majesty,” and that the Estimates might then be printed. The House having seen the Estimates would proceed to provide for them. I am persuaded that some thorough amendment of the present practice is required, not to introduce innovations, but to re-establish the old mode of proceeding.

LORD HOTHAM said, he entirely concurred with the noble Lord at the head of the Government in lamenting the state of the public business during the present Session. The remedy he had to propose had, in the main, been anticipated by the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary—it was that immediately on the meeting of Parliament the Estimates should be laid on the table. If the House thought it desirable that the Estimates should be proceeded with earlier than usual, there would, he apprehended, be no difficulty in accommodating the constitutional forms to which the noble Lord had referred to so beneficial an arrangement. At present the first ten days or fortnight of the Session were always completely wasted, and the Army and Navy Estimates were not commenced till near Easter, when the renewal of the Mutiny Bill rendered it necessary that certain Votes should be passed; and, having got the large Votes, the Government allowed the consideration of the small to be set aside for other business. The result was that when the remaining Estimates were brought forward, there was no possibility of procuring the attendance of those Members who ought to be present when they were discussed. He had never heard any reason why the Estimates should not be presented on the meeting of Parliament. That would be certainly more convenient for the Government, as the attendance of Members would be comparatively small, and the Votes would be passed with less delay. It was said that much delay was caused by Motions upon going into Committee of Supply. At the commencement of a Session hon. Members wishing to make Motions naturally expected that opportunities for making them would be afforded, but, as the Session advanced there was great difficulty in bringing on Motions upon the regular days, and thus Members were driven to the necessity of making them on going into Committee of Supply. Having regard to the desirableness of getting through the Estimates at an early period of the Session, and at the same time looking at the importance of allowing opportunities for a full discussion of them, and further considering that nothing tended so much to delay the general progress of business as the uncertainty which prevailed as to the precise time when particular business would be taken; upon all these grounds the question was well deserving of attention whether some arrangement should not be made for improving the mode of conducting business in that House. With respect to another part of what had fallen from the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary, he must say he should view with great jealousy any attempt to curtail those opportunities for discussion of which every Member had a right to avail himself. The time might come when some such step must be taken, but he should be adverse to adopting a new rule which might abridge the safeguards possessed by a minority against an overbearing majority of the House, unless the most absolute and imperative necessity could be shown for it.

MR. WHITE thought the time had arrived when the House would be compelled to assent to a curtailment of what were called the privileges of the House, and to allow the allocation of one day for the purposes of Supply. He regretted to say that, judging from the experience he had had of the temper of the House, and the flood of talk with which they were deluged, he despaired that either of the recommendations of the noble Lords would have the effect of abolishing what had become an acknowledged nuisance. Those who, like himself, were constant in their attendance in the House felt as irksome, and, indeed, intolerable, the opportunity which the Motion for going into Supply afforded for the utterance of much that was neither useful nor creditable to that House. If it should happen that any event occurred which would render it necessary that the attention of Parliament should be immediately directed to the subject, there could be no difficulty in suspending the Standing Order, which appropriated a special day for the purposes of Supply.

MR. E. BALL said, that the noble Viscount at the head of the Government had complained, and very properly, that there was so much matter not immediately connected with the business of the House before it, that the effect was to retard its progress, and thereby to inflict injury on the public service. The hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Vincent Scully) had also complained that those (the Conservative) benches were generally nearly empty. If that complaint were true, it only proved that they, at all events, did not cause delay, and they stood completely exonerated from the complaint made by the noble Lord. The hon. Gentleman who had just sat down despaired of any remedy being found for the evil of which the House complained. Now, there were two very simple remedies which be applied. If the ordinary mediums of communication between that House and the public would occasionally give to the country verbatim reports of the speeches delivered, not polished up, without giving sense to that in which there was no meaning, without adapting to the rules of grammar all that was ungrammatical, they would put a damper upon those hon. Gentlemen who were notoriously guilty of occupying much time in an unprofitable manner. He would also suggest that any hon. Member speaking in a debate should be compelled to remain in the House until the debate was closed. The Conservative Members of that House had not been inattentive to public business, as the division lists would show. Upon the various measures connected with the Budget they had omitted no opportunity of discussing those important matters, but when great items of expenditure were settled by the decision of the House, they did not conceive it to be necessary for them to attend continuously to discuss details for which the Government were responsible. Indeed, it was impossible for them to do so when they were required to serve upon Committees, which, instead of affording—as was sometimes believed out of doors—large emoluments, only occupied their time and increased their labour.

THE SUEZ CANAL.—EXPLANATION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he rose to explain a misapprehension which had arisen as to some observations which he made a few nights ago upon this subject. He then stated that one of the objections urged by the noble Lord at the head of the Government against the canal was that it would give foreign nations a start on the road to our Indian possessions. He had in a public journal been accused of having, in making that statement, misrepresented the noble Lord. To clear himself from that imputation he would read a statement made by the noble Lord on the 7th of July, 1857, which was to the following effect:—

"In a political point of view it is objectionable regards England, especially in connection with our Indian possessions; for it is plain that if a great canal were cut from the Mediterranean to the Red Sea there are other naval Powers with which we may have difficulties, which would have a very important start as compared with ourselves with regard to any operation that might be undertaken in the Indian Seas."—[3 Hansard, cxlvi. 1706.]

Main Question put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

House in Committee, Mr. MASSEY in the Chair.

(In the Committee.)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £261,014, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of the Educational and Scientific Branches, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1862, inclusive."

MR. G. W. HOPE said, he did not propose to enter into a discussion of the new plan of education to be pursued at Sandhurst, but it must be obvious to the Committee that if they granted money to carry out they would make themselves parties to the plan, and be responsible for it. They were, therefore, justly entitled to ask for full information, and he desired to know when papers would be produced, showing how the money voted would be expended?

MR. T. G. BARING said, the detailed regulations, which would show in every particular what the new system of education would be, were nearly completed, but had not been submitted to the Queen for Her approval. If approved they would be published, and laid before the House. That course would take only a few weeks, and when any hon. Gentleman who objected to the arrangements would have an opportunity of calling the attention of the Government to his objections.

MR. G. W. HOPE said, he desired to know whether the hon. Gentleman would give a pledge that the money voted the other night should not be expended in the meantime?

MR. T. G. BARING said, that on a former occasion he offered to do so if the House would follow the course he then proposed. It refused to agree to his proposition, and he was now not prepared to give any such pledge.

MR. MONSELL asked why the age at which cadets were to be admitted to Woolwich had been altered?

MR. T. G. BARING said, that in accordance with the opinion of the Committee of Council on Military Education, the maximum age at which cadets could be received into the College had been fixed at nineteen instead of twenty years as formerly.

MR. MONSELL, with great respect for the Council on Military Education, must say he differed very much with them. The system hitherto had been entirely successful. It was notorious that the Universities were great feeders of the Military Academy, but the change of the maximum age from twenty to nineteen would practically shut out young men at the Universities, and he understood there had been a strong protest from Cambridge on the subject. The subject had been brought before the House of Commons some four or five years before, and the House refused by its vote to agree to the change now made by the Government, and he believed there had been something like a pledge on the subject. He believed it was an effort on the part of the Government to defeat the new system of examinations, and he for one protested strongly against a course which would lead to disastrous results.

MR. T. G. BARING said, he would promise to consider the subject. He was not aware that any pledge had been given by the present Government.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES—ROYAL HIBERNIAN MILITARY SCHOOL.

MR. MAGUIRE said, I am most anxious, Mr. Massey, to spare the time of the House as much as possible, and personally to avoid making an undue trespass upon its attention; but I feel convinced that it will be felt that I have good and substantial reasons for bringing forward the subject of which I have given notice. It is one which involves a great principle, affecting the feelings and interests of all classes of the people of Ireland. We have been promised that sometime in July we shall have the Return of the Census for Ireland; but until that document is placed on the table, and that it exhibits to the contrary of what I believe to be the case, I am justified in asserting, on the authority of the last census in which the different religious denominations were set forth, that Ireland is still a Catholic country—that four-fifths, or, at the very least, three-fourths of the population are of the Catholic faith. The army of the United Kingdom is largely recruited from Ireland; and in the numbers supplied by Ireland, as her contribution to the army, it will be found that they fairly represent the religious belief of her people. Thus, that at least three-fourths are Catholic, while but one-fourth are Protestant or Presbyterian—that, in fact, in the ranks of the Irish soldiers the same preponderance of Catholics over Protestants prevails as among the civil population. Now it certainly ought to be the policy of the Government to conciliate the people from whom they draw so large a proportion of their military resources in the hour of emergency; and I need scarcely say, in the presence of several gallant Officers, that which they well know, and could bear willing testimony to, that the Irish soldier has ever been found foremost in the post of danger, and in the hottest of the fight, in all those great battles which have enhanced the glory of this country. Those who themselves have breasted the tide of battle can bear testimony to the fidelity and valour of the Irish soldier. Now, the Royal Hibernian Military School, in Dublin, was established for the education and protection of the orphans of Irish soldiers. From a Return for which I moved early in this Session, I find that on the 26th of February, 1861, the number of boys in this school was 410. Were one to judge by the number of Catholic Irishmen, when compared to Protestant Irishmen, in the army, one would naturally suppose that the proportion of Catholic and Protestant boys in this school would nearly represent the proportion of Catholic and Protestant soldiers. But what will be thought when I state, on the authority of the Return I hold in my hand, that the number of Protestant boys was, at the date I mention, 278, while the number of Catholic boys was only 132? Thus, the relative proportions within the school were then, and are now, exactly the reverse of those which existed outside of it. And this proportion seems to have been strictly maintained; so that while there were, at the very least, three, or say two, Catholic soldiers for every one Protestant soldier in the army, there were in this school two Protestant orphans of Protestant soldiers for every one Catholic orphan of a Catholic soldier. How is this anomalous state of things to be explained? How does it act? When the poor widow of some Catholic soldier, who has died in defence of the honour and interests of this country, applies to have her orphan child admitted to this school—this school established for the education, care, and succour of the orphans of those who have given their life and blood for the glory of this empire—she is told there are no vacancies for Catholic boys, although there are, or might be, vacancies for Protestant boys. Poverty, necessity, and desperation are sad tempters, and the unfortunate Catholic mother has been induced to sacrifice her strong religious feelings, and consent to have her orphan child entered as a Protestant, because there were no other means of securing his admission. But suppose no case of this kind had ever occurred, such a temptation ought not to be held out. But let us see in what manner the staff of this establishment is constituted to which is confided the education of 132 Catholic boys. The entire number of persons holding offices or employments of all kinds, from the highest to the lowest grade, is 69; and while every one holding a post of any rank, authority, or influence, is a Protestant, none but the situations of the most subordinate and even menial kind are given to Roman Catholics. Out of the sixty-nine officials in this list but nine are Catholics. Let us see what offices these nine Catholics hold. The first is the “Officiating Catholic clergyman,” a non-resident, and who only visits the institution. Then there is an assistant-sergeant; then a sergeant-gardener; then an assistant-shoemaker; then an assistant-tailor; then a hospital servant; then a woman in charge of the schoolrooms; then a ploughman; and lastly, a farm labourer. But, on the other hand, all those in command, all the masters and teachers, all who have authority or who possess influence, are Protestants. I ask, is this fair and equitable, and whether there is still to be a ban placed upon Catholics in a Catholic country? A Catholic soldier surely has as good a right as a Protestant soldier has to have his orphan child educated and taken care of by the State, as well as protected from the base and insidious arts of proselytiser. Not only is the state of things in this institution bad of itself, as I shall show, but it works evil in other ways. This system produces the most pernicious fruits, through its influence and example. The Government seems to sanction a proselytising school—a school, at least, in which all the influences tend in that direction; and why, therefore, should not schools supported by private resources adopt the same? Thus, from this Government institution flows a poisoned stream which is conducted through the country in a hundred different channels, disseminating a noxious influence, fatal to Christian concord, and keeping alive those evil passions which, as an Irishman, I wish from my heart were banished from my country. Now as to its immediate results. I find, by a Return laid before this House, and ordered on the 10th of May, 1854, that in the preceding four years no fewer than seventeen boys had changed their religion, and become Protestants; and, in addition to this fact, I state that in the month of February, 1858, as many as five Catholic boys declared their intention of becoming Protestants. Two of these boys were under fourteen years of age. Now, I can easily understand how it is that a man changes his religion, and adopts a different faith; but how a boy, a mere child, so situated could do so, except under the influence of his superiors, I cannot well conceive. But I freely admit that a Catholic boy of this tender age must be singularly precocious, or wonderfully strong in his faith, if he resisted the Protestant influences of such an institution. In this school the teachers are Protestant, the books are Protestant, the very atmosphere is Protestant ["Oh, oh!"]—yes, the very air they breathe is Protestant, and every influence that is brought to bear upon these helpless and unprotected boys is antagonistic to their faith. I, of course, prefer that these boys should grow up and remain Catholics; but it would be better that they should grow up good Protestants than bad Catholics—that they should have some faith than no faith at all. And is not the system adopted just that which has a tendency to make them infidels?—which, in my mind, is the most fatal as well as degrading condition to which the human being can fall. The Catholic clergymen tells them that their religion is the true religion; but their Protestant school-books and their Protestant teachers are constantly telling them the contrary. All that is respectable, that is to be admired, that is to be emulated, is Protestant; whereas all that is Catholic is low, and to be despised. What can the Catholic priest do against fifteen Protestant teachers, and against the moral influence of this intensely Protestant institution? The principal books used in this school are the same books which have been condemned by the Catholic Bishops of Ireland, and these are taught to Catholic boys by Protestant teachers. Is it too much to ask that these 132 boys should have fair play—that they should be allowed to grow up strong and secure in their faith—that which would one day be their solace and support and their best protection in the hour of trial and temptation? I contend that they should have Catholic teachers, and that, in a word, fair play should be given to those Catholic boys. Above all, their faith should be protected, which is not the case at present. I said that the whole atmosphere of the place is Protestant; and this statement cannot be better illustrated than by reference to the case which the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of Ireland told me the other night, in answer to my question, was under investigation—I mean that of an orderly-sergeant named Harrison, who being very ill, and feeling himself on his death-bed expressed a wish, through his wife, to see the Catholic clergyman. The Catholic clergyman would not visit the sick man without the sanction of the authorities, but that sanction was refused to him. He proposed that the Protestant clergyman, with himself, and some one in authority should visit the sick man, and that he should be asked which of the two clergymen he desired to see; but this fair proposal was rejected. The wife became more pressing and urgent in her application that her husband might be allowed to see the Catholic clergyman in his dying moments; but the resident authorities would not consent to the admission of the priest. At length, after travelling for hours about Dublin, the priest finally procured an order from the General commanding the district, to be admitted. Armed with this order he again went to the institution. He presented the order, which was taken to the resident officer in command; but the priest was left at the door for an hour and twenty minutes, and in the meantime, or rather ten minutes before the priest was admitted, the poor man died, no clergyman, Protestant or Catholic, having been present while he breathed his last. [Cries of "Hear, hear!"] This, then, is the institution in which 132 Catholic boys are educated at the expense of the State—and this the institution in which the religious faith of the orphan children of Catholic soldiers is so carefully protected. I do respectfully solicit the noble Lord at the head of the Government, and the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland, to look into this case, and to see that, for the future at least, these Catholic boys are properly attended to. An expression of honest opinion on their part would have a most useful influence on the school; and it was with the intention of bringing the matter fully before their notice, as well as to the attention of the House, that I brought forward the subject—which, I trust, I have dealt with in a fair spirit. The hon. Gentleman concluded by asking for explanations with respect to the constitution and character of the staff of the establishment referred to, "having relation to the religious faith of the boys educated therein."

MR. VANCE said, he wished to say a very few words on the subject, although he had had no opportunity of referring to the authorities of the Hibernian School. The Government had the means of doing so, and, no doubt, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland would be enabled to give an ample answer to the hon. Member. The question, he believed, had been brought forward in consequence of a pastoral of Dr. Cullen, and the return to which it led ought never to have been granted. The whole affair was part and parcel of that system of Roman Catholic aggression which was going on in Ireland, and which he feared was too much sanctioned by the Government. This Return was the first that had ever been granted in such a form—giving the religious persuasion of the officers and inmates of schools and hospitals in Ireland. It had been placed on the paper when the Earl of Derby was in power, but was refused in accordance with immemorial usage. If Returns of this kind were allowed it would be most unjust, according to the argument of the hon. Gentleman, to allow the majority of the heads of any establishment to be of one religion while those inferior to them were of another. He might call for a Return of the Bar of Ireland and the Judges of Ireland with reference to their religion, and it might be found that of the Bar three-fourths were Protestant, and of the Judges eight out of the twelve were Roman Catholic. Such Returns would be extremely invidious. This particular school was founded in the time of the Irish Parliament. It was an exclusively Protestant institution. In 1841 no Roman Catholics, either as teachers or boys, were allowed. That rule was then relaxed, and very properly; but it was relaxed with considerable difficulty, because there were very large bequests made for exclusively Protestant purposes. He did not think there was much reason to complain when in the interval which had elapsed they found there were 132 Roman Catholic boys to 278 Protestants. He also understood, from a friend who knew a great deal about the school, that all the Roman Catholic boys attended service in Chapel Izod up till 1851, and after that a Roman Catholic chaplain, at a salary of £80 a year, was appointed. He believed that no attempt at proselytism had ever been sanctioned, and the military officers at the head of the establishment were not at all likely to lend themselves to such proceedings, as it was well known that of all men military officers were most free from religious prejudice or sectarianism.

MR. T. G. BARING said, it was necessary, in the first instance, to explain that Her Majesty's Government had no power whatever over the Hibernian Military School, which was governed by Commissioners appointed under a Royal Charter. He felt bound to say, however, that in a school where there was so large a proportion of Catholic boys, it was a remarkable fact that the main part of the officials should be Protestant, and he thought the Commissioners would exercise a wise discretion if they were to give a certain number of the appointments to Roman Catholics, provided they could find suitable persons. But, as the religious instruction was entirely conducted by chaplains of the respective denominations, it was difficult to see how the purely secular education imparted in the school could have any injurious effect. The Charter of 1846 contained precautions against interference of any kind with the religious opinions of the pupils. The statements of the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Maguire) were in substance the same as those contained in the pamphlet published in 1858 by Archbishop Cullen. The case which he had put of a widow compelled to sacrifice the religious belief of her child to procure him admission to the school was embodied nearly in the same words in that pamphlet; and Colonel Colomb felt it only due to the character of the school to call on the Archbishop to name the particular instance. On inquiry, it was found that Robert Anderson, the boy alluded to, was the son of a private soldier in the Royal Artillery who was married in the Protestant church of St. Michael's, Limerick, and that the boy himself had been baptized a Protestant. According to the rules of the institution, he was entered in the religion of his father, and the mother, who was a Roman Catholic, not only made no remonstrance, but two of the boy's sisters had previously been in the same school. The sequel of the story was rather remarkable. The mother, who was at service in Dublin, came to the school and asked to be allowed to take the boy out for a day, but from that period he was lost sight of. His sisters, who were Protestants, made strong representations on the subject, knowing that the mother had no means of providing for the boy, to the effect that he had been taken away to be brought up in the Roman Catholic religion. So that, so far from its having been necessary, as represented, for a Roman Catholic child to change his religion to gain admittance to the school, the fact was that a child whose father was a Protestant and who himself had been baptized in that religion was taken away from the school, it was supposed with the object of being reared a Roman Catholic. So far from any proportion being observed in the admission of children of different religions, he had the most distinct assurance that they were admitted entirely according to the claims of their fathers. Those boys were first taken in who had no parents; next, those who had lost their fathers; and then those who had lost their mothers, their fathers being abroad. The small proportion of Roman Catholic children was not much to be wondered at, when two very strong pamphlets against the institution had been written by right rev. gentlemen, the tone of which was anything but encouraging to Roman Catholic soldiers to send their children to the school. Of course, when such numbers of boys were constantly passing through the school, it was impossible that changes of religion should not sometimes occur; but the strongest possible orders had been given against proselytism. The five boys named by the hon.

Member for Dungarvan were not only cautioned against the step they were about to take, but were compelled to consult the priest and their own friends and companions. Three were of an age at which they could voluntarily alter their registry; the other two were not entered as Protestants till the priest wrote to say that, in consequence of the scandal which the public declaration of their intentions had given rise to, he could no longer permit them to attend his ministry. The Roman Catholic chaplain, the Rev. Mr. Kelch, appeared to be acting in perfect harmony with the governor of the school; and had any attempt been made at proselytising the children, the person making it could not fail to have been exposed. On the contrary, it appeared from the letter of Mr. Kelch that there was not only the fullest opportunity for instructing the boys in the principles of their religion, but the greatest facilities were also given for all the services of the Church. Judging from all the information he had received, he did not believe that any encouragement was given to the conversion of Roman Catholic children in the school. If such encouragement were given it would be perfectly inexcusable, and deserving of the severest reprobation. He thought it was a pity that more Roman Catholics were not employed in the management of the school; but, with that exception, he was persuaded there was no just ground of complaint. The school was governed with impartiality, and the children sent to it received, and would continue to receive, a good education.

MR. LONGFIELD said, he would not go into the question of proselytising. He believed that what was gained in one way was lost in another, and, except when the minds of men were profoundly agitated, he always had a suspicion of cases of conversion. His object in rising was to repel the charge of illiberality which had been brought against the Hibernian Military School. There was no institution against which such an accusation could be brought with less justice. The Hibernian Military School was founded as an exclusively Protestant institution, for the education of children in the Protestant religion, and yet the trustees had voluntarily extended the benefits of the charity to the children of Roman Catholic parents. They might have retained the charity exclusively for the benefit of the members of their own religion, but they had, in a most liberal spirit, consented to throw it open to Roman Catholics; and the only complaint that could be made against them was that they had kept a portion of the foundation for themselves in a case in which they might have retained the whole. He challenged any hon. Member to show that Roman Catholic trustees of an educational institution had ever practised the same liberality towards Protestants.

MR. MONSELL said, he was astonished at the remarks of the hon. and learned Member who had just sat down. The Hibernian Military School was supported by the State to the extent of £12,000 a year, and it could not be regarded in the light of a private trust. Everybody agreed that children should be brought up in the religion of their parents. Was that principle adopted in the Hibernian Military School? The hon. Under Secretary for War had satisfactorily explained the case of the five children who changed their religion. It must be admitted that everything was done with perfect fairness, but why was the atmosphere of the school such as to induce these young children to change their religion? The reason was that, in an institution where a large number of the children were Roman Catholics, all the superior officers were Protestants. A Roman Catholic soldier could not wish his children to be given up to Protestant schoolmasters and schoolmistresses; and the House could not do better than refuse to vote any more money unless they found that the institution was properly conducted. He begged of the noble Lord at the head of the Government, who took such an interest in the army, to declare that a grievous injustice, which would not be tolerated in the case of Protestants, should not be allowed to exist in that of Roman Catholics.

MR. CARDWELL said, it was quite true that the Hibernian Military School was originally a Protestant institution, and the degrees by which it had become available for the benefit of Roman Catholics had been gradual and recent. But he agreed with his right hon. Friend who had just said that, whatever might have been the origin of the institution, it was now to be regarded as a public establishment maintained for the general benefit of the Queen's Irish subjects serving Her in the field. He believed it to be perfectly true that the institution was an excellent one, in which the children of Roman Catholic, as well as those of Protestant soldiers, received a good education, and in which proselytism was strictly interdicted. Roman Catholics were educated twice a week under the special care of their own chaplain, and provision was made for securing that freedom and liberty of conscience which it was the principle of Parliament to provide for in every institution of the kind. At the same time he must express his cordial concurrence in the wish uttered by his hon. Friend the Under Secretary for War, that when vacancies occurred in the establishment such a selection of officers would be made as would show regard to the feelings of all classes of the community. With regard to the case referred to of a private soldier who was supposed to be a Protestant, but whose wife applied to the Roman Catholic chaplain to attend him in his last moments, and experienced, as it was called, a want of facility and kindness in procuring such attention, he could not say much at present, having only seen the one-sided statement which had been submitted to his noble Friend, and upon which an inquiry was about to be instituted. But it appeared that the very moment Sir George Browne heard that the man was desirous of obtaining the services of the Roman Catholic chaplain, he gave immediate directions that his wishes on the subject should be ascertained and carried into effect; but the man died before a Roman Catholic chaplain could be taken to him. Inquiry would be instituted, and if it should turn out that there had been a want of consideration or kindness on the part of any officer of the establishment, measures would be taken to prevent the recurrence of anything of the kind in future.

COLONEL NORTH asked whether the professor of military hygiene at Chatham was to be selected from the medical department of the army or not? He referred to some papers to show that military medical officers were alive to the necessity of sanitary measures for preserving the health of the troops before the time when attention was called to that subject by medical gentlemen not connected with the army.

MR. HENNESSY said, that he would remind the hon. and learned Member for Mallow (Mr. Longfield), that the Reports of the Charity Commissioners and of the Commissions on Universities showed that enormous Roman Catholic charities had been appropriated to Protestant purposes, and that, too, without the consent of those who might be supposed entitled to a voice in their appropriation. The Hibernian School was an institution for the children of Irish soldiers. The majority of the Irish soldiers were Roman Catholics, but the majority of the children in this school were Protestants. Out of sixty-nine officers of the institution, including all the more important, sixty were Protestants, and only nine were Roman Catholics. He should be glad to receive from the Government an assurance that, as vacancies occurred, a fairer distribution of the patronage would take place.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he would move a reduction of £1,000 from the item for the Hibernian School. He did this in order to prevent any military ruse for diverting attention from this subject. The hon. and learned Member for Mallow (Mr. Longfield) had asked where was there an instance of such liberality on the part of Roman Catholics? He (Mr. Scully) would tell him. There was not a chance of a Roman Catholic being returned for any constituency in England, and yet the Roman Catholics of Ireland returned Protestants to that House, not to defend Roman Catholic interests, but to defend Protestant interests against them. The hon. and learned Member ought to have been the last to tax the Roman Catholics with illiberality: they had returned him an Ultramontane Protestant, if he might use the term—a man who had come down to defend the Derryveagh evictions, as he had done the other night. The hon. and learned Member had an instance of Catholic liberality in his own person. While a third of the children in the institution were Roman Catholics—there ought to be two-thirds—there was not a single officer in it a Roman Catholic. He might illustrate this system of exclusion by an instance taken from the Select Committee of the working of the Irish poor law.

MR. STAFFORD NORTHCOTE rose to order.

MR. MASSEY said, that the hon. Gentleman was out of order in referring to what had taken place in a Select Committee which had not then made its Report.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, that since he was precluded from illustrating his subject he would merely add that it was the fault of the Roman Catholics themselves. Why, when they saw those consequences before them, did they enter the British service at all? They knew if their children ever entered those institutions they would be proselytised. He would move his Amendment, in order to allow hon. Members to express their opinions.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That the item of £13,565 18s. 4d., for the Royal Hibernian Military School, be reduced by the amount of £1,000.”

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, that the whole of the discussion appeared to have arisen from the mistake made by Dr. Cullen, in supposing that the school was intended entirely for the children of Irish soldiers. The school was, however, founded for the children of soldiers in Ireland, and when there was a larger proportion of Protestant soldiers in Ireland the number of Protestant children proportionably increased. In the case of the alleged proselytism of the boy Anderson, a board of officers was called together composed of the ten senior officers who were in the garrison of Dublin at the time. The cases of alleged proselytism were two. In 1858 five Roman Catholic boys wished to become Protestants. It was proved that the boys were in the habit of going to see their friends in the city, and that they were converted not within but without the walls of the school. The rule was that boys above fourteen were allowed to change their religion, and as three of these boys were above fourteen, the governor had nothing to say. The other two were not allowed to become Protestants, and were sent to their chaplain. The second case referred to of a Roman Catholic boy being converted was just the reverse, for it was a Protestant boy, who, going out on leave, was met on his road and had never been heard of since. Whether the servants of the college were Protestants or Roman Catholic was not a matter to which the governors looked.

MR. WALDRON said, he confessed he heard the statement made by the hon. and learned Member for Mallow with some surprise. It seemed to him strange that in a Catholic country like Ireland, and in an institution supposed to be mainly intended for the instruction of children belonging to the Catholic faith, that none of the officers should be members of that faith. He would certainly support the Amendment.

MR. LONGFIELD explained that he did not complain of Roman Catholics seeking to get the benefit of the institution. What he said was that there was no institution in Ireland of which it could be said with less justice that it acted illiberally, for it was an essentially Protestant institution, built and endowed up to 1846 by Protestants, when the archbishops and bishops who were trustees voluntarily surrendered their exclusive privileges. As for what had been said about himself personally by the hon. Member for Cork, he would acknowledge his obligations to his Roman Catholic supporters most unhesitatingly; but those Roman Catholics would despise him if, where he thought an unjust accusation was made, he were to yield to any fears of their displeasure, and not stand up and refute it.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH observed that last year the item amounted to £12,348, while in the present year the sum asked for was £13,563. He wished to know the reason of the increase?

MR. T. G. BARING stated that the increase in the Vote was in a great measure owing to the increase in the price of provisions.

MR. MAGUIRE, in reply, said, that he hoped the hon. Member for Cork would withdraw his Amendment, as it was not his (Mr. Maguire's) intention to deprive the institution of one farthing of the sum proposed. He denied what had been implied, if not asserted, that Catholic members were the mere puppets of their clergy, and said that the charge was not only untrue, but specially unfair when they had to condemn or expose a real grievance. It was quite true that Dr. Cullen, whom he unfeignedly respected, had ably exposed the state of the Hibernian School; but was it because a Catholic prelate addressed the Irish public on a matter of grave importance, that, therefore, a Catholic Member should not feel interested in the question, enquire into it, and bring it before Parliament? But when the Secretary for Ireland and the Under Secretary for War endeavoured to show that there was no such rule as that of limiting the number of Catholic children to one-third, he would say that in 1858 the number of Protestant children was 238; that of the Catholic 127. In 1861 the Protestant children were 278; the Catholics 132. As Catholic soldiers had shed their blood as liberally for their Queen and country he could not understand why they had not as good a claim as Protestants. He had been charged by the hon. and gallant Member for Harwich (Captain Jervis) with having brought forward isolated cases. Surely five cases in one month, and seventeen from 1850 to 1854, could not be said to be isolated cases. He relied upon these twenty-two cases as showing that the Protestant spirit of the establishment was prejudicial to the faith of the Catholic boys. Then as to there being no vacancy. There had been a vacancy lately, and a Catholic teacher was promised to him (Mr. Maguire); but, if he was rightly instructed, he was refused by the local authorities. If by next year they should find that substantial justice was not done, they should have to deal rather harshly with this Vote.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he wished to call attention to the salary of the Vice-president of the Council of Military Education, which was £1,000 a year; there were also three members at a salary of £600 a year each, one member whose salary was £485, and a secretary who received a salary of £400 a year. He should like to hear from the hon. Under Secretary for War the nature of the duties which these officers had to perform. He also wished to know what were the duties of schoolmistresses in connection with regiments. The soldiers, no doubt, had daughters, but he did not know that they were educated by schoolmistresses connected with the regiments.

COLONEL J. F. D. STUART explained that there were infant and other schools in all the garrison towns, and even in the camps at Aldershot, Shorncliffe, and elsewhere, and the superintendence of trained schoolmistresses was of great service to the children of the soldiers.

CAPTAIN JERVIS asked why the late circular which in the case of engineer officers dispensed with the necessity of passing through the Staff College at Sandhurst previous to holding Staff appointments should not be extended to artillery officers?

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, Artillery officers were as competent for employment on the Staff as the Engineers, and by the present system the authorities excluded men eminently qualified to serve as Staff officers. It was a very invidious distinction to keep from them the advantages enjoyed by the engineer officers.

MR. MONSELL said, he cordially concurred in the observation that it was a foolish and unwise course to allow such a distinction to exist.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH asked for some explanation as to the number of children who were really being educated in the military schools.

MR. T. G. BARING said, in 1858 there were 12,000 children in these schools. Since then the number had increased, but there were no very accurate returns. The Council of Military Education had the supervision of the department, and full details as to what had been done during the year would be found in a blue-book lately presented. As to the distinction between the Artillery and Engineer officers, he admitted that the grounds of that distinction were not very clearly defined, and that it was hardly warranted by the previous course of study of those two branches of the service. The attention of his noble Friend the Secretary for War would be called to the subject, but he wished to say that there had not been the least desire on the part of the War Office to draw any invidious distinction or to excite any jealousy between the Artillery and Engineers.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH called attention to the fact that the Governor of Woolwich Academy only received £500 a-year, while the Governor of Sandhurst received, very properly, £1,000 a year. They were both gentlemen of similar capacities and standing, and had duties equally onerous to perform. He did not think it was right such a distinction should be made in salaries. They ought to feel indebted to the Government for proposing Votes for the Engineer establishment at Chatham, as that institution had done much to raise the corps of Royal Engineers to its present state of efficiency. The Engineers were not justly liable to the imputation of incompetency, and he regretted to hear any observations tending to lower them in the estimation of the House. He was at a loss to understand who the persons were who had feathered their nest, as he was sure they were not the contractors, every one of whom had been ruined by undertaking the works at too low a price.

MR. W. WILLIAMS asked, whether the cadets at the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich paid as much as was sufficient to defray the expense of their education?

MR. T. G. BARING said, at page 107 of the Votes it would be seen that the receipts last year from the cadets had been £18,795 17s. 4d. The institution was not self-supporting, though it was nearly so. The amount received could not be taken into account for the reduction of the Vote, as it had to be paid into the Exchequer. With respect to the salary of the governor of Woolwich Academy it must be remembered that he received his full pay besides, while the governor of Sandhurst was not in receipt of his full pay.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, the governor of Sandhurst received an additional £1,000 a year for command of a battalion.

MR. WYLD called attention to the permanent character of the Votes for the survey. He did not find fault with the present management of the survey, as one of the most distinguished men in Europe was at the head of it. The Ordnance Survey commenced in 1784, and, including military pay, had cost upwards of £2,000,000. The area of England was 58,000 square miles, of Ireland 30,000, and of Scotland 33,000, making together 121,000 square miles. The area of France, including Corsica, was 201,000 square miles. France commenced her survey at the same time, and had completed one-third of it; she had completed nearly 100,000 square miles of the enlarged survey and one-third of the cadastral survey. The cost had been only about £1,200,000, and he could not account for the difference, except by the English survey having become a permanent department. At that moment a large portion of Scotland was unsurveyed, and he thought the House ought to require the Director of Ordnance to complete the whole survey of these islands before commencing any new work. He held that the expenditure for the topographical survey was an utter waste of public money. The topographical department entered into competition with private persons, and sold maps at less than cost price. He was afraid that the publication of some maps might lead to inconvenience, and, possibly, to political difficulties. Before the Italian war the Austrian Government had a new survey of Lombardy made, and refused to supply copies of the maps. But the topographical department made a private copy of the maps, and published them at 1s. a sheet. France could not get the maps from Austria, but the topographical department supplied the French Government with some 500 copies. He did not propose to reduce this Vote, but he wished to call attention to these facts.

MR. T. G. BARING said, he hoped that nothing would be done to prevent the topographical department reproducing maps which were of great use. When a map, which was not confidential, was published, it was sold through the mapsellers, and their interests were regarded by their having an allowance of 25 per cent. The map of Lombardy was of the greatest possible use to our officers, and if the French bought copies through some mapseller in London, it only proved that the topographical department of England was better than that of France.

MR. WYLD said, he did not understand what was meant by confidential maps. Within the last few days maps had been published, showing the fortifications of Fort Pickens and of Fort Monroe. With reference to the charge for the maps, the hydrographic department of the Admiralty charged more for their maps than the topographical department.

MR. T. G. BARING said, he could assure the hon. Gentleman that the maps were not sold at less than cost price.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) £24,300, Rewards for Military Services.

GENERAL LINDSAY observed, that he was well aware it was by no means an agreeable duty to select from the great body of officers who had served their country well the individual officers on whom rewards were conferred, but he wished to take that occasion to call the attention of the hon. Under Secretary for War to a class of men who were fast passing away, and who had rendered somewhat distinguished, and certainly very meritorious, services during what was called the revolutionary war. Those officers had in the course of time obtained high rank in the service, but they nevertheless were in receipt of no higher pay than belonged to their last regimental rank—that of captain and major. They had been placed on half-pay principally in 1826; their promotion took place to what was called the unattached list, and having been once placed upon that list the military authorities were unable to put them on full pay. The consequence was that they remained to that hour on half-pay, and he would under these circumstances ask the hon. Under Secretary for War whether, considering that those officers were very few in number, and those few fast dying out, he would not look favourably on the claims which they possessed to the notice of the Government? They were only about eighteen or twenty in number; they now held the rank of Generals; they counted on an average fifty-three years' service, and might be said to be on an average seventy years old. Three of them held Peninsular medals with one clasp; three with two, six with four, two with five, two with six, one with seven, and one with no less than nine clasps, representing nine general actions. Having said so much he thought he was justified in asking the Government to take the claims of these distinguished and meritorious officers into consideration.

MR. T. G. BARING said, that upon the list of officers who had received rewards for distinguished service this year, there were some who had entered the army as far back as 1800, 1806, and 1814, so that such rewards were not confined exclusively to those who had distinguished themselves very lately. So far as he was able to understand the statement of the gallant General, the officers to whom he alluded had in reality ceased to belong to the army since 1826, and he could not, under those circumstances, conceive how they could on an average count fifty-three years service. Be that, however, as it might, the gallant General might rest assured that every consideration would be shown those officers in the distribution of rewards.

GENERAL LINDSAY said, he had used the word service as specifying the length of time which had elapsed since the entry of the officers in question into the army.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) £78,600, General Officers.

GENERAL LINDSAY said, he wished to remark that last year a Committee had been appointed to consider the claims of seven General officers, and had reported in favour of those claims. The Committee recommended that they should receive their pay from the date of their receiving the rank of general officer, but the Treasury had only given them the allowance from the date of the recommendation of the Committee. He wished to know on what principle the Treasury and the War Office had proceeded in taking this course?

MR. T. G. BARING said, that the case had been fully considered by the Committee, and the claim made was carried by a narrow division of five to four. On the matter being brought to the notice of the Treasury they considered these officers ought not to receive retrospective pay, and gave it from the date of the Committee's Report. Their pay was given to them as a boon, and not as of right, and no injustice had been done to these officers.

GENERAL LINDSAY said, he could not recognize any principle in the hon. Gentleman's statement. The officers were entitled to the pay claimed from 1805 and 1807.

Vote agreed to.

(5.) £181,363, Pensions to Widows, &c.

COLONEL NORTH said, he wished to draw the attention of the hon. Under Secretary for War to the case of the Widow of an officer of the Royal Regiment who was wounded at the Redan, sent home, and at the end of four years died from the effect of his wound. He had purchased his first commission, but when the widow applied for a pension, the answer was that as the officer had not served ten years the widow was not entitled to a pension. That was a very proper rule in regard to officers not on service, but this officer could not serve his ten years because he had received a wound in the head, from the effects of which he died. He could not believe that any man in the country would wish that, in order to increase the reserve fund, the unfortunate widow should be deprived of the sum which her husband paid for his commission.

MR. T. G. BARING said, that if the hon. and gallant Member would give him the circumstances of the case of which he had not before heard, he would inquire into them. It was, however, necessary to adhere to the regulations, although in some exceptional cases they might appear to operate rather hardly.

Vote agreed to.

(6.) £42,953, Pensions for Wounds.

COLONEL NORTH said, the change recently made by the noble Lord the Secretary for War was liberal and kind, and he was entitled to thanks for the new warrant in this respect, but no warrant could include every case and, therefore, he would call the attention of the House to Colonel Henry, a gallant and distinguished officer. He went to the Crimea in April, 1855, and having performed an act of distinguished bravery he received a brevet-majority. In consequence, however, of the scarcity of artillery officers, in which service he held his commission, he was obliged to continue in the command of a very important and dangerous post, and while thus employed was so severely wounded that his arm had to be taken out of the socket. The intrepid bravery and coolness of the officer, under an almost unprecedented fire, had met with the highest praise; but upon applying at the War Office for his pension as a field officer, he was told that he was not entitled to receive it, as when wounded he was performing the duties of a captain of artillery, although he was actually promoted to the rank of field officer. He last Session, when moving for the revision of the old wound warrant, proposed that if an officer of inferior rank was wounded at a time he was performing duties of a superior rank he ought to receive the pension of the higher rank. That the noble Lord at the head of the War Department had acceded to, but the case he now mentioned of Colonel Henry was the converse of that proposition. It was true that Colonel Henry did not come within the warrant, but he thought that in consideration of his conspicuous bravery an exception should be made in his favour, and that he should receive a field officer's pension.

MR. T. G. BARING said, that as Lieutenant Colonel Henry himself admitted that he was not doing duty as a field officer when he received his wound, Lord Herbert saw no alternative but to abide by the regulations. Lieutenant Colonel Henry was, no doubt, a distinguished officer; but if they began to make exceptions of the kind suggested, it would cause great confusion in the service.

GENERAL LINDSAY thought that Colonel Henry had strong claims on the consideration of the War Office.

CAPTAIN JERVIS stated, that the Russian guns at Sebastopol having on one occasion concentrated their fire on one of the English batteries, Colonel Henry was selected, as an officer of great coolness and experience, to take command of it. He was subjected for twenty-four hours to what The Times' correspondent called an "infernal fire," and discharged his duty to the admiration of the whole army. He urged the Government not to deprive Colonel Henry of the field officer's pension on a mere technical ground, as if the claims of so gallant an officer were ignored it would be no encouragement for any other to continue to perform the duties of an inferior officer, however urgent the necessity might be, after he had been promoted.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY called attention to the fact that no less than £40,000 was taken on the Vote for 1859-60 more than was required.

MR. T. G. BARING explained that that was owing to some of the pensions not being called for.

Vote agreed to, as were also

(7.) £32,409, Chelsea and Kilmainham Hospitals.

(9.) £138,151, Superannuation and Retired Allowances.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he thought some of the retired allowances were given to persons comparatively young, and with short periods of service. Some reason ought to be stated why these pensions were allowed.

MR. T. G. BARING said, the retired allowances were regulated by Act of Parliament.

Vote agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

(10.) £750,000, Customs Department.

MR. HENNESSY said, the Vote ought not to be pressed at so late an hour. It involved the effect on the expenditure of the department of all the recent reforms.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he hoped the Committee would proceed; till the Estimates were got through there was no prospect of the end of the Session. The changes in the Revenue Department, in consequence of the abolition of some offices, had effected a saving of more than £100,000 on the year, though it would be balanced for a time by an increase in superannuations. That was really the whole case.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he was inclined to believe that the Committee knew nothing whatever of these Estimates. He wanted to know why they had stopped short in the Army Estimates, and why the hon. Under Secretary had not gone on with the Vote in excess? They had stopped short on a subject of which they knew little, and they were now asked to go into a question of which they knew nothing. He never expected much good to accrue from bringing these Revenue Estimates before the House. Its only effect had been to remove the responsibility from the heads of the Customs and Excise, who did understand the matter, and to lay on this House, who understood nothing of it at all. He should like to know what was the meaning of this Vote in excess.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he was not surprised that the Chancellor of the

Sir Henry Willoughby

Exchequer should deprecate discussion if the Government themselves relied upon the accuracy of the Revenue Departments without knowing the facts. He would like to know whether there was any balance from previous Votes. It appeared that no fewer than 450 persons had been discharged from the public service, either with compensations or on superannuations. Was there no way of bringing those persons into other departments of the public service?

MR. PEEL said, that in passing from the Army to the Revenue Estimates they were strictly following the order on the notice paper. There could be no balances under this head, as all savings were returned to the Exchequer at the end of the year. Of course it could not be expected that officers who had filled situations at the head of Departments should be called upon to assume a subordinate position; but subject to that restriction persons under sixty years of age were at any time liable to be called upon to act in the public service.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he was glad that the hon. Gentleman opposite called attention to the amount of the superannuation list, which was increasing at a rate that was perfectly marvellous. He insisted that the Vote in excess ought to have followed the Army Estimates. The result, however, of the recent changes in the conduct of business had been to deceive the House, lengthy discussions occupying the early portion of each evening, so that no one could tell what business would really come on.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER explained, that the Vote in excess of the Army Votes formed no portion of the Army Estimates, and, therefore, the Estimates for the Revenue Department were now properly taken. In fact the hon. Gentleman blamed them for adhering strictly to the course of which they had given notice. He feared there was too much truth in the charge of the increase in the superannuation list, but that did not apply to the Customs Department, which were so well managed by the heads of that Department that no fault could be found with them. The Estimates for that Department had been passed for some time in the same quiet way that a long lapse of time was dispatched in Scripture, in a single sentence—

"And the land had rest forty years."

SIR MORTON PETO said, that the experience of the last few weeks showed that the mode of proceeding with regard to voting the public money was anything but satisfactory. It would be well in a future Session if Government would see whether they could not begin the Estimates at an early hour in the evening, and not to be interrupted by questions about Garibaldi or anything else.

MR. HENNESSY said, that the present disturbance in the Revenue Department was one of great magnitude and importance. He wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether a large majority of the officers of the Inland Revenue and Customs had not expressed to the Government a sense of certain grievances under which they laboured, and also whether in regulating the salaries and future allowances of those gentlemen Government would not adhere to the precedents which had been established?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was not aware that any general discontent existed in the Departments referred to; on the contrary, he believed that general contentment prevailed. The hon. Gentleman's second question scarcely required an answer, because it would be the duty of Government to adhere to former precedents.

Vote agreed to, as was also

(11.) £1,440,000, Inland Revenue Department.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £2,050,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charges for Post Office Services, and the Collection of the Revenue, which will come in course of payment during the year ending the 31st day of March, 1862."

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he wished to ask whether the Estimate furnished by the Post Office was not £2,161,133, and whether the Post Office had not been in the habit of late years of asking for a sum considerably more than they required? He hoped such a wholesale practice on the part of any Department would be discouraged by the Government. Perhaps that was the proper time to call attention to the discontent which prevailed amongst the Post Office officials. They complained that they had never been able to ascertain what were the recommendations contained in the Report of the Committee that was appointed to investigate certain matters of which they complained, or what decision had been arrived at. Without reference to the particular merits of the case, it was very undesirable that questions materially affecting the interests of a large body of men should be kept thus in suspense.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the hon. Gentleman seemed to think that the Government ought not to adopt a wholesale manner of dealing with the Estimate. That was a very proper subject for comment; but he believed that in one of the discussions on the finances of the year he apprised the House that they had taken this year the Post Office Estimate closer than had been done in former years, when the Revenue Estimates were always voted to the extent of £300,000 or £400,000 more than was actually necessary. The Government did not think that was at all desirable. With regard to the other point alluded to by the hon. Gentleman, there had no doubt been differences of opinion amongst persons of great weight in the same Department, a circumstance which necessarily occasioned delay in the answer of the Government. Those differences were now entirely removed, and the final answer of the Treasury was sent to the Post Office authorities about a week or a fortnight ago. The matter was concluded, and the measure consequent upon it was now in such a shape as to be soon submitted to the House.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he was glad to hear that the absurd and objectionable practice of voting more money for the Revenue Departments than was necessary was about to be checked.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he believed that they were voting at least half a million in excess of what was requisite for the Department. There were balances of £600,000 in the Exchequer at the commencement of the last financial year. He would move that the Vote be reduced by the sum of £50,000.

MR. PEEL said, it was possible that last March there might have been £600,000 on account of the Department in the Exchequer, but then the March quarter's salaries would be paid out of that.

MR. HENNESSY condemned the practice of paying men who discharged the laborious and responsible duties of letter-carriers the paltry pittance of 18s. per week.

Motion made, and Question,

"That a sum, not exceeding £2,000,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charges for Post Office Services, and the Collection of the Revenue, which will come in course of payment during the year ending the 31st day of March, 1862."

LONDON COAL AND WINE DUES CONTINUANCE BILL.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 7 (Drawback upon Coals to continue to be allowed),

MR. AYRTON complained that, while by a recent treaty the French manufacturer would obtain English coal free from taxation, the Government proposed to burden the London manufacturer with a duty of 13*d.* per ton on that article. In Dublin, where there was a similar tax, a drawback was allowed. He begged to move the Amendment of which he had given notice, for the allowance of a drawback on all coals used by manufacturers.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS observed that it was a mere repetition of a discussion which had already occupied the attention of the Committee during a whole morning's discussion. He proposed to continue the coal duties to the amount and in the form in which they were now levied. At present there was no drawback allowed to manufacturers in London, and his reason for not acceding to the proposal was that it would materially diminish the produce of those duties, which were estimated at a certain amount, and only sufficient for the purposes to which they were to be applied. It would be remembered that the London manufacturer lived in the vicinity of his markets, and that more than countervailed any disadvantage created by the imposition of the duty.

MR. LOCKE said, the duty of 13*d.* per ton pressed very severely upon the London manufacturer when he came into competition with the country manufacturer, who paid perhaps not much more than 8*s.* a ton for his coals. In the present state of competition between trades, this duty was just the last hair which broke the camel's back. He regretted the non-attendance of metropolitan Members to support the interest of their constituents.

LORD FERMOY said, the hon. and learned Member had counted without his host. He (Lord Fermoy) was a metropolitan Member, and was prepared to support the imposition of the tax as an octroi duty, not as an improper duty. Moreover, the manufacturers of London would benefit more than any other class by the improvements which were to be carried out by the application of the coal tax; and he certainly could not consent to benefit them at the expense of the poor consumers of coal.

MR. AYRTON said, the noble Lord had spoken, not in the interests of the poor ratepayers, but of the rich coal consumers of Marylebone. An octroi was a tax placed on articles of consumption, and not on those of prime manufacturing industry. It would be an insult to the understanding of the Committee to discuss questions of political economy which were so well established. But he thought it too bad that, after the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had gained popularity for his Government by asserting one set of doctrines, the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, in order to ingratiate himself with particular interests, should come forward and advocate wholly different principles, which were opposed to the views of a great majority of his supporters. He should be glad to hear from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer one single intelligible argument in support of the course proposed, for he denied that any had yet been given. He should certainly afford hon. Members an opportunity of recording their inconsistency.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

INLAND REVENUE ACTS.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER moved the following Resolutions:—

"(1.) That there shall be charged and paid for and upon every Licence to be taken out by any person not being a Distiller or Rectifier of Spirits, or a Dealer in or Retailer of Beer, Spirits, Wine, or Sweets, authorizing him to sell Methylated Spirit in any quantity not greater than One Gallon at a time, the Duty of Two Pounds and Two Shillings.

“(2.) That, in lieu of the Drawbacks now payable upon the Exportation of Beer from the United Kingdom to Foreign Parts as merchandise, there shall be allowed and paid in respect of all Beer which shall be so exported the following rates of Drawback (that is to say):—

“For and upon every barrel of thirty-six gallons, and so in proportion for any greater quantity of Beer brewed or made by any entered or licensed Brewer of Beer for sale in the United Kingdom, in the brewing of which Beer the worts used before fermentation were of the specific gravity of not less than one thousand and forty degrees, the sum of four shillings;

“And for every additional five degrees of specific gravity, up to the specific gravity one thousand one hundred and twenty-five degrees, the further sum of sixpence per barrel.

“(3.) That no return of Stamp Duty paid upon any Probate or Letters of Administration in England or Ireland, or any Inventory of the estate and effects of any deceased person in Scotland, shall be made or allowed in respect of any debt due and owing from the deceased, which shall be voluntary.

“(4.) That no allowance shall be made to a Successor out of his Succession, under the Succession Duty Act 1853, in respect of any property which, upon taking such Succession, shall terminate or cease to exist.

“(5.) That it is expedient to amend the Laws relating to the Inland Revenue.”

WAKEFIELD WRIT.

RESOLUTION.

MAJOR EDWARDS, in rising to move a new writ for Wakefield, said, that it would be in the recollection of the House that about a fortnight ago the hon. Member for Finsbury gave notice of his intention of moving that the new writs for Wakefield and Gloucester should be issued. He could not understand what motive induced the hon. Member to abandon his intention, and submitted the Motion to the House because it was generally expected to be proceeded with, and most of the Members had made up their minds how they should vote. He knew nothing of Gloucester, but he felt it incumbent upon himself, from his knowledge of Wakefield and his intimate connection with the West Riding of Yorkshire, to take some decided step with regard to that borough. This important constituency was composed of interests that ought no longer to remain imperfectly represented in that House. It was not a small hamlet but a large and important town, with a population of more than 20,000. Its commercial and manufacturing interest were increasing immensely year by year, and it was the great emporium of the corn trade in the north of England. The writ was suspended in 1859, and Wakefield had in consequence been without direct representation for two years. He need not say that a constituency of such importance must feel the want of a representative very keenly. [“Hear, hear!” and a laugh.] Hon. Members might laugh, but there were few constituencies in the country who were more entitled to be represented in Parliament than the constituency of Wakefield. This was what he termed capricious legislation. The writ had been withheld without any definite Motion, or any decided act on the part of the Government. Other writs have been suspended, but were reissued within a shorter interval. Their temporary withdrawal of the privilege had the desired effect, and no ground of complaint against them had since been preferred. A very small proportion after all of the electors had indulged in the practices that had created so much scandal, and he thought it but an act of justice to the majority that the writ should no longer be withheld. Why suspend the legitimate action of the Constitution for a longer time than is absolutely necessary? The House has already expressed its abhorrence of certain practices, and that object having been effected, and the guilty section of the constituency having received a wholesome lesson, why should the House inflict this punishment for an indefinite period? Being an inhabitant of the West Riding he had been often called upon during the last two years to transact Parliamentary business connected with Wakefield, and he should now be glad to have that duty taken off his hands. Again, he insisted that Wakefield, having been deprived of a representative for two entire years, it had suffered sufficiently for the malpractices of a very small portion of the community, and, therefore, he hoped the House would agree to his Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. SERJEANT PIGOTT said, he thought it impossible that so important a question could be discussed at that hour (quarter past one o'clock), and he, therefore, begged to move the Adjournment of the House.

MR. H. BERKELEY said, he believed that they might discuss the question very well in half an hour. He was most anxious that the writ for Wakefield should be issued, not from any particular virtue that the constituency possessed, but because he did not conceive that Wakefield was in a different position from a vast number of other boroughs. He did not believe that the House had ever been in earnest in attempting to put an end to bribery and corruption. He should support the Motion of the hon. Gentleman opposite.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that the case of Wakefield could not be disassociated from that of Gloucester. It might be argued that bribery and corruption were to be found in many boroughs; but in Wakefield and Gloucester there had been detection and conviction. There was on the table a Bill which he regretted he had not been able to bring under the consideration of the House at an earlier date, and which contained a clause providing that in boroughs which were in the position of Wakefield and Gloucester the writ should be suspended for five years. The Government did not feel justified in making that clause retrospective, but it would be competent for the House to do so in Committee. Believing that the question was too large to be dealt with at that hour he should support the Motion for Adjournment.

CAPTAIN JERVIS observed that the House had had two years to consider the question, and they were as competent to come to an opinion on it now as they would be at any future time.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he was of opinion that any borough that had been proved to be guilty of bribery and corruption should be disfranchised. He should, therefore, support the proposal for adjournment.

MAJOR EDWARDS said, that the Government in their overpowering strength had determined not to issue the writ. He had nothing to do with Gloucester; but as the inconvenience of the suspension had been excessive in Wakefield he could not consent to the adjournment.

Motion made, and Question put, "That this House do now adjourn."

The House divided:—Ayes 76; Noes 98: Majority 22.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. P. W. MARTIN said, the House

had now been sitting eleven hours and a half. He was not prepared to sit there all night while the whole of the blue book on the last Wakefield election was read. He, therefore, moved that the debate be now adjourned.

MR. AYRTON said, there was really nothing to discuss. He should support the Motion for the issue of the writ.

MR. H. BERKELEY said, he also saw no reason why the House should not go to a division at once.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he had some difficulty in accepting the division just taken as indicating the opinion of the House that the writ should issue. In the first place, there was but a limited attendance of hon. Members, at all events, for a question of so much importance, and a large number of Members must have been in a state of uncertainty whether a vote of this kind would be taken at so late an hour. If the House were determined to divide on the question, they ought to be reminded of the finding of the Commissioners on the last Wakefield election. They found that 98 persons committed corrupt practices and were guilty of acts of bribery in respect of the votes of other persons. They found that 86 persons committed corrupt practices and were guilty of acts of bribery in respect of their own votes. They found that 12 of the last-named 86 were guilty of acts of bribery, not on one side only, but on both. That was the picture drawn by the Commissioners, and the question was whether two years' suspension of the writ was a sufficient visitation for such a state of things? Hon. Gentlemen opposite who were now so anxious for the writ to issue forgot the arguments they advanced a short time ago, when the question of reviving the franchise of Sudbury and St. Albans was discussed. They then said that the House was proceeding with injustice and partiality, and that the same measure that had been meted to St. Albans and Sudbury ought to be visited on other delinquent boroughs, such as Wakefield and Gloucester. The House was then told it was too lenient to Wakefield and Gloucester, and now it was told it was too severe. He fully recognized the right of the hon. Gentleman (Major Edwards) to bring the subject before the House, and the issue of the writ was a matter peculiarly within the province, not of the Government, but of the House itself. He thought it likely that the leading Members of the benches opposite would like to be present on a matter of such importance. That was a courtesy due to them, and he was surprised that so little regard for the opinion of those who presided over their deliberations was paid by hon. Gentlemen opposite. If the House on the present division thought fit to re-affirm its former vote he should not object to the issue of the writ.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE said, he saw no reason for delaying the issue of the writ.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that before hon. Members went to a division, they ought to afford to his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Reading (Mr. Serjeant Pigott) an opportunity of stating the reasons on which the Commissioners had based their Report. If the House was ready to go into the discussion at that hour (a quarter to 2 o'clock), the Members of the Government would not object to the lateness of the hour. It was, however, due to his hon. and learned Friend to hear what he had to allege in support of the view taken by the Commissioners.

MR. KNIGHTLEY said, there was no question that Wakefield and Gloucester were corrupt, but other boroughs were equally so. He saw in the House the Members for Hull, Norwich, Beverley, and Berwick-on-Tweed, and there were plenty of places equally corrupt with them.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

The House divided:—Ayes 77; Noes 85: Majority 8.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. CONINGHAM said, he would move that the House adjourn. It was impossible that the matter could be discussed at that time (nearly two o'clock). He considered the conduct of the Government excessively weak on this subject. They ought to have decidedly indicated to the House the course to be pursued.

MR. SERJEANT PIGOTT said, he had no wish, so far as he was personally concerned, for the adjournment; but there was a strong opinion that the writ should not be issued; and, whether issued or not, that there should be time for the discussion of a question which was said to involve the principle of purity of election. The discussion could not conveniently be taken at that hour, and it ought to be borne in mind that the House had already been sitting for twelve hours. A question of that importance ought not to be dealt with in a corner and in the darkness of the night, when three-fourths of the House were not present.

MAJOR EDWARDS remarked, whether the House was full or not, he had given seven days' notice of his Motion; and he must say that he had never seen during the present Session so full a House at that hour in the morning. He thought that after what the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had just said, the Government were now bound to proceed with the discussion of the Motion.

MR. H. BERKELEY said, he hoped the Government, which had so often shown a desire that the House should proceed with the business before it, when hon. Members desired to adjourn, would yield to the majority which had just been declared.

MR. CLAY said, he was rather surprised at the opposition which was offered to those on his own side of the House by an hon. Gentleman who annually proposed his own nostrum for purity of election.

MR. BONHAM-CARTER said, he thought it was very evident that the supporters of the original Motion had already made up their mind as to how they should vote, no matter what discussion might take place. He hoped the adjournment would be agreed to.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON asked the House seriously to consider the Vote which they would give on the present occasion. What was the position in which the House stood in respect to the matter at issue? They were called upon to come to a decision with respect to a borough in whose case it had been declared that a number of persons had been found guilty of bribery and corruption. His right hon. Friend the Home Secretary had now a Bill before the House dealing with bribery and corruption at elections, and yet, pending that Bill, at two o'clock in the morning the House was called upon to issue a writ, the issue of which would practically preclude the extension of any penal enactment to the borough in question. Such a proceeding would, he thought, to say nothing worse, be liable to great misconstruction on the part of the public. Under these circumstances he hoped hon. Gentlemen opposite would not persevere in the course which they were taking.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, the noble Lord's observations might have done very well before the promise made by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary on the part of the Government, that he would not oppose the progress of the discussion after the last division; but after that the Government ought to keep their promise.

MR. LOCKE said, he would go on dividing all night rather than the proposal for the issue of the writ should be carried by a majority that was evidently packed.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH asked, whether the House of Commons was to be controlled by a rash phrase uttered by a Secretary of State? It was one of the weakest expressions he had ever heard from the right hon. Gentleman. Therefore, although the right hon. Gentleman had promised the Government would not oppose the progress of the discussion after the last division, the House ought to take no notice of that, but insist upon the adjournment.

The House divided:—Ayes 74; Noes 81: Majority 7.

Original Question again proposed.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, after what had taken place he should suggest the House might allow the Resolution to be put.

MR. LOCKE said, the great question of purity of election was the real question at issue, and it seemed to him that hon. Members forming the majority did not care anything about it; he should, however, give them another opportunity of reconsidering their decision.

VISCOUNT INGESTRE said, he wished to know whether the Government were to be believed or not, after the conduct which had been pursued by one of their Members that evening?

MR. AYRTON said, that in the absence of the distinguished leaders on the other side, he would put it to the hon. Gentlemen opposite whether they would not be satisfied with the triumphs which they had already obtained, and gracefully agree to an adjournment.

MR. H. BERKELEY said, he was ready to admit that it would suit the dignity of the majority if they were to yield. He believed that on a future occasion they would find themselves strengthened in dealing with the question at issue.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he hoped hon. Gentlemen opposite would adopt the suggestion of the hon. Member, especially as it was doubtful whether, technically speaking, seven days' notice had been given of the original Motion, as it was given only on Friday last for the following Monday, and that the first day in which it appeared on the paper was Saturday as for Monday.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE said, whether the technical objection was sound or not, he would advise his hon. and gallant Friend to accede to the wishes of the minority.

MR. LYGON appealed to the Government, as the debate could not continue much longer, to fix a day when the sense of the House might be taken on the question under consideration.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that looking to the position of public business, he could not fix any day for the future discussion of the question.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, he considered that sufficient notice in compliance with the order of the House had been given.

MR. SPEAKER ruled that sufficient notice had been given.

MAJOR EDWARDS announced his readiness to consent to the adjournment of the debate until Friday next.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Debate be now adjourned," put, and agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Friday next.

House adjourned at Three o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, July 1, 1861.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILL.—1st East India Council, &c.

CHURCH RATES.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON, in presenting Petitions from Christchurch, Paddington, and elsewhere against the Abolition of Church rates, said, that while all the petitioners were opposed to the unconditional abolition of church rates, yet, all the petitions implied that the law on that subject ought, as soon as possible, to be changed. He was authorized by the most rev. Prelate who presided over that province to say, that he would hail—as he himself certainly would—with pleasure the speedy settlement of the question upon the basis of the Report of the Select Committee of their Lordships' House which sat last year. He believed he spoke the sentiments of all his right rev. Brethren when he said that they would deplore any settlement which would leave anything rankling in the minds of their Dissenting brethren; but they held that the Report of the Select Committee offered the grounds of an amicable adjustment. They were of opinion that it was impossible to satisfy certain persons who were bent on the dissolution of the connection between Church and State, but they were convinced that these persons formed a very small minority in the country, and undoubtedly a very small proportion of that majority in the House of Commons which had hitherto passed the Bill for the total abolition of church rates. They believed that many Churchmen were so much dissatisfied with the present law that they would be glad to vote for the total abolition of the rates rather than leave things as they were; but he was sure that any proposal for the speedy, final, and amicable settlement of the question would receive the support of the large majority of the right reverend Bench.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH said, that a Bill for the amendment of the law related to church rates having been introduced into the other House, which he hoped their Lordships would have an opportunity of considering, he would withdraw his own measure on the subject.

THE ANNEXATION OF SAINT DOMINGO.

MOTION FOR COPY OF MEMORIAL.

LORD BROUGHAM, in moving for a copy of the Memorial addressed to the Secretary of State for Jamaica, respecting the annexation of St. Domingo by Spain, said, it had often happened that his views had been in conflict with those of our colonial fellow-subjects upon questions relating to slavery; but on the present occasion he had the happiness to be entirely of their opinion, and to join with them in urging their Lordships to consider the Memorial to which his Motion referred. This document was agreed to at a public meeting at Kingston, and received the signatures of 3,700 persons, who prayed the Crown to refuse its assent to the annexation of St. Domingo to Spain. The alarm which the memorialists expressed at the prospect of San Domingo being annexed to the Spanish dominions was most natural; for they had long been suffering from the competition of slave-grown sugar from Cuba. It was true, that when that great measure the emancipation of our West India slaves was carried, a very large sum was paid the planters by way of compensation; but that compensation, particularly in Jamaica, had been found inadequate, and much suffering had resulted in consequence. The great source of their suffering had, however, been the admission of slave-grown sugar into our markets, and now they naturally felt considerable apprehension lest the annexation of St. Domingo, or rather of the eastern part of the island, to the Spanish territory should render matters infinitely worse. They feared lest slavery should be revived by the Spaniards. It was true it had been stated more or less distinctly by the Spanish Government that it was not their intention to revive slavery in San Domingo. The reason given was that slave cultivation was not required in San Domingo, in consequence of the excellence of the soil. But was the soil more excellent in San Domingo than in Cuba? Nothing of the kind. The soil of Cuba, beyond doubt, was superior, yet, in Cuba, slavery had been continued down to the present hour. He regarded the declaration of the Spanish Government that there was no intention to introduce slavery into the eastern portion of the island of St. Domingo with more than suspicion. Looking to the more solemn engagements by treaty which the Spanish Government had left unperformed, those suspicions were converted into all but a certainty that slavery would be introduced. The Spanish Government complained that they were misrepresented in general declamatory statements. He would, therefore, use the very words of the Treaty of 1817—

“His Catholic Majesty concurs in the fullest manner with the sentiments of His Britannic Majesty on the iniquity and inhumanity of the traffic in slaves. He engages to take effectual measures for its suppression, conformable with the principles of humanity with which he is animated, and he hopes the moment will be hastened when that object shall be obtained.”

He then engaged

“To declare that it shall be unlawful for any subject of the Spanish Crown after the 30th of May, 1820, to engage in that inhuman traffic;”

and within two months of the ratification of the treaty

“To promulgate throughout the Spanish dominions a penal law inflicting severe punishment on all who, on any pretence whatever or in any way whatever, shall take any part in the traffic in slaves."

In 1835, however, it was found necessary to make another convention, whereby it was declared that all traffic in slaves should totally and finally be abolished in all parts of the Spanish dominions—that inhuman traffic which the Spanish King had solemnly engaged to put down in 1817—and a stipulation was inserted for the payment by this country of £400,000 as compensation to those persons whom His Catholic Majesty should name. That part of the treaty had been most punctually performed, but not so the other parts. The slave trade to Cuba was continued not only equal to what it was, but it had increased, so that instead of 20,000 or 30,000 unhappy Africans being transported to Cuba every year, for several years past the numbers had risen to £40,000. The Spanish Government said they had done all they could, that they had written despatches to the Captains General of Cuba, desiring them to put a stop to the trade; but the Portuguese Government had acted in a much more vigorous manner, and had abolished their slave trade altogether. From 60,000 it was reduced in a single year to 12,000, then to 5,000, and for the last seven or eight years it had ceased altogether. Nothing could exceed the honesty and good faith of the Portuguese Government; their cruisers had always done their duty most effectually, and the Brazilian Government had responded to their efforts and put an entire stop to the Brazilian slave trade. In that country he was informed the treatment of persons of colour was most liberal. A free negro had been a court physician, and others had been employed in various confidential positions. As long as the slave trade continued it was impossible that any progress could be made in developing the commerce of Africa. While this traffic was permitted the people preferred to seize and sell one another, but the instant the traffic ceased their energies were devoted to innocent commerce. He had the authority of Mr. Gabriel, the able and highly respectable member of the Mixed Commission, and who had been twenty years on the coast, for the statement that on the abolition of the Brazil slave trade the African exports, which had been little or nothing, soon rose in Loango alone to £230,000, and the imports to £20,000 or £30,000 annually of British manufactures. The whole exports from the African coast were nearly

Lord Brougham

£1,500,000. With regard to the annexation of San Domingo, he understood that Hayti had offered to the Spanish Government at Madrid, by its Minister, to acknowledge the eastern part of the Island called San Domingo, but the answer given was that it was too late—meaning that the Spanish Government had determined to accept the annexation. He would not stop to discuss the question whether any territory had a right to annex itself to another territory without the consent of its neighbours; because, in this case, nothing like the consent of the people of San Domingo had been shown. San Domingo was held in thralldom by a reign of terror. Some 5,000 or 6,000 Spanish troops had been sent from Cuba, and more would be sent, no doubt, if necessary. The consequence of the Spanish intervention was that the great territory of Hayti was kept in a perpetual state of preparation for war although they were at peace. He knew from the highest authority that there was the greatest inclination in that island to apply these resources to the promotion of education, and the improvement of their institutions. But all was absorbed in the military preparations rendered necessary by the Spanish intervention. In fact, that part of the world was in the same unhappy predicament with Europe, having peace with all the expenses of war; so that, in some respects, we might say—Scævit toto mars impius orbe. No wonder, then, that the annexation was strongly opposed by Hayti, and he was informed that nothing could exceed the ill consequences which would occur to that flourishing republic from the change. He wished the French Government would join with our own in protesting against the annexation of St. Domingo, but he had little hope that it would; however, one of the evils of the annexation was that France would, in all probability, not be an indifferent spectator of it, and the Haytians were not a little alarmed by the apprehension of her making some attempt to regain her ascendancy, lost after a desperate conflict early in this century. Her succeeding in any such attempt by force was utterly impossible; there was not a man in Hayti who would not lay down his life in the struggle to maintain their independence. America had shown a strong disposition to prevent the Spanish annexation, having warned the Spanish Government that they did it at their peril. Some were apprehensive of the threat, meaning that the Federal Government would annex Cuba and Porto Rico; but this plan seemed impossible to be in the contemplation of the Northern States, declared enemies as they were to slavery. How far it might fall in with the policy of the Southern States was another matter. It was, however, plain that this annexation involved questions of the utmost importance to a large body of men, Cuba having a population of 1,600,000, of which nearly a million were slaves, and Porto Rico 400,000, with comparatively few slaves. In all respects, therefore, the annexation was entirely to be deprecated, as well for the great island itself, with its population of nearly a million, as for the other countries in its neighbourhood. That annexation was not, perhaps, to be resisted, but it was to be strongly protested against, and he hoped that steps would be taken by our Government with that object. In conclusion, he moved a humble Address to Her Majesty for a copy of the Memorial in question.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, his noble and learned Friend, in making a very simple Motion, had alluded not merely to the annexation of St. Domingo, but to the wide and very serious question of the continued traffic in slaves on the part of Spain. Their Lordships would not expect him to enter into subjects which fell within the sphere of the Foreign rather than of the Colonial Office; but he could not avoid expressing his regret that his noble and learned Friend so frequently brought these grave charges against the Spanish Government, in season and out of season, reading passages from treaties, and taunting the Spanish Government with the breach of them. This would not be matter for regret if he were likely to accomplish the benevolent object which he had in view, and to stop the traffic in slaves; but his (the Duke of Newcastle's) own individual opinion was that the course pursued by his noble and learned Friend was not calculated to attain that object. Such allusions to the Government of a proud and sensitive people like the Spaniards were rather likely to aggravate the evil by rendering them obdurate on the subject and by weakening the hands of the Executive Government both in this country and in Spain for the purpose of effecting the object which his noble and learned Friend had so sincerely at heart. As regarded the assumption by Spain of the sovereignty of St. Domingo, his noble and learned Friend deprecated it on the ground upon which the petitioners in Jamaica had remonstrated. How far the suspicions which had been expressed might be realized he could not say, but the declarations of the Spanish Government were most distinct. They said, no doubt, as stated by the noble Lord, that slavery was not required in St. Domingo, while it was in Cuba, because the soil was more fertile in the former island. But this was not the only reason assigned by the Spanish Government, for they had repeatedly and emphatically declared, both verbally to the English Minister at Madrid and in written communications, their firm determination not to allow slavery in any form to be established in St. Domingo—basing that declaration not on the ground of self-interest, but expressly recognizing that such an act would be at variance with the faith of treaties and opposed to the interests of civilization. He believed he was accurately quoting the language used by the Spanish Government on more than one occasion. Of course, the noble and learned Lord was at liberty to express his opinion as to the validity of these promises, and the probability of their being kept; but, so far as the English Government was concerned, these declarations had been most distinct. The memorialists took the same view as that which had been just urged. They feared that if slavery was again introduced into St. Domingo they would have to compete with the slave-grown sugar both from that island and from Cuba, and, therefore, they hoped that Her Majesty would take some steps to prevent the annexation. Though this memorial only stated the same grounds as those which his noble and learned Friend had gone over, there could not be the least objection to produce it if it were desired.

VISCOUNT STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE did not wish to enter into the question at any length, but he must say that when their Lordships carried their recollections to former times, when they remembered that Spain owed her liberties and even her existence to the exertions of this country, and then turned their recollections to the many occasions when Spain had put herself in a false position towards this country by the course she had pursued on many occasions, he could not refrain from expressing his satisfaction that there was at least one Member of their Lordships' House who had spoken the truth on this important subject. Nothing could be more extraordinary than the conduct of Spain with regard to the pecuniary loan she had received from the capitalists of this country—she had repeatedly and systematically violated—he was sure he did not aggravate the expression every engagement she had entered into with them. On this question of the slave trade they had the information afforded by Her Majesty's Consul at Cuba, that the most solemn engagements of Spain with regard to the slave trade were not only systematically violated, but the known violators were rewarded by the Spanish Government. He was sorry, therefore, that Her Majesty's Government did not propose to take more energetic steps in this matter of the annexation of St. Domingo. But this was not the only point where the Spanish Government set itself in opposition to English feeling. Wherever there was a question of humanity or wherever humanity and religious sentiment were mixed up together, the Spanish Government was in opposition to England. English subjects who went to live in that country and to carry on their commercial affairs were not allowed to worship God according to their conscience; and even the religious service allowed our Ambassador at Madrid was so much a matter of privacy that if a stranger went into the chapel it was considered a violation of Spanish law, and he was apt to be turned out by the police. He thought the noble and learned Lord had done his duty in calling attention to this question, and he hoped that what had passed would have a beneficial effect upon the Spanish Government.

LORD BROUGHAM said, it was a slender proof of no intention to restore slavery, that the Spanish Government said it would be at variance with treaties—what treaties could be more solemn than those of 1817 and 1835, in the name of the most Holy Trinity, and yet they were shamefully broken in all but the reception of the money. He suggested that in any communication with the Spanish Government his noble Friend should remind it that General Valdez, during the years he was Governor of Cuba, succeeded in bringing down the slave trade to little or nothing; but his successor raised the head-money on the slaves imported from 1½ to 3 doubloons, and men were known to have made £100,000 in two or three years, every farthing of which was blood money.

FACTION FIGHTING (IRELAND). QUESTION.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he rose to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland Whether his attention has been called to the published Address of the Chairman of the County of Tipperary (Mr. Sergeant Howley, Q.C.) to the Grand Jury at the recent Quarter Sessions of Cashel, with reference to a Document directing that cases of Faction Fighting shall no longer be tried at the Quarter Sessions, but sent to the Assizes; and whether he will state the nature of that Document, and the grounds for it?

MR. ROEBUCK rose to order. He did not think that any question asked ought to contain an insinuation which could not be answered. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cardwell) was asked to state the grounds on which a certain document had been issued. Now, if those grounds were wrong the House had no opportunity of expressing an opinion on them.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY: I rise to order.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is in order.

MR. ROEBUCK thought he was quite right. The right hon. Gentleman ought not to be called upon to state the grounds upon which the document was issued unless an opportunity were given to the House to state its opinions upon them. He asked whether the question was in order?

MR. VINCENT SCULLY: I totally repudiate that I intend to cast any insinuation whatever.

MR. SPEAKER: As a question of order the hon. Member has a right to put his question. In what manner the right hon. Gentleman may think fit to reply is another matter. But I cannot say that there is anything in the question to prevent its being put. It is impossible for me to interpose on the present occasion on a point of order.

MR. CARDWELL said, the document referred to was a Circular which the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, acting upon the advice of the Law Officers of the Crown, had forwarded to the Justices of Quarter Sessions. There was no intention of showing the slightest disrespect to the Justices of Quarter Sessions; but it was thought better, for the interests of justice, that persons concerned in faction fighting should be tried by a Jury selected from a wider area at the Assizes than by one drawn from the narrower area of the district in which the occurrence took place.

THE DERRYVEAGH EVICTIONS.

QUESTION.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he had now, with the permission of the hon. Member for Sheffield, to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he intends to propose any Inquiry, either through a Royal Commission or Select Committee of the House of Commons, into the Recent Evictions from the lands of Derryveagh, in the County of Donegal, or as to the Statements published by Mr. John George Adair, J.P., attributing a guilty knowledge of murder and other crimes to the evicted Inhabitants; also as to the several allegations made in Parliament on Monday, the 24th day of June, that Ribbonism exists in that district; or, if indisposed to originate an Inquiry, will the Chief Secretary be prepared, on the part of the Government, to support or sanction a Motion for an Inquiry proposed by an independent Member?

MR. CARDWELL said, it was not the intention of the Government to propose either a Commission or a Committee on this subject. With respect to the course that the Government might take on any Motion made by an independent Member, he thought he should be acting more in conformity with the wishes of the House if he declined to state what course the Government would pursue under certain circumstances until a specific Motion were submitted to them.

LAW RELATING TO SALVAGE.

QUESTION.

SIR HENRY TRACEY said, he would beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, If it is his intention to introduce a Bill to remedy the defects in the Law relating to Owners and Salvors of Vessels?

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that some portion of the defects of the Law relating to Salvage had been remedied by an Act passed this Session called the Admiralty Courts Act; and if the hon. Baronet would look at the Ninth Clause of the Act, he would find that the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act with regard to the Salvage of life within a limited distance from the coast had been extended to the Salvage of life wherever it occurred, so far as related to British shipping. As far as related to Foreign vessels there was no authority to interfere except under the provisions of an International Treaty. A Bill had been prepared on the subject to which the hon. Member referred; but he (Mr. Milner Gibson) feared there would not be time to introduce it this Session. He hoped to lay it on the Table early next Session.

SIR HENRY TRACEY said, he wished to ask, whether the right hon. Gentleman will give his support to a Bill embodying the principles of which he has already expressed approval, in case he (Sir Henry Tracey) introduced it?

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, it was impossible for him to answer the question without having first seen the proposition of the hon. Baronet.

SCOTTISH LUNACY ACT.

QUESTION.

MR. LESLIE said, he wished to ask the Lord Advocate, Whether he intends to introduce, during the present Session, a Bill to amend the Lunacy Act in Scotland?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, it was the intention of the Government to bring in such a Bill in the course of the present Session.

APPROPRIATION OF SEATS (SUDBURY AND ST. ALBANS) BILL.

CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now taken into Consideration."

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he would appeal to Mr. Speaker whether, in the course of his experience, he had ever witnessed a Bill so changed in its passage through the House as the Bill then under consideration? It was to all intents and purposes a new Bill. The Bill as it stood had never been read a second time, and had never passed through Committee. It proposed to give four Members to the West Riding of the county of York. The original Reform Bill only gave two Members to the county of York; the original Appropriation of Seats Bill, as introduced by the Government, proposed to give an additional Member; but they were now asked to cut up the West Riding into two divisions, and to give two Members to each. The Bill was only popular at all because it proposed to give an additional seat to the metropolitan district entitled from its wealth, intelligence, and population to the addition. But the Government were defeated upon that proposition, and after their defeat they ought not to have condescended to proceed with a Bill so completely altered—he would not say mutilated. At all events, if the change now proposed was to be made, it should not be done upon the Report, but the Bill should be recommitted. Since he had had the honour of a seat in that House—a period of thirty-five years—he had never before seen a new Bill brought in upon the Report in that manner. Why, the borough of Wakefield, which had been convicted of corruption, would have its share in this distribution, for they were going to give two additional Members to the very district in which that corrupt borough stood. Let them, if they chose, take away a seat from Wakefield, and give it to the West Riding; but let them not refuse a seat to Chelsea, and afterwards to Middlesex, and then carry it to the West Riding, and place it at the very door of the seat of corruption. He understood a Motion had been made by a gallant Officer the other night to issue a new writ for Wakefield, and that that Gentleman could not understand why he had withdrawn from the question. After he found that he could not bring forward his Motion as a matter of privilege at the commencement of business he considered that it would have been a perfect act of folly to bring forward the question on constitutional grounds, which were the grounds he took. He maintained that if they were not prepared to approach the question constitutionally, and if they were not prepared to extend the limits of the borough, so as to bring in a greater number of electors, they ought not to issue the writ. But that was a question of too great magnitude to be discussed after twelve o'clock at night; not that he meant to say that the hon. and gallant Officer might not succeed where he might fail, but he certainly did consider that it would be an act of folly to introduce the question at a late hour, and the hon. Gentleman could speak from experience whether he was far wrong in that opinion. With regard to the particular question before the House, he thought the Bill at all events should be recommitted if it were proceeded with. The Government intended to introduce six new clauses to give effect to their Amendments with regard to the West Riding, and to make twenty or thirty Amendments besides. Such alteration had never before been proposed upon bringing up of a Report, and if they were afraid to recommit the Bill he recommended that it should be given up altogether, for it was unworthy of a Government calling itself a reforming Government. They were beginning, too, at the wrong end. They first of all brought in a Bill early in March to amend the law of election, and to do away with the corrupt practices that prevailed, and yet they were now going to give away four new seats without any alteration in the election law being made—to bring new seats into the very corruption of which they complained. Let them do what they could to stop corruption, and then, if they liked, they might give away the four new seats with an opportunity for the electors to act honestly. For the reasons he had stated he thought he was justified in moving that the order of the day for the consideration of the Amendments to the Bill should be postponed for three months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word “now,” and at the end of the Question to add the words “upon this day three months.”

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he rose to second the Motion. The present Government called upon the Irish Members to assist in putting out the Government of the Earl of Derby, in order that they might bring in a more comprehensive measure of Reform than they had proposed, and that the interests of Ireland might be better attended to. They had a pretty specimen in this Bill of the way in which those interests were cared for by Her Majesty's Ministers. The Dublin Evening Mail, an Irish paper which knew very well what was going on here, made some comments on this Bill, which he would read to the House. It stated the case as well as he could do it himself. The extract was not a long one. [The hon. and learned Member read a paragraph from The Dublin Evening Mail, in which it was inferred that the Government had been “jockeyed” with regard to the proposed re-distribution of seats, as the House had sanctioned an arrangement under which it was probable that three, if not four, would eventually fall into the hands of the Conservative party.] At a recent meeting in Rochdale the hon. Member for that borough and the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) expressed their opinion that there should be a measure of Reform. The hon. Member for Birmingham said, "A comprehensive measure of Reform." Was the Bill before them, he would ask, a comprehensive measure of Reform? In his opinion it was a measure not of progressive but retrogressive Reform.

MR. CONINGHAM said, he should certainly give his support to the Motion of the hon. Member for Finsbury. Anything less satisfactory than the mode in which the Government had dealt with the question it would be difficult to conceive. They had not only acted in a way very little to promote the interests of the Liberal party, but very little calculated to strengthen their position. He believed that the working classes were quite able to obtain an extension of the franchise if they wished, and that the noble Lord (Lord John Russell) could best promote the interests of the Liberal party by changing the distribution of seats. The Bill before the House was altogether for that purpose, and it dealt with it in a manner most unfavourable for the Liberal party. Three of the seats were given to the counties, and, so far as they could judge, to the Conservative party. It was a scheme which ought to receive no support from that side of the House.

MR. DENT said, he could not agree in the view taken of this question by the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Coningham). The question was not whether the Liberal or any other party should be strengthened, but what was best for the good of the country generally in regard to the distribution of the four seats at the disposal of Parliament. He thought the measure, on the whole, a satisfactory one.

MR. HADFIELD said, that the North Riding of Yorkshire had 224,000 inhabitants, and the East Riding 281,000, making together 525,000; whereas the West Riding contained 1,570,000 inhabitants. The southern division of the West Riding contained about 400,000 inhabitants, and the only borough representation for that immense population was Sheffield. The rateable value of the property of the West Riding was no less than £8,126,669, and, therefore, it was entitled to two additional Members. He did not approve, however, of making so corrupt a borough as Wakefield the place of election and nomination for the whole of the West Riding, and he trusted that an Amendment would be made in the Bill, so that the southern division would be entitled to have its election conducted at a place where purity of election had never been questioned or doubted.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL observed, that the hon. Member for Finsbury had urged no satisfactory objection to their proceeding with this Bill. The House, in considering a Bill as amended could take the whole of that Bill into consideration; and when it was argued by the hon. Member that there ought to be a new Bill, they had to consider whether or not it had been totally altered in its provisions, and whether it was a different Bill from that which had been originally introduced? The Bill, when it was introduced, proposed to give an additional Member to the West Riding of Yorkshire, and one to South Lancashire, and also to give one Member to Birkenhead and one to Chelsea and Kensington. The three first propositions were assented to by the Committee, but the proposal relative to Chelsea and Kensington was rejected. He did not wish to argue that question again. A Motion was made by the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Viscount Enfield) that the county of Middlesex should have an additional Member, but that was, likewise, rejected by the Committee. His noble Friend (Viscount Palmerston), with the view of bringing about a settlement of the question stated that he would make or support a proposition that the West Riding of Yorkshire should be divided, and that two Members should be given to each division. That was the only seat now in dispute, and the question was—would they further consider the Bill and say whether it was expedient to divide the West Riding and give it, not one but two additional Members. He thought the original proposition of the Government was a preferable one; but, at the same time, they all knew that the West Riding of Yorkshire, both in point of population, wealth, and the number of electors, very considerably indeed went beyond other counties. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Coningham) said "Oh! but Wakefield, which was in the West Riding, was a corrupt borough." He quite agreed with the hon. Member, and he would be shocked to see a proposition carried for the issue of a writ in the case of that borough; but that was not the question before the House. The question was whether because the borough of Wakefield stood in the West Riding, the latter should be disqualified from having an additional Member? He could not see that that was a just and reasonable proposition. The case was this—a Bill had been introduced to appropriate four seats; three of these had been appropriated, and they had to decide as to the fourth. As to there being anything radically wrong in the proposal, he would remind the House that in many cases which from time to time had been brought before Parliament, including such places as Shoreham, Grampound, and East Retford, Parliament, when it disqualified a borough from returning Members, made a provision for the substitution of some other place. But in the case of St. Albans and Sudbury that course was not followed, because these places were intended to be dealt with and were dealt with in every general Bill that for some years had been introduced for the disposal of seats by successive Governments. No general Bill was introduced this Session, and it only seemed reasonable that Parliament should proceed with regard to St. Albans and Sudbury as it had done in other instances. He saw no force in the objection which had been taken by the hon. Member for Finsbury, and hoped the House would proceed with the consideration of the Bill.

LORD FERMOY said, he did not think the proposition of the Government so very clear as the noble Lord had endeavoured to make it. On the contrary, it appeared to him that the Bill proposed in effect to alter the Reform Bill—one of the most noble and distinguished acts of the noble Lord's political life. The noble Lord had observed that the House had already agreed to the disposal of three seats, and that, therefore, there was only one now to dispose of. If, however, they dealt with the seat in the manner proposed by the Government, they would give the preponderance of representation as regarded the four seats to the agricultural districts. The original proposition of Government was to divide the seats between the urban and the rural districts, two and two. He went further, and said if the House wished to keep up the proportion established by the Reform Bill, they ought to give the whole of the four seats to the urban population. But the Government, as he had said, proposed to divide the seats two and two, and the proposition had in it an appearance of fairness; but in the course of the debate the Government was beaten, and the whole principle of the Bill was reversed. But if there was any question on which the present Government ought to have a fixed principle, and ought to stick to it too, it was on the question of Parliamentary Reform. The Government, however, had been beaten, and the noble Lord, the Member for the City of London, then said it was a small affair, "it was only a little one," and he would be content with one urban representative. But what was the borough that had been struck out? The very best in the list. Metropolitan representatives were, he knew, at a discount in that House. He did not admit that that was right. He would, however, not go into the question. The fact remained that a borough with its tens of thousands of people of education and wealth were bowled out from the Bill, and it was proposed to substitute for it an agricultural constituency. The right hon. Gentleman opposite had been in the habit of saying that Government ought to be a Government of party, but in that case the Government had abandoned all their principles to subserve the convenience of the moment. It was because the Government had not the manliness to stand up as against a majority of the House. Yes; a majority got together on different principles and with different objects. It was because the Government had not the manliness to appeal to the people of England, and ask them who was right, that there was that abandonment of principle, and that Liberal Members felt called on to come down to the House and endeavour to defeat the passing of the Bill. He meant to vote for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Finsbury, and for this simple reason—that he would rather see no Bill at all than to see the Bill before the House pass in its present shape. He would rather see it put off; he would rather see it deferred till the people of England could decide on the question whether they would have anything like a radical reform in the representation of the people. It was a question that would have to be sent to the country to be tried before long; and he thought those who sat on the ministerial side below the gangway would be abandoning their duty to the people if they consented to see such a Bill passed without offering it every opposition in their power.

Lord John Russell

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 204; Noes 28: Majority 176.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

MR. STIRLING:* Sir, I have proposed the omission of South Lancashire from this Bill, because I believe the House has already expressed, so far as it can be expressed by individual speeches, an opinion unfavourable to what are called unicorn constituencies. Members of great authority have stated strong objections to constituencies of this kind; none, I believe, have said a word in their favour. Were a more comprehensive measure to be introduced and passed, I think it is probable that constituencies would be so divided that triple seats would cease to exist. I see no reason why we should now extend an anomaly which we all disapprove. Nor do I see why South Lancashire is better entitled to return three Members than several other of our great constituencies which equal or surpass that important county in the number of their electors.

The chief reason, however, why I seek to amend this Bill at all, is, that I find in this measure for the redistribution of seats, no provision for a great and important interest which is at present wholly unrepresented. The Universities of England and Ireland have a fair and influential direct representation in this House. Deprive them of their Members and still they would be represented here by a large body of graduates and old university men, well-informed as to their interests, and well-disposed to defend them. In the same manner you might deprive any city or county of its Members, and yet the interests of that city or county would be sure to be efficiently, though indirectly, represented by the Members for places similarly circumstanced as regards agriculture, or manufacture, or trade. But this remark is not applicable to our Scotch Universities. These institutions differ so materially from the Universities of England and Ireland, that the Members for those Universities, however kindly they may feel towards the northern sisters of Cambridge and Oxford, cannot fairly be said even indirectly to represent them. Of the Scotch Members who are Scotchmen by birth, only a small number have received their education at their native Universities. Yet, although the attractions of the great English seats of learning may have drawn many of the sons of the wealthier classes of Scotland from their native seminaries, it by no means follows that these are of minor importance as places of national education. Indeed, I may venture to assert that they have a stronger hold upon the affections, and exercise a larger influence on the character of the people of Scotland, than even the great English Universities possess and exercise on this side the Tweed. In England twenty millions of people maintain less than 3,000 students at Cambridge and Oxford. In Scotland a population under three millions maintain upwards of 3,500 students at our four Universities.

On the history of these Universities I need not, and I shall not, dwell. Three of them are very ancient. St. Andrews founded in 1411, Glasgow in 1450, Aberdeen in 1494, have papal bulls among their earlier charters, and belong to the days of the revival of arts and letters. Edinburgh, the youngest of the four, was founded by Royal charter in 1582. Slenderly endowed from the resources of a poor and a rude country, these Universities have ever held an honourable place in the commonwealth of letters. Early in their career they furnished teachers to the universities of fairer and wealthier lands, and in their venerable yet vigorous age they are the survivors of many prouder seats of learning. If in some important branches of scholarship they cannot pretend to a foremost place, they have been the means, for many generations, of diffusing sound knowledge, at a cheap rate, over an entire people. They have been open, not in theory merely, but in practice, to the poorest of our countrymen. Long before England began to think of sending the schoolmaster abroad, these Universities had sent a schoolmaster of considerable erudition to almost every parish in Scotland. English literature has inscribed on its own bright roll the names of many of their professors, especially of those who have cultivated philosophy and political science. To England herself these Northern Universities for long supplied a want—for which she herself has only lately made provision—a place of sound intellectual culture, apart from all sectarian influence.

These facts I think justify me in claiming for the Scotch Universities the character of national institutions, in the British and imperial sense, and in asking the House of Commons to consider their claims to representation in Parliament. The argument that England and Ireland have six University Members, while Scotland has none, is, in my opinion, a strong one; but it depends, of course, for its strength on my power to show that Scotland possesses a University constituency worthy of being ranked with the other University constituencies of the kingdom. The question, therefore, naturally arises, how is this University constituency composed? I must admit, at once, that it differs from those of England and Ireland, inasmuch as it is not wholly composed of graduates. The General Councils of our Universities, created by the University Act of 1858, may be held as strictly analogous in their constitution and power to the Senate of Cambridge and the Convocation of Oxford. In these great English bodies certain degrees have always entitled members of the Universities to sit and vote on the affairs of each University; but in Scotland, until 1858, graduates had no powers of corporate action at all; and degrees were, in fact, mere honorary certificates, of no use or benefit, except as conferring a certain title, and in some cases giving a prefix to the name. There being no great motive for taking them, degrees, except those in medicine, had fallen into general disuse. Degrees in Arts were taken in some of the Universities to the number of perhaps two or three in a year. For the purpose, therefore, of securing to our Universities a really popular element, the Act of 1858 provided that the General Councils of each University should be open not only to graduates, but to all persons who could show that they had previously studied there for four years, or had studied there for three years, and one year in one of the others. Those persons who had not graduated, but who might have done so, were for a time to be entitled to claim seats in the General Council. This time was limited to three years from the passing of the Act, and it expires on the 2nd of August next. From and after the 2nd of August in the present year, graduation will be essential to a place in our General Councils, and these Councils will be completely assimilated in character to the Senate and Convocation of the great English Universities. Meanwhile, the number of graduates in arts has for some years been steadily increasing. In St. Andrews, in 1800, two persons took the degree of Master of Arts. From 1839 to 1859, the average number was about eight. In 1860, after the institution of General Councils, the number was twelve. At

Mr. Stirling

Glasgow the average number, from 1851 to 1859, has been about twenty-five. In 1860 the number was forty-five, and 1861, sixty-four. I am, therefore, justified in asserting that the privileges already conferred by the Act have been highly valued, and eagerly and increasingly claimed.

As regards the composition of these Councils, I believe they represent a far wider social field than the corresponding bodies on this side of the Tweed. In Scotland, University education being much cheaper, has long been more eagerly sought after by all classes. Even allowing that a considerable number of our 3,500 University students in Scotland are strangers, our Scotch students are (proportionally to our population) far more numerous than the undergraduates of the English Universities. The body of graduates annually recruited from this large number of students, will therefore represent all classes of the community. It will embrace nearly all the members of the learned professions, the clergy of all denominations, and the most intelligent persons connected with all branches of trade and industry, commercial, manufacturing, and agricultural. No means at present exists enabling me to offer any precise information as to the relative numbers of the respective classes. I have heard some persons express an apprehension that the clerical profession would be unduly represented, and would, in fact, form the majority of the constituency. I may say that I do not share that apprehension. From an examination of the Edinburgh University Calendar, and the information—conjectural I admit—which I have received from persons likely to be well informed, I do not think the number of clergy of all denominations would exceed one-third of the whole. At Cambridge and Oxford the proportion of the clerical element is far higher than this. At Trinity College, Cambridge, of 1,534 masters of Art, 752 are clergymen, and 784 are laymen. At Christ Church, Oxford, of 315 Masters of Art, 209 are clergymen, and only 106 laymen. It must also be remembered that in Scotland the clerical element is divided into three parts with conflicting views and interests, and that this division will deprive it of much of the power which it might otherwise exercise, and will in a great measure neutralize its influence.

So much for the character and composition of these General Councils. I must now beg the House to turn its attention to their numbers. According to the last Return which I have received, dating from the 5th of June, I find they are as follows:—Edinburgh, 1,980; Glasgow, 842; Aberdeen, 775; St. Andrew's, 322: Total, 3,919; a number already larger than that of the Convocation of the University of Oxford. Nor is this all. I think I can also show good ground for believing that, in this Scotch University constituency, there is a fair prospect of a very large and speedy increase. Look at the numbers of our students:—Edinburgh, has 1,530; Glasgow, 1,182; Aberdeen, 653; St. Andrew's, 143; 3,508 in all. Cambridge I find has 1,529 under-graduates, out of which is recruited an electoral body of 4,889. Oxford has about 1,283 under-graduates, who recruit an electoral body of 3,786. In round numbers, therefore, in the English Universities the proportion of under-graduates to electors may be stated as about one to three. Can any reason be alleged why this proportion may not soon be reached in Scotland? With equal inducements to graduation, I believe it would be found that Scotchmen of all classes would graduate in still greater numbers. But accepting the proportion of England, one student to three electors, the constituency of the Scotch Universities is likely ere long to be, not 3,900, but 10,500, a body larger than all the existing University constituencies put together, larger than the constituencies of Leeds or Sheffield; twice as large as those of Ayrshire, Lanarkshire, Aberdeenshire, Perthshire, and Fifeshire; larger than that of Edinburgh, or any other in Scotland, except that of the City of Glasgow.

It may be also urged that Parliament, in its late legislation for the Scottish Universities, has itself given a strong claim for representation, by confirming and extending a privilege upon which long usage had stamped a political character. In 1858 Parliament found the privilege of electing their rector—an officer invested with considerable dignity and important powers—in the possession of the students of some of the Universities. It was in Glasgow that this rectorial election first assumed a political significance. In former times, the students used to be content to find their rector amongst the civic or provincial notabilities of the west of Scotland. Somewhere about thirty-five years ago, however, they became more ambitious, and conceived the bold idea of choosing him from the front ranks of English statesmen. The English statesmen, I may observe, were quite as ready to accept the honour, as the Scotch students were to confer it. Sir James Mackintosh was elected, and Mr. Brougham, and afterwards Lord Stanley and Sir Robert Peel. Sir Robert Peel's election followed close on his brief tenure of office in 1835; and he seized the occasion of his visit to Glasgow to deliver a speech which was the celebrated political manifesto, with which he opened those brilliant campaigns of opposition, resulting in his reconquest of power in 1841. From that day to this, I remember no rectorial election which was not also in great measure a political contest. Men of letters, no doubt, were sometimes elected, but they were always men of letters who were, likewise, politicians. In 1858, when Parliament was about to reform the Scotch Universities, the question naturally arose, are these political rectors and their elections good things or bad? Is it desirable to extend to them the Universities where they have not hitherto obtained, or to abolish them in those where they have long existed? The opinion of the Scotch Members was a good deal divided on the subject. Some of us thought the privilege a bad one, tending to the disturbance of study, and the formation of premature habits of political partisanship, without any countervailing advantage. Others thought it a useful and valuable privilege, stimulating thought on important subjects, and affording a healthful and intellectual recreation for the youth of a free country. Parliament adopted the view favourable to the privilege and the practice; and finding it in existence at Glasgow and Aberdeen, created it also at St. Andrew's and Edinburgh. Our students all over Scotland now cultivate their political ideas, and indulge their political predilections with the direct sanction of Parliament and the Crown. They invite, with something of the force of a Royal invitation, their rectors from the front ranks of both Houses, and even from the great offices of administration. Only last year the Chancellor of the Exchequer, at a moment of unusual public anxiety, left the new tariff and the new treaty, the wine duties and the paper duties, to put on at Edinburgh the purple robe of a new office, and to address a vast audience—of which 800 students formed a mere fraction—on the benefits of intellectual culture, and the delights of divine philosophy. These rectorial elections, with all the political significance which long usage have stamped upon them, have been deliberately accepted by Parliament as worthy not only of maintenance, but of wider extension. Does not this acceptance almost imply a pledge of doing something more in the same direction? Is it just or reasonable for Parliament to say to the youth of Scotland, "So long as you are students, you shall enjoy a privilege which cannot fail to make you politicians, but remember, when you become graduates, you must take leave of political privilege and political action? As lads, you make excellent electors, but as men, we really cannot entrust you with the franchise. That is a privilege which must be reserved for those who have studied at Cambridge or Oxford, or Dublin, or for those superior beings, the Glasgow whiskey dealers, the Marylebone publicans, the freemen of London or Liverpool, or the forty shilling freeholders of South Lancashire."

Besides conferring what I must consider a semi-political right on the students of our Universities, the Act of 1858 made provision for various reforms and improvements in these institutions which will cost a considerable sum of public money, and have already created a large constituency of intelligent persons taking a warm interest in their affairs and invested with powers of directing them. By its own act and deed Parliament has repeatedly acknowledged the national character and public importance of these institutions. The Reform Act of 1832 gave a second Member to the University of Dublin. At a time, therefore, when intelligence had hardly begun to be considered as a possible basis of electoral right, Parliament acknowledged the value of University representation. You are now giving away four seats. Will you not seize the opportunity of enfranchising a new constituency, in which education and intelligence will be the qualification? In the Scotch University constituency I believe there would be a greater number of persons well worthy of the franchise, but not at present possessed of it or likely to obtain it, than in any other that could be suggested. The fancy-franchises of our late abortive Reform Bills gave rise to much diversity of opinion, but I believe we all agreed in desiring to attain the end to which these franchises were directed—the end of making character and intelligence a path to political power. The creation of these new franchises would have been an experiment, perhaps a failure; the creation of a new University constituency would be no experiment at all, but is a course suggested and sanctioned by a long and happy experience.

I cannot use, and I do not regret that I cannot use, an argument of a private and personal kind, which might have been urged by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle, had he seen fit to bring before the House on this occasion the claim of the University of London to representation in Parliament. I cannot state with any confidence the name, or even the probable political creed of the first Scotch University Member, supposing the Legislature and the Crown were to agree to create one. I cannot appeal to the Treasury bench with the assurance that the new seat would give it a new supporter; nor can I hold out to my Opposition Friends the hope that the new Member will swell our own ranks. I can only assert my confident belief that the Scotch Universities will send us a man well worthy of the honour of holding the seventh University seat in this House. If late rectorial elections are to be taken as any test of his probable opinion, it is not unlikely that he will support Her Majesty's Government. But, on whichever side of the House he may sit, I am sure that he will share the better tendencies of both our political parties. If either party were seized with a paroxysm of faction and folly, I am confident he would go into the lobby with that which retained its sober senses. And the ground of my confidence is, that he would represent a constituency both more enlightened than others and less subject than others to sudden and spasmodic changes of feeling and opinion. He would represent a constituency wholly inaccessible to those external influences to which, in their baser modes of action, Sudbury and St. Albans succumbed, and to which, in their higher forms, broad counties and famous cities have occasionally yielded. Scattered over town and country, the electors of the new University constituency would, each in his own sphere, be in some measure the creators of that public opinion, of which, in their corporate capacity, they would form one of the highest and purest organs. The question which I have the honour to submit to the consideration of this House is, will you give the seat now under discussion to the already largely represented County of Lan caster, or to the ancient and national Universities of Scotland, which are still wholly unrepresented in Parliament? He would, therefore, conclude by moving the omission of Clause 1, with a view to the insertion of the following clause:—

“From and after the 1st day of November, 1861, the Universities of Scotland—that is to say, the University of St. Andrew's, the University of Glasgow, the University of Aberdeen and the University of Edinburgh—shall be entitled collectively to return one Member to serve in Parliament.”

MR. BUCHANAN seconded the Motion.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: Sir, the Motion which the hon. Member makes is that the clause giving one additional Member to South Lancashire should be omitted in order to substitute for it clauses enfranchising the Universities of Scotland. The Motion, in fact, calls upon the House to rescind a decision which they came to in Committee after full discussion, and by a considerable majority. The main argument brought forward in support of this Motion is that the Universities of Scotland are not represented, whereas the Universities of England and of Ireland have representatives. It is manifest that there has been up to a recent date a sufficient reason for that distinction. The constitution of the Scotch Universities was wholly different from that of the Universities of England and Ireland. In the English and Irish Universities the voters were a body of graduates, whereas in the Scotch Universities the practice of graduation was carried to so slight an extent that such a body had scarcely any existence. If, therefore, up to a recent date, a representative had been given to the Scotch Universities, the power of electing him would, in fact, have been vested in a small body of professors and an extremely limited number of graduates, and there would not have been in existence a body, similar to that which exists in the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, and in Trinity College, Dublin, capable of exercising the franchise. Up to a recent date, therefore, I am not aware that there ever was any serious question of enfranchising the Scotch Universities. At the time of the Reform Bill, when all these subjects were considered, no Member was given to the Scotch Universities. A few years ago the constitution of the Scotch Universities was altered, and there is no doubt that now a system is at work by which the graduation is increasing, and the Universities are gradually acquiring a body of persons competent to exercise the franchise; but it can hardly be said, I think, that the time has arrived when it would be desirable to give them that right. Undoubtedly, the Scotch Universities are a highly respectable and intelligent body of persons. They will speedily have a claim to enfranchisement similar to that which has been acknowledged in the case of the English and Irish Universities, and I do not doubt that at some future period their claim will be fairly considered by this House; but it appears to me that, after what has taken place in Committee on this Bill, and in the absence of any sufficiently strong arguments, we should not be justified in giving to the Scotch Universities a representative at present in preference to the southern division of Lancashire, especially since the forfeited seats are exclusively English seats, and, therefore, I trust the House will not agree to the Motion of the hon. Member for Perthshire if he carries it to a division.

MAJOR CUMMING BRUCE said, he was astonished at the argument of the right hon. Baronet—that because a few years ago the Scotch Universities did not furnish a constituency capable of exercising the franchise, therefore, now, when they possessed a body of electors numbering 3,900, the right to return a Member should not be conferred on them. The only reasonable argument which he had heard against the claim so ably and temperately recommended to the House by the hon. Member for Perthshire was that as the forfeited seats were English seats they should in fairness be given to English constituencies. However conclusive that argument might have been deemed at the time of the Union, it could not be urged with any force now, because the Reform Bill of 1832 proceeded upon the principle of departing altogether from the system of representation established by the Act of the Union, and of setting aside the territorial distinctions as between the three divisions of the United Kingdom. That Bill conferred increased representation on Scotland and Ireland, because it was held to be right, whenever occasion arose for remodelling the representative system, to bestow the franchise upon those constituencies which, from their number and intelligence, were best deserving of that high privilege. As these seats had been vacated on account of corruption, it would, in his opinion, be rea-reasonable to confer the privilege lost by them upon a part of the country where no corruption prevailed; and against no constituency of Scotland had such an accusation ever been made. It was said that the West Riding was entitled to an extra Member, upon the ground of wealth and population; but the claim now before the House was not put upon these grounds. The West Riding boasted of the great men—such as Wilberforce and Brougham—who had represented it; but such representatives were due in a great extent to the constituency being the largest in the kingdom; and the importance of the West Riding would, no doubt, be much impaired if the proposition of the Government were acceded to. He did not support the Amendment on the ground of either property or population, but because he was anxious to complete the union of England and Scotland. In England the interests of education and learning were represented by four, and in Ireland by two Members. Scotland possessed no such representation, and its absence was felt to be a badge of inferiority. She asked to be admitted to an equality in that as in other matters. It was true that until within the last few years the want of a constituency furnished a good reason why the Scotch Universities should not be represented. By the Universities Act, for which Scotland was indebted to his learned Friend the Lord Justice Clerk Inglis, supported by the present Lord Advocate, that want had been supplied. There was now in existence a large constituency which was steadily increasing, and the increase of which would, no doubt, be greatly stimulated if the franchise was conferred upon it. It was such a constituency as would, he doubted not, return a Member who would be worthy to take his place beside the representatives of the English and Irish Universities who already sat in that House. He did not mean to say that he would possess the splendid and fervid eloquence of his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Dublin—Scotchmen were not generally gifted with the eloquence which every Irishman appeared to drink in with his mother's milk—nor be gifted with the marvellous ingenuity "to make the worse appear the better cause," for which his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer was so much distinguished; but he would be a sound man, not of extreme opinions, enlightened, educated, Liberal, and Conservative;

Major Cumming Bruce

probably a worthy follower of Adam Smith, whose comprehensive knowledge of detail and depth of philosophical research were so highly commended by Mr. Pitt as furnishing the best solution of all questions connected with the history of commerce or the system of political economy, and an attention to whose teachings upon financial matters, instead of too easy a yielding to the fair promises of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, would prove of great advantage to the country. He hoped that the House would not let slip that opportunity of doing an act of justice to Scotland and conferring a boon upon that House and the country at large.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM: Sir, I shall not follow my hon. Friend who has just sat down into a disquisition upon the rival claims of Irish eloquence, Scotch prudence, and English common sense. I am very glad to be relieved from the necessity of pitting the claims of an English University against those of the Universities of Scotland advanced by my hon. Friend the Member for Perthshire; but, having given notice of my intention to bring under the notice of the House the claims of the London University in the event of a Member being refused to Kensington and Chelsea, I shall very shortly state to the House the reasons which have determined me not on the present occasion to press that claim. I am happy to be relieved from even appearing to deny the claims of the Scottish Universities. I should be sorry to urge any national ground against that claim, and, personally, I am under too much obligation to the University of Glasgow for an honour once conferred upon me not to be the very last man who should contend that the Universities of Scotland are not on a proper occasion entitled to be represented in the Parliament of the United Kingdom. When I undertook to prefer the claim of the London University, I stated distinctly that I could not urge that claim in preference to that of the metropolitan constituency of Kensington and Chelsea. The House has decided against that claim, although it was founded upon numbers, respectability, and wealth; and certainly I should have hoped that, failing that metropolitan borough, a claim might have been recognised on the part of the metropolitan county. The House has, however, decided against any addition to metropolitan representation; and in the present balanced state of opinion in this House I thought that, upon the whole, it was my duty to consult what appeared to be the feeling of the majority on both sides of the House in favour of conferring two additional Members upon the West Riding of Yorkshire. Having consulted the Senate of the University of London and the chairman of Convocation, I have resolved, in conformity with their wish, on not obtruding the claims of that University upon the present occasion on the consideration of the House. But if past pledges are to be remembered, I need only state that when the Reform Bill of the Government of the Earl of Aberdeen was introduced by my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, it was proposed to confer on the London University the elective franchise. So, also, on the last occasion of the introduction of the Reform Bill, under the Government of my noble Friend the noble Viscount, it was proposed in the Bill of 1860 that the elective franchise should be conferred on the London University. If I mistake not, in the year 1852, that claim was brought under the notice of the Earl of Derby, then at the head of the Government, who expressed himself favourably to its consideration; and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, in his place, representing that Government, stated that on a future and fitting occasion he was not indisposed to consider that claim when it should be brought forward. In addition to all this, the Home Secretary of Lord Melbourne's Government, who advised Her Majesty to confer on the London University a charter, did distinctly state on that occasion that it was the intention of the Government in granting that charter that the London University should be placed on a footing of perfect equality with the ancient Universities of the kingdom. I mention these facts, which concur strongly in favour of this claim in the hope that on a fitting opportunity it may not be cast aside. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) has referred, but rather tauntingly, to an expression which I had used on a former occasion when I spoke of "large and comprehensive measures of Reform." Well, Sir, the House on both sides, has had experience of the difficulty of carrying such measures. I hope, therefore, that it will recur to the doctrine of Lord Chatham, and Mr. Pitt, and the early Reformers, who were of opinion that when extensive delinquency was proved against any borough, the proper punishment was a forfeiture of the right of returning Members to this House, that disfranchisement should ensue. My belief is that that would be found, in present circumstances, the surest and most effective punishment of bribery, and the best security against its further inroads on the constituency. Opportunities would not then be wanting of conferring on unrepresented boroughs the valuable right which had thus been abused. If those opportunities should occur, I hope justice will be done both to London University and the Universities of Scotland, and then, I think, there will be a larger infusion into this House of the representation of learning, intelligence, science, and those habits of strict propriety and conduct which superior education, in my judgment, never fails to enforce. On the whole, without preferring the claim of one University to another, on national grounds, my hope is that before very long the elective franchise may be bestowed on both these learned bodies, but on the present occasion, there being only four seats to be disposed of, and these being English seats—three having been now by general concurrence settled, and only one remaining—on the whole, I think that the decision of the House will be more unanimously in favour of giving the fourth Vote to the West Riding than can be expected with respect to any other proposal; and, on the grounds I have stated, I certainly do not intend to prefer the claim of the University of London, which, I think, were it urged, might be shown to be, on the whole, prior to that of the Scotch Universities. I, therefore, satisfy myself by withdrawing that claim for the present, voting with some reluctance against the proposal of the hon. Member for Perthshire, and giving my support to the Motion for assigning the fourth Member to the West Riding.

MR. BLACKBURN observed, that the right hon. Gentleman had not clearly understood the proposition before the House; for his hon. Friend the Member for Perth did not wish to take a Member from Yorkshire, but to prevent South Lancashire from having three Members. [SIR JAMES GRAHAM: That proposition has been already agreed to.] The very hesitating denial which the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had given to the proposal of his hon. Friend the Member for Perthshire was based on two grounds—first, that the time was not ripe for giving representation to the Scotch Universities, there being no proper constituency; and, secondly, that the House had already decided the question, and it was now too late to urge this claim. Now, as to the ripeness of the constituency, he begged to remind the right hon. Baronet that the clauses proposed by his hon. Friend were taken from the Reform Bill of the Government last year; and if the constituency was then ripe for representation why not now? The Scottish Universities had a constituent body of 3,900, while Oxford had only 3,786, and Dublin about one-half the number. The first ground, then, put forward by the right hon. Baronet certainly did not stand him in good stead. Then as to the second ground of objection, that the seat had been already disposed of, he believed that there was a very strong opinion in the House that there should not be a third Member in any county. Besides, it was but fair to remember that the very first proposal for the transfer of seats was that of his hon. Friend the Member for Perthshire in favour of the Scotch Universities. On the ground of property, population, and on the joint basis, Scotland had a strong claim for an increase in the representation. Proportionately to population Scotland should return 71 Members instead of 53; proportionately to revenue and taxation she ought to return 74; and proportionately to the mean between both she ought to return 73 Members. Scotland might claim the whole four seats to be disposed of; but the Members for Scotland had the modesty to put forward their claim to only one. Lanarkshire had much stronger claim to an additional seat than South Lancashire. He did not know what particular interest South Lancashire represented. Cotton was already sufficiently represented; he appealed with confidence to a sense of British justice on the present occasion, and should certainly support the proposal of his hon. Friend the Member for Perthshire.

MR. GRANT DUFF: As a very humble but a very steady supporter of Her Majesty's Ministers, I hope I may be allowed to express, in a very few sentences, my deep regret at the course which they have thought fit to take with regard to this Bill. If they had given one Member to the West Riding, one to Birkenhead, one to the London University, and one to the Scotch Universities, they would have conciliated at once the county interest and the borough interest, the metropolitan interest and the educational interest. They have not done so. I do not think they have the least idea how popular a measure it would have been in that part of the kingdom whence come their steadiest supporters, if they had yielded to the proposal of the hon. Member for Perthshire. It must not be forgot that, while the English Universities are chiefly frequented by the upper classes, the Scotch Universities are chiefly frequented by the middle, and, to a certain extent, by the lower classes. This consideration is a sufficient answer to the reproaches which have been directed by some of my Friends, who sit below the gangway, against the conduct of the Scotch Members about Chelsea and Kensington, as if they had been untrue to the well-known policy of the Liberal party, to increase the power of the middle, and of the better section of the lower classes. Far be it from me to disparage the claims of the London University. I am free to confess that a simple degree at the London University guarantees a higher amount of attainment than a simple degree at the Scotch Universities; but then a simple degree at the London University guarantees higher attainment than a simple degree at the older English Universities. The University of London is a noble growth, but it is a growth of yesterday; whereas the Scotch Universities are some of them coeval with the beginning of true civilization in Scotland, and are connected with all that is best in her history. The greatest evil which afflicts Scotland is the want of encouragement for high scholarship and remarkable attainment. The perferendum ingenium of my countrymen, if not guided by the highest intelligence, may still give trouble to English statesmen, and the best way in which you can aid the development of that highest intelligence is by fostering those Universities which do not at present exercise sufficient influence in elevating the standard of acquirement amongst us, or occupy their proper place in the national regard.

MR. H. BAILLIE said, he would venture to recommend the hon. Member for Perthshire (Mr. Stirling) not to press his Resolution to a division, but to remain satisfied with having stated ably, clearly, and satisfactorily to the House the claims of the Scotch Universities, which he hoped the House might, on some future occasion, be induced to recognize. He must protest, however, against the view of the right hon. Gentleman (Sir George Lewis), that, because these seats were English, they ought to be redistributed amongst English constituencies, as though the Act of Union and the Reform Act of 1832 had not identified Scotland with the rest of the United Kingdom in point of representation.

MAJOR HAMILTON remarked, that he had heard it said that the hon. Member for Perthshire was playing a foolish game in combining with the Irish Members to disturb the Ministry, and that a cabal had been entered into between the representatives of Scotland and Ireland for that purpose. Now, he was not aware of the existence of any such combination or cabal, but, for his own part, he should be one of the first to join in it, and to give the right hand of fellowship to the Irish Members in fighting the battle of the two countries. Numerically speaking, Scotland was not properly represented in that House, and now that the vacant seats were to be filled up an opportunity offered for doing justice to that country. A deputation lately waited on the noble Premier to advocate the claims of the Scotch Universities, and with his usual affability the noble Lord told them he thought a strong case had been made out, but that the remedy was in their own hands; they had only to corrupt a borough in Scotland, and get the Government to disfranchise it, and then its seat might be given to the Scotch Universities. The hon. Member for East Lothian having rejoined that bribery was impossible in Scotland, the Home Secretary, who stood behind the noble Lord at the time, remembering the words of the hymn of their childhood which referred to the work a certain gentleman found for idle hands to do, observed that there was another way in which the Scotch Universities might obtain representation—that Sutherlandshire, for example, and some of the other least populous Highland counties should be conjoined. Now, he could only say, on the part of the Lowlands, that if any attempt of the kind thus indicated were made by the right hon. Gentleman, the card which the Scottish gentlemen would play would not be the nine of diamonds, but a card of a darker suit and fewer spots, and in the words of the Scotch proverb, he would advise the right hon. Gentleman before going to Sutherlandshire to touch the wild cats, to put on a pair of very thick gloves.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he hoped that the hon. Gentleman who had brought forward the Motion would adopt the suggestion of the hon. Member for Inverness-shire (Mr. H. Baillie). The hon. Gentleman had made a very able speech, stating very temperately all the reasons in favour of giving a seat to the Scotch Universities. For his own part, he should be very glad to see those Universities returning a Member, and he could not agree in the proposition that in no circumstances should Scotland have an additional seat, if that additional seat was to be derived from England. Still, when they remembered that no less than eight additional Members were given to Scotland by the measure of 1832, they could not come to the conclusion that the claims of Scotland had been overlooked. That not being an occasion on which the hon. Member for Perthshire could gain anything by dividing the House, it was to be hoped that he would now be content with having stated his case. At a future period that case might be fairly considered.

COLONEL SYKES said, that he merely wished to protest against the attempt being made to throw the Scotch Universities overboard. Everything appeared to be cut and dried, and any appeal by a Scotch Member to the sense and reason of English Members in this matter would be wholly unavailing.

MR. STIRLING said, he was quite satisfied with the discussion to which his Motion had given rise. He desired, therefore, with the permission of the House, to withdraw these clauses. He begged to thank the right hon. Member for Carlisle and the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary for the admission they had both made that the claims which he had ventured to advance were not unfounded.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. COLLINS said, that when the Bill was in Committee he gave notice of a series of Amendments to carry out the object to which the Government had acceded that night. Since then the Home Secretary had laid on the table a series of clauses to the same effect; but on Saturday last the Government proposals were altered in one material particular, inasmuch as the place for holding the election was changed from the central town in the Southern Division of the Riding to Pontefract. It would be more convenient that he should waive his own clauses, and allow those of the Government to be proceeded with, and when they came to the word "Pontefract" he could move that it be struck out.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS then moved to insert the following Clause before Clause 1:—

"After the dissolution of this present Parliament the West Riding of the County of York shall be divided into two divisions, to be called respectively the Northern and Southern Divisions; the Northern Division shall contain the Wapentakes of Staincliffe and Ewecross, Claro, Skyrack, and Morley; the Southern Division shall contain the Wapentakes of Barkston Ash, Osgoldcross, Strafforth and Tickhill, Staincross, and Agbrigg."

MR. BAINES said, he objected altogether to these seats, which were taken from boroughs, being given to counties. He would remind the House that although undoubtedly both Sudbury and St. Albans were small places, they were frequently represented by men who represented large mercantile interests, and not principally by gentlemen connected with the landed interests. As the representative of one of the largest boroughs in the West Riding, he wished to make one remark with respect to the intended division of that important constituency. It appeared to him that there were serious objections to be made to the division of the West Riding, and although he should not object to four Members being given to the West Riding, he must confess that in his opinion Middlesex had a better claim; because in the metropolitan county there were eight Members to 2,800,000 of the population, whereas in the West Riding, important as it was, there was the same number of Members to a population of 1,500,000. But the separation of the present united districts of the West Riding was most objectionable, there being at present one compact feeling throughout the constituency. There was no difficulty in taking the votes at an election for the West Riding in one day, and certainly there would be no saving of expense to candidates by the proposed division. However, he should not divide the House on the subject; though he must confess that he was glad that the importance of Leeds, as a place for holding the election, was recognized.

Clause agreed to.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he would then propose the following clause:—

"In all future Parliaments there shall be two Knights of the Shire to serve for each of the said Northern and Southern Divisions, and such Knights shall be chosen in the same manner, and by the same classes or descriptions of voters, and in respect of the same rights of voting, as if each such Division were a separate county, and all enactments now in force applicable to divisions of counties returning Knights of the Shire to serve in Parliament, shall apply to the Divisions hereby constituted."

Clause agreed to.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he would then move a third Clause to the effect that—

"The court for the election for the Northern Division should be held at Leeds, and the court for the election of the said Southern Division should be held at Pontefract; but the justices of the peace should name the polling places for each of the said Northern and Southern Divisions, and divide such Divisions into convenient districts for polling."

Clause brought up, and read 1st; 2nd;

MR. HARDY said, he wished to call attention to some defects in the framing of the clause. The selection of new polling-places was left to the justices at Quarter Sessions, but it was utterly impossible that the appointments could be made in the brief interval which elapsed between the dissolution and the nomination. It would, therefore, be better to give the justices a power to act provisionally. If new polling-places could not be fixed upon in the time it would be necessary to fall back on the old ones, and the districts apportioned to those being partly in one division and partly in another, much inconvenience would necessarily arise. That was not as trifling an affair as it might at first sight appear, for it affected about 2,000 voters, most of whom, under such a system of polling, would be practically disfranchised. He was also informed that there were only twelve working days for the Sheriff of Yorkshire to make all his arrangements, which would clearly be impossible, unless power were given him to appoint a sufficient number of returning officers. Having only obtained some of his information that day, he was not in a position to move that the clause be amended; but he would gladly place all the facts in the hands of the right hon. Gentleman, and as these clauses were of a purely technical character they could easily be postponed, and brought up in an amended form.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he saw great difficulties in the way of enabling justices to make any provisional arrangement, because in the event of a vacancy occurring before the dissolution of Parliament took place, it was necessary that the present register should be kept in activity. It was extremely difficult to legislate on the particular case, for none of the previous Reform Acts contained anything which could be regarded as a precedent. The information with regard to the position of the sheriff had already been conveyed to him, but the reason he did not propose any special clause on that point was because he thought it better that any number of under-sheriffs should be employed than that an alteration of the law should be made to meet a particular instance. He had no objection to withdraw the three clauses following that before the House, with which he proposed to proceed, and he would consider whether the objections referred to by the hon. Gentleman might not be obviated.

MR. COLLINS remarked, that in the Reform Bill of 1854 the Government overcame the difficulty which the right hon. Gentleman appeared to contemplate by a clause providing that, in the event of an election prior to the dissolution, the register of the two divisions should be considered the register of one undivided county.

MR. HADFIELD said, he would move the omission from the clause of the word "Pontefract," and the substitution of "Sheffield," which he contended was a more convenient place for the nomination and declaration of the poll in the southern division of the West Riding.

Amendment proposed, in line 3, to leave out the word "Pontefract," and insert the word "Sheffield," instead thereof.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he did not think the question raised by the hon. Member one of paramount importance. The polling would not be affected by the selection of Pontefract as the place of nomination and declaration for the southern division of the West Riding. Wakefield had been first proposed, because it was at present a polling-place for the undivided West Riding; but the Government were afterwards informed that Wakefield was not so conveniently situated as Pontefract. The latter would seem to be very central for the southern division.

MR. COLLINS said, he hoped that the first part of the hon. Member's Amendment would be adopted, and Pontefract struck out. Wakefield was at present the place for the central business of the Southern division, and Pontefract would not be as convenient for the electors. Seven of the polling-places were nearest Pontefract, but twelve were nearest to Wakefield. No less than 13,325 of the electors were nearest to Wakefield, while only 4,504, or about one-third that number, were nearest to Pontefract. It might be said that Wakefield had been convicted of bribery, but Mr. Oliveira and his wife were found to have committed bribery and corruption at Pontefract.

MR. MONCKTON MILNES said, he thought that the gentlemen of the southern division ought to be left to settle this question. All the residents of that division claimed was that they might select the place which they thought best for themselves. The question before them was between Pontefract and Sheffield. The general impression was that in times of great political excitement it would be impolitic to have the election in a large and populous borough like that of Sheffield. The question then was whether they would select the agricultural tranquil town of Pontefract, or the somewhat tumultuous town of Sheffield, and he hoped the House would decide that Pontefract was the more preferable of the two.

COLONEL SMYTH said, that in 1854, when the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary brought in his Reform Bill, Pontefract was inserted in the Bill as a place of election. A deputation waited on the noble Lord, of which he (Colonel Smyth) formed one, when the noble Lord stated that Pontefract had been inserted in the Bill by mistake. He, therefore, should claim the vote of the noble Lord against Pontefract on this occasion. Wakefield was in many respects a more convenient place for the election than Pontefract.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he thought there must be some mistake in what had fallen from the gallant Colonel. He had not understood that Pontefract was inserted in the Bill of 1854 by mistake. He was satisfied that Pontefract was more suitable for a place of election than either Wakefield or Sheffield. Wakefield was certainly the most central for the whole Riding, but there was a large portion of the agricultural population who had no opportunity of travelling by railway, to whom Pontefract would be the most convenient place.

VISCOUNT GALWAY said, he thought that Pontefract, on the whole, was the most convenient place of election, but Doncaster had also a good claim to the honour.

Question put, "That the word 'Pontefract' stand part of the Clause."

The House divided:—Ayes 97; Noes 67: Majority 30.

Clause added.

MR. ABEL SMITH said, he had given notice of a Motion to take away the third seat from Lancashire, and to form a borough consisting of St. Albans, Watford, Hemel Hempstead, Great Berkhamstead, and Tring. In his opinion the county of Hertford had not been fairly treated. It used to return six Members—two for the county, two for Hertford, and two for St. Albans. The borough of St. Albans had been a great political sinner for many years, and had been very properly disfranchised. But it had been now disfranchised for seventeen or eighteen years, and hon. Members who were so anxious to condone the delinquencies of Wakefield, might now well agree that St. Albans should have its privileges in part restored. Looking to the importance and population of Hertfordshire, he thought six Members a fair quota. As he had given very short notice of his Motion, he would not press it on the present occasion, but he trusted that in any future Reform Bill the claims of the new Parliamentary borough he had proposed, which would have a present constituency of 1,500 electors, would be duly considered.

Clause 1 (Additional Member for West Riding of Yorkshire and Southern Division of Lancashire),

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he would propose in page 2, line 3, to leave out the words from "the" to "Yorkshire and," in line 4 inclusive, and insert "passing of this Act." The effect of the Amendment would be, that the election would take place immediately after the passing of the Act, instead of in the month of November, as originally proposed.

MR. COLLINS said, that on a former evening he had made precisely the same proposal. The right hon. Gentleman, the Home Secretary, had then opposed it, because of the harvest. Would the right hon. Gentleman now state what steps the Government had taken for the acceleration of the harvest?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that the Amendment had been thought upon the whole to be most convenient. The Bill had made such progress that he trusted the probability against which he wished to guard would not occur, and that the elections might be held under the Bill before the harvest.

Amendment agreed to.

Other Amendments made.

Bill re-committed for Thursday, in reference to certain new Clauses relating to the Elections for the West Riding of the County of York, and to be printed. [Bill 212.]

Mr. Abel Smith

HARWICH HARBOUR.—RESOLUTION.

Order for Committee (Supply) read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, he rose to move the Resolution of which he had given notice with reference to harbours of refuge. In 1844 a Commission was appointed on the subject of harbours of refuge, and amongst others it was found that the harbour of Harwich, from want of proper care, was nearly silted up. It was, therefore, recommended that a sum of money should be granted for the purpose of improving the harbour. It was proposed that a groyne should be erected on the east side of the town, 700 yards in length, to secure a proper force of water. Subsequently it was resolved that the groyne should be only 500 yards in length, and that another should be erected to the eastward of Landguard Point. But the second groyne was never carried out, and the consequence was that the harbour, as a harbour of refuge for large vessels, was likely to be entirely lost. On the 25th of October, 1858, the Trinity House addressed a letter to the Admiralty calling attention to that important subject, and expressing the strongest apprehensions of the utter loss of the harbour for large craft if proper measures were not immediately applied to remedy the evils complained of. That statement of the elder brethren of Trinity House caused the greatest anxiety to the mercantile community connected with the coasting trade in that direction; for the accumulation of sand on the east side of the harbour would not only prove dangerous, but large vessels attempting it in that direction would most probably be lost. The Board of Admiralty replied to the letter by asking the brethren of Trinity House to mark upon the chart the position of the sands to which they referred. That having been done, the Admiralty then stated that they had no funds available for the object in view. This proceeding on the part of the Admiralty was the more extraordinary that various reports had been made to them on the subject from the engineers to the Board. On the 1st July, 1852, Mr. Walker, one of the most eminent of naval engineers, called the attention of the Admiralty to it, and estimated that the cost of the groyne recommended would be only £10,000. These Reports were repeatedly pressed until the 1st of April, 1856, but without effect. He (Captain Jervis) then wrote to the Board of Trade on the subject. The reply he received was that the matter was not within their department, but that it belonged to the Board of Admiralty. He then wrote to the Admiralty. The answer he received was that it was no business of the Admiralty—it belonged rather to the Treasury. He then applied to the Treasury, and he was told that it was a matter for the Board of Trade and not for the Treasury. Under those circumstances he saw no alternative but to bring the matter before the Government generally. He might be told that it was not a question for the Government but that the town should look after its own harbour, but the jurisdiction of that harbour was with the Borough of Ipswich, and from time immemorial Harwich had been looked upon as a harbour of refuge by all vessels that traded along that part of the coast. He had seen as many as 500 vessels run into it of a day. From the prevalence of easterly winds the sands on the south-east coast renders the navigation of vessels in that direction most dangerous. To keep the mouth of Harwich harbour open, and to remove those obstacles, were, therefore, measures of the deepest interest to the mercantile community on the east coast of England. The hydrographer of the navy had given it as his opinion that the matter ought not to be postponed for a single day, as the danger was augmenting more and more every day. Captain Washington also had made a report upon the subject, calling attention to the dangerous extension of the Landguard Point. He (Captain Jervis), therefore, trusted when the Government were asking for a Vote of £160,000 for the works at Alderney, Portland, and Dover, that they would see the importance of providing for the security of Harwich harbour, the works of which only involved a sum of £15,000, as estimated by the engineer of the Board of Admiralty.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words—

"In the opinion of this House, it is the duty of Her Majesty's Government, before applying to this House for grants of money to construct Harbours of Refuge, to take steps that the natural Harbours of Refuge of this Country be maintained,"

—instead thereof.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that he was sorry the hon. and gallant Gentleman should have been inconvenienced by the reference made from one department to the other; but as his application was for a grant of public money, the Board of Trade thought, therefore, that it was a more appropriate subject for the consideration of the Treasury than for the department with which he (Mr. Milner Gibson) was connected. The Board of Trade were quite alive to the importance of the question, and it would be admitted by every one that the filling up of so valuable a harbour of refuge would be a great national misfortune. He had heard it stated, however, that the predictions which had been made were not likely to be fulfilled to the extent that it was supposed, and that the access to the harbour was not likely to be put an end to altogether; but, no doubt, it was possible that the access might be rendered far more difficult than it was at present. The subject should receive the most serious consideration of Her Majesty's Government. He quite admitted that it was a matter of importance, and that the hon. and gallant Gentleman had done good service in bringing it under the notice of the House. He should not anticipate what his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury was likely to say on the financial part of the question, but they knew that estimates for engineering operations of this character were not generally to be relied on, but that difficulties arose in the progress of operations connected with harbours involving a great outlay beyond the original estimate. He could assure the hon. and gallant Gentleman that full inquiry would take place, and that means would be found to deal with the difficulties of the case.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, he was so far satisfied with the reply of the right hon. Gentleman that he would withdraw his Motion.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

House in Committee.

Mr. MASSEY in the Chair.

(1.) £38,214, Royal Palaces.

MR. CHILDERS said, he wished to call attention to the manner in which the Estimates were framed, as he thought great facilities were afforded to the Government for spending more money than was voted, from the system of balances that were allowed to lie over. He hoped to hear from the Secretary of the Treasury that the Government had resolved to adopt entirely the recommendations of the Committee of Public Monies in respect to the Estimates, and that measures would speedily be taken to carry those recommendations out.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that these Estimates in the last year of the unreformed Parliament, when the Duke of Wellington was Prime Minister, were £2,000,000. They were now £7,665,000, and that was £123,000 more than was required last year. He would make no comment on the expenditure on the palaces occupied by Her Majesty, as it did not appear to be extravagant. But explanation should be given of some items. There was an item of £6,377 for repairs, &c., of St. James's Palace. He was not aware that St. James's Palace was occupied by any of the Royal household, and the State apartments were only used half-a dozen times a year. There was another item of £4,775 for Kensington Palace. He wanted to know who occupied that palace, as it was not occupied by any of the Royal Family. There was another item of £6,054 for Hampton Court Palace. It was all very well for members of the aristocracy to have a palace like that to dwell in, with splendid gardens around it, but the public ought not to be taxed for everything required in it.

MR. PEELE said, he would remind the Committee that it was useless to make a comparison between the Estimates of the present time and those before 1854, because since the latter period there had been transferred to the Miscellaneous Estimates many charges, which were previously defrayed out of the Consolidated Fund, and out of the gross revenue before it was paid into the Exchequer. It should also be borne in mind that the census Vote amounted to £127,000, which sum alone was greater than the increase mentioned by the hon. Member.

MR. COWPER observed that it was true that St. James's Palace was not in the personal occupation of Her Majesty, but the apartments for which the Estimate was proposed were the State apartments used on the occasion of drawing rooms and levees. Some of the subordinate officers of the departments of the Lord Chamberlain and Lord Steward were lodged in St. James's Palace. As to Kensington Palace, many parts were in a considerable degree of dilapidation. It required repairs every year, and before long some portion must be pulled down as not being worth repair; but in the present year the sum taken was necessary to keep the walls and roofs in good order. That palace was only partly occupied, and the occupation, such as it was, did not much increase the amount of money that would be required even without any occupation. Hampton Palace was a monument of architectural beauty, and he was sure the House would not grudge money to keep it in repair. The hon. Member spoke of the aristocracy being lodged there, but the apartments were given to persons of very slender means, to the widows of distinguished officers in the army and navy, and to those whose connection with eminent individuals and with men who had rendered public service, entitled them to this favour from the Queen.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he had not been able to discover that there were more than three widows of officers among the occupants of Hampton Palace, and he had not the least objection to granting the use of the Palace to persons of that description. He understood His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief had apartments in St. James's Palace. He did not object to that; but he thought His Royal Highness ought to maintain those apartments himself, and not let the charge fall on the public.

MR. COWPER said, that the Duke of Cambridge had no longer occupation of those apartments, which he left on proceeding to Gloucester House, and the apartments in question were for the most part vacant.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £85,470, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expense of Maintenance and Repair of Public Buildings; for providing the necessary supply of Water for the same; for Rents of Houses for the temporary accommodation of Public Departments, and Charges attendant thereon, to the 31st day of March, 1862."

MR. W. WILLIAMS observed that £4,200 were required for supplying water for the Houses of Parliament and other public buildings and offices. He thought that the Houses of Parliament and most public offices were supplied with water from the fountains in Trafalgar Square. There was also an enormous sum asked for on account of furniture, independent of the item of £26,318 for the maintenance and repair of public offices and the charges attendant thereon. He wished to know why the whole cost was not included in one item, so that the extent of the expenditure might be understood at a glance? The rent paid for offices reached a high amount; £900 a year were paid for a house in St. James's Square for the Tithe and Copyhold Commission. He thought it high time that that Commission should be brought to an end. The Ecclesiastical Commission occupied apartments in Whitehall Place, for which £680 were given, besides taxes. That Commission had an enormous amount of money in hand, and these charges ought to be taken from the backs of the public, those who derived advantage from the Commission being made to defray them. He should take the sense of the Committee on the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £680, the rent paid for the house occupied by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners.

Motion made, and Question,

"That the item of £680, for Rent of 11, Whitehall Place, as the Office of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, be omitted from the proposed Vote."

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH complained of the manner in which the expenses of the public offices were jumbled up together. It would be much more convenient if the Estimates were so arranged that it could be seen at a glance what were the expenses of the public buildings.

MR. PEASE said, he thought that while the Ecclesiastical Commissioners had a large surplus income to dispose of they ought not to come on the public for the expenses of their offices.

MR. PEEL said, these payments were made to the Commissioners, not as the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, but as the Church Building Commissioners, the duties of which Commission had been transferred to them by Act of Parliament some years ago. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners stated that one-fourth of their time was occupied on business that did not properly belong to them, and it was under that calculation that the sum was put down in the Estimates.

MR. CHILDERS said, he hoped the hon. Member for Lambeth would not press his Amendment then, as it would preclude Amendments in preceding items.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that looking to the state of the Committee—there were only twenty-two Members in the House—he would withdraw his Amendment, in hopes that in a short time there would be more hon. Members present to divide on it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. CHILDERS said, he also must complain of the inconvenient manner in which the Estimates for the expenses of the public offices were arranged. He also wished to know why it was that a distinction was made between the Admiralty and the War Departments in respect of money required for buildings? Already £10,000 had been voted for the War Department for purposes precisely similar to those for which they were now called to provide in respect of the Admiralty. Votes for the public buildings ought to be placed altogether. He wished also to know why a large rent was paid for houses in Gato Street, Lincoln's Inn Fields, which were not now occupied by the Government? He should be glad to hear also why so much as £700 a year was paid for the Stationery Office?

MR. LAYARD said, that there was a hideous piece of upholstery under cover opposite Marlborough House at the disposal of anybody who would take it; but, as nobody would take it, they were now asked to vote £340 for its removal to St. Paul's, where it would be placed beneath one of the crypts. He alluded to the car used at the funeral of the late Duke of Wellington, and than which nothing more hideous had ever been invented. The best thing would be to give it to Madame Tussaud, or, if she would not take it, to burn it.

MR. DISRAELI asked whether the Amendment of the hon. Member for Lambeth had been withdrawn?

THE CHAIRMAN replied that it had.

MR. DISRAELI said, the withdrawal of the Amendment had not been heard on that side of the House. Some explanation ought to be given to the Committee of the reason for its withdrawal. The hon. Member for Lambeth, who was a great advocate for economy, moved to omit an item to which he appeared to have a great objection, but the moment it appeared from the state of the Committee that there was a chance of his Amendment being carried he immediately withdrew it. If that item was outrageous in the opinion of the hon. Member, he could not understand why he should have retreated from his Amendment in so nervous and precipitate a manner when it seemed likely that he would effect a reduction.

Well-considered Amendments ought really not to be withdrawn in this hasty manner. The hon. Gentleman and his friends obtained great public credit and esteem for always being in their places on these occasions when the House was there; but it also ought to be known, as a concomitant to this state of affairs, that when they had a majority of their friends present, they invariably retired from any chance of carrying their opinions into effect.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the Amendment had been withdrawn at the instance of the hon. Member for Pontefract, because if it had been pressed to a division, it would not have been competent to move any Amendments on the previous items of the Vote.

MR. COWPER said, the reason why no sum for the repair of the Admiralty Offices was included in the Estimates was that that department itself possessed the machinery for doing all the work which it required. With respect to the houses in Newport and Gate Streets, he had to state that, not being wanted for Government purposes, they were under-let to tenants who paid a rent, the account of which appeared under another head; so that in reality the rent of those houses constituted no charge on the public purse. As to the Wellington car he could only say that, notwithstanding the manner in which the taste exhibited in its construction had been criticised, it was naturally an object of great interest to numbers of Englishmen, and crowds of visitors flocked to see it while at Marlborough House, and that he considered it was not inappropriately placed in proximity to the tomb of the great man whose remains lay buried beneath St. Paul's Cathedral. He might add, in reference to the remarks which had fallen from the hon. Member for Lambeth with regard to the supply of water to the public offices, that that supply was drawn from a deep well behind the National Gallery, and that three engines were constantly employed in pumping up the water from a considerable depth. This year some fresh hose, pipes and stop-cocks were required, which rendered the item under that head larger than it had been in previous years.

MR. BLACKBURN said, he thought the want of respect for the memory of the Duke of Wellington in reality lay in connecting it in any way with the absurd car, for the removal of which a Vote was now asked. In the hope of getting rid of it altogether he should move the omission of the item of £340.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he hoped the Committee would not condemn the car. For the taste of its construction the Government were not answerable; but the noble Lord opposite could, no doubt, give a satisfactory explanation on that point. [An intimation of dissent from Lord JOHN MANNERS.] Whether, however, the car was in good or bad taste, it was a relic connected with the funeral of the Duke of Wellington, and the Committee would not, he felt assured, hesitate to grant the small amount which was asked for under the circumstances of the case.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he always trembled when questions of taste were submitted to the House, and he would not say a word on that subject. He agreed, however, that it would not be right or proper that the car should be broken up, and he thought that the right hon. Gentleman had made a very wise selection of a place in which to deposit it?

MR. ROEBUCK said, he wished to know whether anybody could see the car in the place in which it was proposed to place it? If they could it would certainly be a great hardship.

MR. COWPER said, it would be underground where nobody could see it without going expressly for the purpose. There was a difference of opinion as to the artistic merits of the car; many persons considered it an excellent example of English metal work and worthy to bear a hero to the tomb. He could assure the Committee the car would add to the effect of the arrangements in St. Paul's Cathedral.

MR. BLACKBURN said, he must protest against the notion that any feeling of disrespect to the memory of the Duke of Wellington had prompted his Motion. On the contrary, he did not see why the one failure of the public funeral should be perpetuated. Everybody admitted that it would have been infinitely better that the coffin should have been borne upon a common gun carriage; and, in fact, the disrespect to the memory of the Duke seemed to him to be connecting it with such an abominable abortion.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That the item of £340, for the removal of the Wellington Car from the Courtyard of Marlborough House to the Crypt of St. Paul's Cathedral, and for Works required in adapting part of the Crypt to receive the Car, be omitted from the proposed Vote."

Mr. Disraeli

The Committee divided:—Ayes 26; Noes 52: Majority 26.

Original Question again proposed.

LORD WILLIAM GRAHAM called attention to the item of £4,200 for the waterworks before alluded to.

MR. COWPER said, the item of £4,200 for the supply of water included the water supplied for the Houses of Parliament, the public offices, and the Trafalgar Square fountains. There was a special supply from the well in the Orange Street works to the fountains. This required enlargement, and there would thus be an increase of the bulk and of the effect of the fountains.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he would then move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £680, rent of office in Whitehall Place for the use of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. He thought the public ought not to be taxed for the support of a commission which had such a vast amount of money passing through their hands. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) he might add had imputed to him a very unworthy motive for withdrawing his Motion previously. He had done so partly for the reason stated by the Chairman, and partly because he had no wish to count out the House at a time when there were only some two-and-twenty Members present.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that the Vote had been agreed to for a series of years. It must not be supposed that the Ecclesiastical Commission had been instituted at the wish of the Church, or that the Church had desired that the estates of deans, chapters, and bishops should be transferred to it for the augmentation of small livings. On the contrary, the arrangement had been effected by the interference of Parliament for what it considered and what he believed to be a great public object, the endowment of the less well paid portion of the clergy at the expense of the more wealthy and dignified portion. Besides, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners had latterly performed the duties (which were not light) of the Church Building Commission. It was, therefore, not unreasonable that the country should be asked to pay a portion of the Commissioners' expenses.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he wished to know whether any part of the expenses of the Commission was paid by themselves?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners were trustees for the purpose of dealing with a special fund derived from the income of church lands. They paid, however, a greater portion of their own expenses out of their Common Fund.

LORD FERMOY said, he thought the Commissioners ought to pay the rent of their house. He thought that if that Vote of £600 was refused the Commissioners might occupy Kensington Palace, which was going to decay from want of occupation.

MR. PEASE said, that the operations of the Commissioners were no doubt satisfactory. The Commissioners derived £30,000 or £40,000 a year from the county of Durham, and the people there complained that after paying this amount they should be called upon to pay more from the taxes of the country. He also wished to protest against the statement of the right hon. Member for Bucks, that those who criticised the Estimates did so from a desire to gain popularity, and hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not again attempt to discourage reasonable inquiries on the various items of public expenditure.

MR. DISRAELI said, the hon. Member had misunderstood his meaning. He did not deprecate discussions upon the Estimates; on the contrary, he thought it was the first duty of hon. Members to criticise the Estimates, and to endeavour to effect prudent reductions. What he objected to was, that having ably criticised particular items, and having established a case which in their opinion called for the decision of the Committee, they should recede from challenging that decision because they were afraid of obtaining a majority.

MR. BLACK remarked that, as the Ecclesiastical Commissioners carried on their business for the exclusive benefit of the Church it was hardly fair that the public should be burdened with a portion of their expenses.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners were required by the late Sir Robert Peel to enter upon an inquiry on the part of the State into the Revenue of the Church, and it was only reasonable that the public should bear a portion of the expense.

Motion made, and Question,

"That the item of £680, for Rent of 11, Whitehall Place, as the Office of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, be omitted from the proposed Vote."

Put, and negatived.

MR. LAYARD inquired whether the Government were prepared to place plans before the House for the erection of suitable buildings on the site of Burlington House? Several years ago that site was purchased at a cost of £180,000, and up to that moment nothing had been done to render it available for public purposes. He thought the time had come when accommodation should be furnished at Burlington House for the various public institutions of science and art. The Geographical Society, for example, had claims upon the Government which should not be overlooked.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR said, he hoped the Government would not produce plans for the erection of buildings on the site of Burlington House. Whatever had been done hitherto in the way of public buildings showed that they were not advanced enough in the art of architecture to occupy the vacant ground at Burlington House with buildings of a satisfactory character at present. Considering the large annual expenditure, it was unreasonable to ask the Government to give additional grants either to the geographical or any other private society. He wished to know, however, what the Government proposed to do with the main part of Burlington House. The Royal Society was lodged merely in one of the side pavilions.

MR. LAYARD said, the Geographical Society would be willing to receive premises, instead of the grant, if the Government would provide them.

COLONEL SYKES said, he had understood that Burlington House was purchased for the accommodation of certain societies that had claims on the Government. That accommodation had not been provided, and he should be glad to know if it was intended that it should be provided.

MR. COWPER said, that every inch of Burlington House was now occupied most advantageously for the public by the societies having claims on the Government. No final decision had yet been come to by the Government on many plans before it for appropriating the site and garden of Burlington House; but he hoped in a short time that decision would be made. He did not agree with the hon. Gentleman (Mr. D. Seymour), however, that we had not architects capable of erecting a building that was worth looking at.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £22,400, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the charge for the Supply and Repair of Furniture in the various Public Departments, to the 31st day of March, 1862."

Mr. Layard

LORD WILLIAM GRAHAM said, the Vote included £10,400 for furniture for the Kensington Museum; if it was to furnish the new building there he objected to the Vote, as he objected to the building itself.

MR. COWPER explained that the £10,400 included the expense of all the furniture, both for the old building at South Kensington and for what would be required for the new part of them.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH moved that the Vote be reduced by £10,400.

MR. COWPER said, he feared no scrutiny into this item; the expenditure had been made under strict regulations, and with great economy.

MR. LAYARD said, he hoped the hon. Member would not divide the Committee on this item. He did not think any public money had been better expended.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, the Vote was not for furniture only, but for the Museum fittings; great care had been taken to keep down the estimate.

COLONEL SYKES said, he thought that the museum at Kensington conferred advantages upon the working classes which they could not derive elsewhere, and he hoped the Amendment would not be pressed.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he objected to the expenditure in toto, and he had no doubt, if the Committee passed the vote of £10,000, it would be £20,000 the next year.

MR. LOCKE said, he sat on the Committee on the South Kensington Museum, and he was disposed to agree with the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Augustus Smith). He thought that the South Kensington Museum was going on at a very great pace. They ought to have some explanation of what these fittings were and for what purposes they were intended. He admitted that the museum had done good service, but still they might be paying too much for an establishment of that kind.

MR. COWPER said, a very large addition was to be made to the South Kensington Museum by throwing a glass roof over four sides of a quadrangle. A sum had been voted for that purpose, and that building must be fitted up. These fittings were necessary to enable the South Kensington Museum to exhibit the finest collection of mediæval objects of art and manufacturing industry which existed in Europe, and which must attract the attention and admiration of all who understood the subject. The Department at Kensington had greatly improved the artistic manufactures of Great Britain. Looking at the question in a money point of view, the nation had gained immensely, while, as regarded the objects of recreation, amusement, and instruction of the middle and lower classes, the gain had been ten times the value of the money expended.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, he was at a loss to understand what necessity there was for so great an increase of window room. He complained of the rather insidious attempt to keep up Kensington Museum against the wishes of that House. He had paid great attention to that museum, but he could not tell from whence the large collection for which the fittings were required had come.

MR. GREGORY observed that if the hon. and gallant Member had paid the slightest attention to Kensington Museum, if he had been there lately and had made use of his senses, he would very soon have discovered what the collection was. It was a most important and valuable collection of busts, terra-cottas, and other works of mediæval art, which had been deposited in a room not accessible to the public, and which, to be exhibited, must be placed on tables with appropriate fittings.

LORD WILLIAM GRAHAM said, he understood that the fittings were for the new schools and residences of the officers; not for any new collection.

MR. LAYARD observed that he was surprised at the ignorance which had been displayed in regard to the South Kensington Museum. If that museum had not stepped in at the present time, one of the finest mediæval collections would have been lost. It was absurd to spend £20,000 in purchasing a collection, and then refuse the money requisite to purchase the cases for properly exhibiting the articles.

MR. DILLWYN said, the great unpopularity of the South Kensington Museum was attributable in great measure to the unfair way in which the Votes for it had been brought forward. At first it was stated to be merely a temporary institution, last year it did not appear in the Estimates, and a Committee was appointed, but at so late a period of the Session that the independent Members could not attend, and the majority who did attend were members of the Government, who had it all their own way.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, he thought it would be more satisfactory to the Committee if they received their information in respect to the Vote from the First Commissioner of Works, whose legitimate function it was to furnish it, instead of from the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Gregory).

MR. COWPER said, they might assume that of the Vote about £7,000, would be required to furnish these new buildings, and the remainder for the annual expenditure on the whole building. It was proposed to cover over the quadrangle, and to obtain a large space for the purposes of the collection at comparatively little cost. There was such a readiness among persons possessing interesting objects of industrial art to lend them for exhibition, that, supposing the museum had not sufficient property of its own, it might be filled with specimens lent for a time by the owners. They had an architectural museum to which valuable additions had lately been made. The extent of glass-cases required for such a building must be costly; and chairs, tables, pedestals, and other furniture were wanted as well as fittings.

MR. LOCKE said, he did not regard the right hon. Gentleman's explanation as at all satisfactory. The term "fitting" was a most indefinite one, and he could not understand how £10,000 should be required for tables and chairs.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That the item of £10,400, for the Supply and Repair of Fittings and Articles of Furniture for the Department of Science and Art—namely, Museum, South Kensington, Museum of Geology, and College of Chemistry, be omitted from the proposed Vote."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 25; Noes 140: Majority 115.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(4.) £98,298, Royal Parks and Pleasure Grounds.

MR. BLACKBURN complained of the deceptive nature of the comparative statement of expenditure between this year and last year—an inaccuracy which was common to other Votes in the Estimates. There was an apparent diminution of £2,000 as compared with the Vote of last year, but when all the items were included there was a positive increase of £13,000. The amount asked for was very large, and he would like to know whether £80,000 was absolutely required for the maintenance of the parks round London? The Committee ought to allow a fixed sum, and say that it must be made to do.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he objected to the extraordinary charge for Kew Gardens. For the botanic gardens £12,135 was asked, and for the pleasure gardens £24,262. Then there was a sum of £23,417 for St. James's, Green, and Hyde Parks, but he was at a loss to know for what that money was required.

MR. PEACOCKE said, he was glad the hon. Member for Stirlingshire (Mr. Blackburn) had called attention to the question of the Estimates. The manner in which they were presented was thoroughly calculated to deceive the House. There was throughout the mention of a "probable surplus" from last year. The House ought to have fuller information as to what this surplus was. He thought the same precision ought to be required for those Votes as for the Army and Navy Estimates. There were some items which required explanations—such as £2,800 for the ranger's department in Richmond Park, and £2,020 for the department of the ranger of St. James's Park, those departments costing more pounds than there were acres to look after.

MR. W. EWART said, he wanted to know what were the duties of the deputy-ranger of Hyde Park, and he hoped that when a vacancy occurred in the office the ground now occupied by the deputy-ranger's house would be devoted to public use.

MR. DODSON said, he observed a charge of £2,500 for providing a walk and ride near the Serpentine, and he wished to ask how that money was to be expended? There had been a walk near the Serpentine, but it had been stopped and converted into a ride by simply putting up hurdles to prevent persons from walking there.

MR. DILLWYN complained that the enormous sum of £23,000, which was quite a nobleman's income, was expended on those parks. He thought it quite right that the parks of the Metropolis should be kept in good order for the enjoyment of the public, but surely that was a preposterous sum to expend upon them. He hoped further explanation would be rendered to the Committee.

SIR JERVOISE JERVOISE said, he thought that as the property in the neighbourhood of the parks was increased in value by the improvements in the parks, it was not right to make the nation at large pay for all those improvements.

LORD FERMOY said, he thought there was some reason to complain of the way in which this Estimate had been drawn, the money for two very different things being put into one Vote without saying how much for each. Thus there was an item of £2,500, which was said to be for a walk and ride near the Serpentine.

MR. COWPER said, that as to the form of the estimate the mention of the probable surplus of former grants was an arrangement which in the early part of the evening met with great approbation from hon. Gentlemen. It had been adopted in pursuance of the recommendation of a Select Committee. It did not mislead, because the total estimate was given, and the probable surplus being deducted would leave the net amount. As to the walk and ride being included in one Vote, that was a misprint. It ought to have been simply "a walk;" the word "ride" was mistake. Every Sunday afternoon a very large number of persons were walking on what was formerly grass, but was now a very bare and ragged strip of land. Since the public seemed to have made up their mind to use it for a walk he wished to render it suitable for that purpose, it was 2,000 linear yards in length, from Hyde Park Corner to Kensington Gardens. The distinction between the rangers' department and the department of the Office of Works was one of form and not of substance. When Hyde Park, Greenwich, and Richmond Parks were kept as parks for hunting deer, the office of ranger was more required, the lodges and the grazing of cattle were under his direction. As for that part of the parks near the Serpentine which was occupied, as it was likely that some years might elapse before the house there could be pulled down, it was thought desirable to make it as convenient as could be, and, therefore, £2,000 was asked for that purpose. With regard to the expense of the parks in general, that for the Green Park and Hyde Park was less than in previous years, and yet there had been increased accommodation for the public. There had been an increase of convenient walks and of flowers, and more comfort and recreation had been supplied to the public for the money than heretofore.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, that the form of the Votes gave as the total amount a sum less than was likely to be required, because the surplus of former years was to be taken into account. Some days ago the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, speaking of the subject, said that was an approximation to what the Committee on Public Monies, and other Committees had recommended; but he (Sir Stafford Northcote) did not think that a fair description. What the Committee desired was that these Votes should come before the Committee in the same form as the army and navy Votes—namely, that Votes should be taken for the money actually to be paid during the year, and that if there was any surplus at the end of the year it should be surrendered. Such a plan enabled them to compare one year with another, which they could not do while the present practice was adopted. The surplus of £296,000 from last year ought to have been surrendered to the Exchequer, and Votes larger than those now asked for by that sum ought to have been proposed.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he could not admit the fairness of the criticism, considering the quarter from which it proceeded. The hon. Gentleman imagined that he had discovered a practice which greatly deluded the House of Commons, but the Government in following it, and cutting down the Estimates by means of the balances from the preceding year, had carefully informed the House what they had done. But in the year 1858 the same course was taken by the Government, of which the hon. Baronet was a Member, but he did not recollect that in that year any notice was given that that course had been taken. It was then announced that the Miscellaneous Estimates would be less than they were the year before, and so they were, because the balances were drawn upon to such an extent that upon some Votes there was left an insufficient provision for the wants of the year. When he said that it was an approximation to the state of things recommended by the Public Monies Committee he did not mean that it was to be the permanent condition of things, but only that it was a state of transition to the complete carrying out of the recommendations of that Committee. As regarded the merits of the question, he believed the description given by his hon. Friend was entirely inaccurate. For the last three years the balances of the Estimates for the miscellaneous services had been considerably drawn upon, but in no single instance had the total expenditure equalled the amount voted—not even in the particular case where the hon. Baronet claimed for the late Government the merit of originality in the course which they adopted. Undoubtedly, when the House voted money for 202 services with 202 margins, it followed that the general effect was to make a provision largely in excess of the actual requirements. He had for years advocated the principle that balances ought to be paid over to the Exchequer, and he hoped they would soon be able to give full effect to the recommendations of the Public Monies Committee.

MR. PEACOCKE said, he thought the Government entitled to credit for the efforts which they had made to fulfil some of the recommendations of the Committee, and for that reason he had supported the Motion for a Vote on account, in opposition to the party with whom he usually acted. But the Committee had a right to ask whether next year the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be prepared fully to carry out the recommendations of the Committee.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, his right hon. Friend the Chief Commissioner of Works had given no explanation of what appeared to his untutored mind an extraordinary demand for the pleasure gardens at Kew. Year after year there was a continued increase in the demands for parks and gardens, and as long as the heads of departments lent a willing ear to the representations of their subordinates there would never be a cessation of these growing calls on the public purse. Such items in moderation were not grudged, but if carried to excess a revulsion of feeling would some day manifest itself, which would eventuate in the total suppression of these pleasure grounds. The House being called upon to vote money for works already half executed, had no opportunity of judging of their desirability.

LORD JOHN BROWNE said, he wished to remind the Committee of the circumstances connected with the erection of the temperate-house at Kew Gardens. Some years ago great complaints were made that valuable plants and trees were being destroyed for want of a proper house, and the necessity for such a building was strongly urged on the Government of the day. A pledge was given that it should be erected at a cost of £30,000; and by a majority of ten to one that decision was afterwards supported in the House. In accordance with that vote contracts were entered into, and it was rather late in the day for hon. Gentlemen now to come down and open the subject afresh.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, he thought the works at Kew were a credit to the Government. He would also congratulate the Chief Commissioner of Works (Mr. Cowper) on the improvements he had effected in Battersea Park, which formed a most agreeable place of recreation for the large population congregated on both sides of the river.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he would ask the right hon. Gentleman to state the amount of the expenditure on the ride in Kensington Gardens?

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, it ought to be matter of praise rather than blame that the heads of particular departments attached importance to the interests confided to them, and pressed them upon their superiors. It was not the influence which they brought to bear, but that which the House itself put upon the Board of Works, that caused the large expenditure at Kew, which was complained of. Having himself been instrumental in inducing the House to agree to the expenditure at Kew, to which allusion had been made, he was by no means ashamed of the part he had taken.

MR. SLANEY said, he wished to return his acknowledgments to the right hon. Gentleman for the improvements which he had carried out for the public advantage. He hoped it might be possible at a future day to establish some pleasure grounds in the south-west district of the Metropolis.

MR. LYGON observed that the expense of erecting a drinking fountain in St James's Park was £100, while in Regent's Park it was £150, and he should like to hear the discrepancy explained.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY said, that Kew Gardens were the only public establishment of the kind that were a credit to the country. He was surprised at the limited cost for which they were maintained. He had only one fault to find, and that was that for a large portion of the year there was but one means of ingress and egress to the gardens, and that was at the Kew side.

LORD FERMOY remarked, that another entrance was very much wanted to the Kew Gardens, which certainly were a great credit to the country. With regard to the new ride in Kensington Gardens, he thought, although the riders were admitted in the least objectionable place, the general feeling was that it was an invasion of the rights of the public.

MR. DILLWYN said, he did not intend to oppose the Vote, but he hoped that next year the right hon. Gentleman would give the House an account of the way in which the large sums voted for the parks were expended.

MR. PEASE approved of the expenditure in St. James's Park and Hyde Park, which were public parks from time immemorial; but he strongly objected to the large expenditure for Battersea Park, amounting last year and this to £17,000. He objected to the continual laying out of new parks in the Metropolis at the expense of the country generally. He would divide the Committee if he thought he would be supported in a protest against that system.

MR. CLAY also complained of the heavy demands made for water supplies to the parks.

MR. COWPER said, the temperate house in Kew Gardens would soon be complete, when, no doubt, there would be a great influx of persons there in the winter. The pleasure gardens would then be thrown open in the winter, and additional access given to the gardens. As to the water supply to the gardens generally, the sum set down for it included also the labour, the water carts, and the horse hire. He did not think it was necessary for him to enter into details as to the cost of the parks, for last year the Estimates were referred to a Committee, and no recommendation of a diminution in those Estimates was made. The new Kensington ride had not cost more than £20, and that sum had been defrayed out of a Vote of £250 of last year.

Vote agreed to.

"That a sum, not exceeding £54,692, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for Works and Expenses at the New Houses of Parliament, to the 31st day of March, 1862."

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he could not but complain of repeated demands on the account of the new Houses of Parliament, after it was understood that the last of them had been paid. They began the Houses of Parliament with an estimate of £700,000, and ended with an expenditure of £2,500,000. For many years he and others had tried to draw this expenditure to a conclusion, and it was owing entirely to the late Sir William Molesworth that a termination was arrived at. It was then settled that the sum of £180,000 was to cover every cost. But what had happened? They were now asked to vote an item of £20,895 which had been expended by the late distinguished architect without authority. The Committee had a right to expect some explanation, and to ask whether they had yet got to the end of this expenditure. A more prodigal expenditure of money he never heard of.

MR. COWPER said, that no doubt it appeared upon the face of the Estimates that a sum of £20,895 had been spent beyond the estimate prepared by Sir Charles Barry in 1859. He agreed with the hon. Baronet that this excess was a matter to be deplored. It could, however, be traced to the course that was taken in the beginning. A contract in gross would have furnished better security against an excess of the Estimates, than confidence in the architect. The architect had exercised a general authority over the works without being subject to effectual control. He was responsible to a Committee of the Commons and to a Committee of the Lords, then to a Commission. He had many masters, but none were able to control the expenditure. It was a long story but everybody agreed that the arrangement had been a mistake. With regard to the item of £20,895 in the present Estimate "for the completion of the unfinished portions of the entire building," an explanation would be found in the annexed correspondence. He would admit that it was not entirely satisfactory, but since Sir Charles Barry had been removed by death it was impossible to get the detailed explanations which he alone could give. Sir Charles Barry had authority to expend the money, and he made periodical returns, but they did not give all the information desired. The works for which the sum was now taken were necessary. They ought to have been included in the specification of 1859, but were not. But although the Committee were asked for the sum of £20,895, it was more than covered by a balance of £35,000 recently surrendered which had been saved in other directions. With regard to future expenditure, Mr. Edward Barry had undertaken to make half-yearly reports, giving in detail the expenditure on the works for which this Vote was taken. There was no reason to doubt that the sum of £20,985 would be sufficient, under the management of Mr. Barry, to complete the building.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, there was an item in the Vote for statues of four British Sovereigns. Who were they? They had statues of all the British Sovereigns about the House, and in St. Stephen's Hall statues also of great and distinguished men. But there was an absence of the statue of the greatest man, the greatest soldier, the greatest statesman, the wisest governor, and the greatest friend of liberty the country ever had. He need not add that he meant the Protector, Cromwell. Historians were beginning to throw light on his before blackened character. Was the Government, he would ask, about to give a statue to this great man? The public—some of them, he meant—were willing to do so by subscription. To that he would never consent. The statue to that illustrious man ought to be erected at the national expense.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, there was an ambiguity in Mr. Barry's letter; in consequence of which he would ask whether the "£20,000 to finish works in hand" would finish the building? Of course there would be ornamental work; but would the building be substantially finished for that sum? The north-west corner of the building, under the clock tower, was incomplete. Sir Charles Barry had a magnificent design, which he remembered was lithographed, having an immense court in Palace Yard, with a beautiful screen of decorative architecture, which was to cost the modest sum of £900,000; and the gap in the clock tower was, he believed, left as a hint that such a grand scheme was to be carried out at the public expense. Was anything included in this £20,000 for removing this blot in the wall?

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, he also would be glad to know whether any further sums were to be called for beyond the £20,000 to complete the Houses of Parliament, as well as whether there were any plans or specifications of the works required for that purpose?

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK remarked, that although Mr. Dyce had been paid £560 for the fresco he had undertaken, he had executed very little of his work; and he wished to know whether any steps had been taken to bring him to a sense of what was due to the country? As long ago as 1857 the Commission on the Fine Arts wrote to him that his work ought to be finished by the following year. Perhaps the First Commissioner of Public Works would inquire into the state of the frescoes, and would he apply the unexpended balance to that work?

MR. LAYARD remarked, that the First Commissioner on a former occasion had stated that the condition of the frescoes was owing to the badness of the materials used in laying on the "intonico" or plaster on which the picture was painted. That plaster came from Munich, where frescoes painted on the same foundation were also "going." Some of the artists who had painted the frescoes in the Houses of Parliament were willing to repaint their works, but they wished it to be perfectly understood that the material to be painted upon must be good. He would suggest the appointment of a Commission, to comprise chemists among its members, to examine into the nature of the plasters, for in some places frescoes were good after being painted hundreds of years.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, he wished to know whether the First Commissioner had come to any determination as to the various processes for preserving the stone of the Houses of Parliament?

MR. COWPER said, that a Commission of scientific and experienced men was investigating the last-mentioned subject, and had not yet reported. The explanation of the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Layard) confirmed what he had previously stated. If the decay were not attributable to the manner in which the colours had been applied, but to a defect in the plaster, he still thought that the artists ought to have satisfied themselves of the proper quality of the plaster upon which they painted before they commenced their work. The more recent frescoes did not exhibit the same signs of decay as those first executed. No Vote was required for frescoes this year, because there was a balance in hand. Allusion had been made to Mr. Dyce's conduct in a recent Report of the Fine Arts Commission, and he was not aware that that gentleman had challenged the allegations in the Report. The hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. Williams) had expressed a wish that there should be a statue to Oliver Cromwell. That distinguished personage had not been forgotten, and in the list of persons to whom statues might be erected, which had been published in an appendix to one of the Reports of the Fine Arts Commission, the name of Oliver Cromwell appeared, but no place in the building had been assigned to his statue. In reference to the question of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bouverie), he might say that the Vote of £20,000 was intended to complete all those portions of the Houses of Parliament which were now in hand, but did not include any of the designs sketched out by Sir Charles Barry for the enclosure of New Palace Yard by two additional wings. It would be premature to come to a conclusion as to what should be done with the site until the houses in Bridge Street were pulled down, and those houses would not be pulled down for another year. None of the £20,000 was intended to fill up the rough wall of the Clock Tower.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, the completion of the unfinished part of the wall of the Clock Tower was provided for by a Vote taken two years ago.

MR. LAYARD said, he wished it to be understood that the painters had nothing to do with putting up the plaster on which the pictures were painted. For any defect in that the persons employed by the Government were responsible.

MR. E. BALL said, that no great body ought to be ashamed to acknowledge Oliver Cromwell as the originator and founder of England's greatness. Oliver Cromwell was one of the chief conservatives of his age. He was the originator of the Navigation Laws. Without those laws England would never have been mistress of the seas, and, therefore, to Oliver Cromwell was owing the greatness of this country. In addition to that every one must acknowledge the high standard of moral principle and rectitude maintained by Oliver Cromwell. While monarchs were unobservant of their word, the word of Oliver Cromwell was always binding. While there were soldiers who regarded neither the laws of God nor man, his soldiers regarded their commanders, and paid reverence to the great Commander of all. When he spoke in terms of respect of Oliver Cromwell he was not wanting in reverence for the Royal Sovereigns who followed or preceded him. He felt no diminished attachment to monarchy, and he was no less sensible of the privilege of living under such a monarch as now governed these realms. At the same time he was not ashamed to say that there were many parts of the history of Oliver Cromwell which monarchs would do well to study and imitate. Oliver Cromwell possessed those great qualities of moral worth, indomitable courage, and unwavering attachment to his country, of which no monarch and no Englishman could ever be ashamed. He hoped that the statue would not be placed in some obscure or hidden corner, and that it would prove to all future ages that worth was always recognized, and that truth would always prevail.

MR. GREGORY said, he wished to have a reply to the question as to who were the four sovereigns who were mentioned, because last year they had a pleasant debate upon whether they were to have some Saxon kings, or some of the Georges, and many hon. Members would like to know if they had escaped that infliction?

MR. TITE remarked, the great decay in the frescoes was confined more particularly to one, which must have arisen from some accident or carelessness in the workmen; but the part could be cut out and be replaced with new painting. He said the quality of the plaster depended on the purity and age of the lime employed.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he had no objection to a statue to Oliver Cromwell, or to additional frescoes; but he had an objection to additional taxes being taken out of the pockets of the English people. He wished to have a distinct answer as to whether they had done with the designs of Sir Charles Barry? Was there to be an end to the expenditure on the House? He did not allude to the buildings to be erected where the houses now were which were to be pulled down, but was there to be additional expenditure on the House itself? If the question were not answered honestly he should move the omission of the sum from the Vote.

MR. COWPER said, that the sum now asked for would complete the residences, approaches, and everything that was understood under the term "Houses of Parliament," but he guarded himself against expressing any opinion with respect to what was to be done with New Palace-yard hereafter. That was not a portion of the Houses of Parliament, and future consideration must determine whether the northern side should be closed with buildings. He also wished to guard himself against being supposed to be committed to the erection of a statue of Oliver Cromwell. All he had said was that the name of Oliver Cromwell was to be found in the appendix of the Fine Arts Commission among men to whom statues might hereafter be erected. With respect to the statues in the Royal Gallery, the Fine Arts Commission had been engaged for twenty years in endeavouring to develop and elevate art in its application to those buildings, and, as the Royal Gallery required sculpture as well as painting to complete it, it was proposed this year that four statues out of twelve in all should be placed in four prominent positions of that gallery. The statues were, he understood, to be a chronological series of the Sovereigns of this country. The sculptors selected were rising men whose talent deserved encouragement. [Cries of "Name!"] They were Mr. Theed and Mr. Thorneycroft. Sculpture required more public encouragement than painting, because there were fewer opportunities of employing it in private houses.

MR. GREGORY said, that the Committee had now come back to exactly the same point which was decided last year. It was then distinctly understood that the House would not enter upon the expense of having a whole chronological series of British sovereigns; but that a selection of four of the most eminent should be selected for representation in sculpture, and the statement now made by the right hon. Gentleman showed a desire on his part to set aside that decision. He should, therefore, move that the Vote be reduced by £3,200, the cost of the four proposed statues.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, he wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman included in his statement all the expense occasioned by the decay of the building before its completion? With regard to the statues, he was one of those who considered, if there were to be statues in illustration of English history, that it would be a perfect farce to exclude the statue of Cromwell—one of the most remarkable men in history. He did not wish to hold him up as an example; but his energy and firmness had swayed Europe in a way that few British statesmen had been able to do, and it would be a mockery and delusion to attempt to illustrate British history by statues and at the same time to exclude the statue of Cromwell.

MR. STIRLING said, he desired an explanation of the item of £6,455 for the furniture and repair and cleaning of furniture. With regard to the four sovereigns, he thought the Committee, before voting the money, should know who they were to be. Were they to be sovereigns known in history, and whose portraits were known, or sovereigns of that mythical kind who were sculptured first and christened afterwards?

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, the hon. Member for Galway was a little hard on the scheme. What the House declined to agree to last year was that there should be a chronological series beginning either at the beginning or at the end; and what was now proposed was that the series should begin in the middle. He (the noble Lord) sincerely hoped that the Committee would not attempt to determine what kings should have statues? If they did, they might depend upon it that the debates they would have as to the appropriation of these four seats would exceed those which they had just finished upon a similar question. They had better leave the decision to the responsible Ministers of the Crown.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I join with the noble Lord in recommending the hon. Gentleman to be warned by his past experience. He has seen how difficult it is to form a Committee. He had the charge of forming the Galway Committee, and great difficulty he had in selecting a few names from the body of the House. If he undertakes to form a committee of Sovereigns who are to sit in this Royal Gallery he will find it still more difficult to satisfy, not himself, but the public at large. The question is a very simple one. The object for which the Fine Arts Commission was appointed was to forward and promote the arts of painting and sculpture in connection with the construction and ornamentation of the Houses of Parliament. Paintings have been placed in the Royal Gallery, and it was thought—and justly, in my opinion—that it was a proper site for works of sculpture. Then the question comes, what works of sculpture are most appropriate for the Royal Gallery, through which the Sovereign has to pass? Would you have allegorical statues of heathen deities? No; you would naturally put in it statues connected with the history of the country. You cannot obliterate the history of the country. One man, as he reads over history, may think one Sovereign good and another bad, but there they are—they are persons who have reigned, and whose reigns form part of the history of the country. Here it is proposed that in this gallery should be placed a certain number of statues, and naturally it seems to me they should be statues which represent portions of the history of the country. The way in which they are identified with portions of our history is by being statues of Sovereigns who have reigned in remarkable periods of our history. I do not know who are to be selected; but I quite agree with the noble Lord that the selection should be left with the Fine Arts Commission, with whom the House may find fault afterwards, rather than with the House, which would only have itself to reproach if it changed its mind.

Motion made, and Question,

“That the item of £3,200, for statues of four British Sovereigns, to be placed in the Royal Gallery, under the directions of the Commissioners on the Fine Arts, be omitted from the proposed Vote.”

Put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow; Committee to sit again To-morrow.

EAST INDIA (HIGH COURTS OF JUDICATURE) BILL.—CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration read.

Clause 4.

MR. BUTT said, he wished to insert two clauses, the first of which was to the effect that the Indian Judges should, like the Judges in England, hold office during good behaviour, instead of during Her Majesty's pleasure. The second Clause provided that whenever an Indian Judge was removed, the fact of his removal should be communicated to Parliament.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, the present law as to the removal of these Judges had been in existence many years without any complaint of having been made. He opposed the Amendment, and it was negatived.

Clause brought up, and read 1^o.

Motion made, and Question, “That the Clause be now read a second time,” put, and negatived.

Another Clause—

“Provided always, ‘That when any Judge of the High Courts shall be removed from his office, a copy of the warrant or other instrument removing him, together with a statement of the reasons for such removal, shall be laid before both Houses of Parliament by one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State within ten days after the issuing of such warrant, if Parliament shall be then sitting, and if not, within three days after Parliament shall next meet.’”

—brought up, and read 1^o.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Clause be now read a second time," put, and negatived.

Clause 6.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he had to propose an Amendment, the object of which was to prevent injustice being done to existing Judges.

Amendment agreed to.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he wished to add a proviso at the end of the clause by which any covenanted civilian appointed or transferred to any court should be entitled to a retiring pension, the same as that of the other Judges appointed under this Act.

MR. SPEAKER said, as the clause imposed a charge on the revenue it could not be put unless it was first agreed to in Committee.

Clause withdrawn.

Bill to be read 3^o To-morrow.

WINDSOR SUSPENDED CANONRIES BILL. SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he had to move the second reading of this Bill, the object of which was the appropriation, out of the eight suspended canonries, the proceeds of which were payable to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, of the profits of one canonry for the benefit of the military knights, on the Royal foundation at Windsor, and the profits of another of these canonries in augmentation of the benefices of the vicar and the perpetual curate of the district church of the Holy Trinity in Windsor.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he objected to the Bill on the ground that it reversed the principles on which Parliament had of late years dealt with Ecclesiastical property of that description. One of the canonries consisted of the tithes of the parish of Wraysbury, which, in point of fact, was much more miserably endowed than Windsor was.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, that as one intrusted with the administration of these funds, he must protest against such an application of the revenues of one of the suspended canonries. The principle was one which might be carried a great deal further, and might destroy the effect of much useful legislation.

MR. AYRTON said, that if the object of the Bill was to give to the Military Knights of Windsor, out of the revenues in the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, an advantage which they had never before enjoyed, and to which the highest Court of Appeal in the realm had declared they had no right, it was a very extraordinary measure indeed. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had on other occasions opposed, on the ground of principle, a diversion of ecclesiastical funds for which he now sought a legislative sanction.

MR. G. W. HOPE contended that the Military Knights had an equitable, though not, perhaps, a legal claim to the allowance the Bill proposed to give them. As a Royal foundation, the chapter of Windsor, he thought, was bound to make provision for the living of Windsor.

MR. DEEDES said, he had great sympathy for the Military Knights of Windsor, but he could not help thinking that the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman was a strong one, in giving to these knights what the law had decided they were not entitled to. He could not agree either to the proposal for increasing the livings of Windsor out of the fund. But he would not divide the House at that stage.

Bill read 2^o, and committed for Thursday.

COURTS OF JUSTICE BUILDING ACT (MONEY) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. COWPER proposed that this Bill should be read a second time and referred to a Select Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. LYGON urged that there were valid reasons why the question of site should be also referred to the same Committee.

MR. COWPER said, the question of site formed no portion of the Bill; and if it were referred to the Committee, it would be tantamount to the rejection of the measure this Session.

MR. GEORGE moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Debate be now adjourned," put, and agreed to.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

House adjourned at Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

*Tuesday, July 2, 1861.*MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^a Local Government Supplemental.2^a Landed Property Improvement, &c. (Ireland).THE DUKE OF MODENA AND THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY said, that before the Orders of the day were proceeded with he wished to give a notice for Monday next, and as the subject which he intended then to bring forward was of a somewhat peculiar character, he thought it would be more convenient to the House, as well as more fair to the noble Lord opposite, if he stated one word of explanation as to the ground on which he would bring the subject forward. He had been appealed to by persons who were much interested in the fair fame of a deposed Prince—the Duke of Modena—to vindicate his character from certain charges which for the last three months had been circulated through Europe, in the name and on the authority of a British Minister—the Chancellor of the Exchequer. That right hon. Gentleman referred to a publication as the ground of his charges. He (the Marquess of Normanby) had been furnished with a specific answer to each one of these charges. When he brought the matter forward he would have an opportunity of explaining to their Lordships the character of the publication in question, and he thought they would feel that the right hon. Gentleman would better have consulted the responsibility of his high position if he had not made those specific charges without inquiring a little more into their truth. He intended to move for a Copy or Extracts of any despatch relating to the Duchy of Modena from Her Majesty's Minister at present in Central Italy during the years 1855, 1856, and 1857. Their Lordships would feel that this was a very serious question when he told them that he was credibly informed that the Duke of Modena was quite horrified by the charges which someone's malignant imagination had made against him, and which had been so lightly adopted by a high authority, that he should consider himself as morally guilty of murder if the charges were true. If he could not bring on the subject upon Monday, he would postpone it to some subsequent day.

LORD BROUGHAM said, that as the character of the Grand Duke of Modena was attacked by the Chancellor of the Exchequer he hoped the noble Marquess would see that it would be much more conducive to the vindication of his Royal client, if his defence were made in the House where the charges were preferred. If the noble Marquess persisted in his notice, the Grand Duke would be defended where he had not been accused, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be attacked where he could not defend himself. He presumed that the object of the noble Marquess was partly to defend the Duke of Modena, and partly to attack the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY said, he would have taken the advice of the noble and learned Lord if his opinions on these subjects had been what they all admired ten years ago. If there was any irregularity in the Duke of Modena being defended in one place when he was attacked in another, it rested with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who had brought a wanton accusation against a deposed Prince upon authority which was unworthy of credit. The attack was uncalled for, as it had nothing to do with the subject under debate when it was made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and it went forth to the world as having the sanction of Her Majesty's Government. He should not take the advice of his noble and learned Friend, but should defend an absent and otherwise defenceless person, who had been driven from his country by the arms of a neighbour.

LORD BROUGHAM rose to address the House, but desisted on cries of "Order."

EARL GRANVILLE said, that if it was a question of Order, the noble Marquess was most open to reproof, in having used the opportunity of giving a notice to make rather detailed statements, and in giving a notice that a week hence he would deliberately commit the very disorderly act of making a speech in reference to a speech which had been delivered in "another place."

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY, amid continued cries of "Order" said, that he gave the notice with the explanation he had added, in order to give the colleagues of the Chancellor of the Exchequer some idea before hand of the subject to which he meant to refer.

SUBDIVISION OF DIOCESES BILL.

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into a Committee read.

LORD LYTTLTON moved that the House do go into Committee on the Bill, and said that it had come down from the Select Committee so altered that not one of the original clauses remained. Still, however, the substance and scope of the measure remained, and what was new consisted for the most part of restrictions on the operation of the scheme. To some of the new clauses he had a strong objection, and which he hoped to get altered. He was not very sanguine, owing to the lateness of the Session, and the pressure of business in the other House of Parliament, that the Bill would become law in the course of the present Session, but, nevertheless, it was, he considered, of the greatest importance in reference to future legislation upon the subject that their Lordships should pass this Bill.

Moved, That the House do now resolve itself into a Committee.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, that the Bill had been referred to a Select Committee under very singular circumstances, a distinct understanding having been entered into with the noble Lord that the measure should be entirely remodelled. The great difficulty he had with regard to the Bill was his great respect for the noble Lord who had devoted great time and attention to the subject with a most sincere desire to arrive at a good result. He could not, however, say that that good result would be found embodied in the present Bill—in fact, he should not have supported it had it not been that he had been to some extent concerned in remodelling it in the Committee. Some good result might, perhaps, arise ultimately out of the discussions that had taken place; but, in fact, without any offence to the Mover of the Bill, it was at present little better than a sham. It seemed to be based on a joke attributed to the noble Viscount at the head of the Government, who, when he was waited on by a deputation, said that if people could pay for Bishops he did not see why they should not have them. This measure appeared to go upon that principle. Under the Bill if any body of persons could get together some £40,000 they might have a Bishop for their money. If this matter were postponed for another Session there might be a chance of some useful legislation being obtained, but there was not the remotest chance of this Bill passing the House of Commons. The original Bill was a revolutionary Bill and it was with great qualms of conscience that the right rev. Bench had voted for the second reading, with the understanding that it would be greatly changed in Select Committee. It proposed that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners should have the power of altering the existing constitution of the Church of England. When a vacancy took place in a See, it was to be referred to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners whether they would chop up the See into a number of little Sees, and the income into a number of little incomes, and so alter the whole Parliamentary arrangement that was come to twenty years ago. He had a great respect for the Ecclesiastical Commission, of which he was a member, but even ecclesiastical bodies were liable to be governed by one or two members, and he was scarcely prepared to admit that the noble Earl at the head of the Commission (the Earl of Chichester), or, it might be, its estimable Secretary should have the power of remodelling the Church of England. The Church could never maintain her position in this country unless she carried with her the sympathies of the people, and where else could she gather the expressions of that sympathy better than by looking to the representatives of the people? On this account he had never feared, as some did, discussions in the other House of Parliament. Many disagreeable things might be spoken there, but unpleasant sayings never left any sting behind them unless there was some truth at the bottom of them. He, therefore, would prefer that whatever changes were made should be made by Parliament, and that the whole case should be laid before them. But not only did he feel a difficulty with regard to the mode in which the noble Lord proposed to make these changes, but he felt that the changes themselves were not desirable as originally proposed. He did not think it desirable greatly to multiply the number of Bishops. Two of his right rev. Friends had got into some disgrace with a noble Duke opposite for saying that it would be possible to over-govern a diocese; but he believed they spoke nothing but the truth. It did not do to be perpetually interfering with people; men would perform responsible duties better for being left to themselves. The very size of the present dioceses generally was a guarantee that their administration would be such as the government of free and intelligent men ought always to be. Some nine months ago he wrote to the noble Lord pointing out to him that this Bill was not the one thing needed in the Church of England. There were principles in the Bill which might be dangerous to legislation at some future period. He was one of those who voted in the Committee that no portion of the funds belonging to the Ecclesiastical Commission should be applicable to these new sees; and he did so because these new sees were to be the creation, not of Parliament, but by the Ecclesiastical Commission itself. An increase in the number of Bishops might be imperatively necessary at some future time—the result of the census might show it to be necessary; but by laying it down in this Bill that the common fund of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners should not be applicable for this purpose Parliament would be tying its hands from what might be then a very useful course. What he thought the Church of England was, not a multiplication of her machinery, but an increase of its working power. There were many portions of the Church system which might be made much more efficient than they now were. For example, he desired to see the deans of cathedral churches put into such a position as would give them the power of being more distinctly useful than they were at present. The reason why the public now grudged their small incomes was that the duties which they were called upon to perform were not understood. As it was their position was one of great honour, but their duties were not distinct, nor did they receive incomes on which they could maintain their position. If, by being made suffragan Bishops, or by any other plan, they were enabled to perform useful work, the public would not grudge them the means of properly maintaining their position. With regard to the Archdeacons, they should have stalls in our cathedral churches. In this way alone £4 000 a year would be saved in the expenditure of the Ecclesiastical Commission, and this sum might with the greatest propriety be employed in founding a new See. Above all, he believed, that what was most wanted in the Church of England was some reform of her ecclesiastical law. He wished to see some check put upon the ruinous expenditure by which the discipline of the Church was at present maintained, and upon the length of time during which these cases hung. Suppose a clergyman to be accused of some grave offence; suppose him to be tried, and the case to go lingering on from September, 1859, to the end of July, 1860—was this fair either to the accused or to the Church? If he were guilty, what a miserable state of things it was that for two years he should be able to resist the power of the Church of which he was a member; and if he were innocent, how unjust that for the same space of time he should be exposed to the annoyance, the vexation, and the harassing anxiety of an undecided lawsuit? How could he after that time recover his character or his position in the Church? Then, with regard to the costs of these suits, it had pleased Parliament to make the revenue of the See which he held sufficient to bear such expenses, but there were other less well-endowed bishoprics as to which it was felt to be a very serious thing to cast upon them the burden of maintaining the discipline of the Church. These were serious evils in the present system of the Church, and he wished for serious legislation respecting them. He did not desire to vote against the present Bill, but he could not vote in its favour, nor could he with confidence recommend their Lordships to pass such a measure.

LORD OVERSTONE (who was almost inaudible) was understood to say that it was an auspicious day for the Church of England when her Bishops addressed themselves to their Lordships with the ability, the good sense, and the conciliatory temper which had just been exhibited by the right rev. Prelate. So long as the Bishops of the Church maintained such a spirit and tone he felt confident that, whether their number were multiplied or restricted, they would continue to preserve the respect and to command the influence which it was so desirable they should possess. As to the decision of their Lordships upon the Bill now before them, that was a secondary matter. But after having given this subject much and anxious consideration he joined the right rev. Prelate in expressing an earnest hope that the noble Lord would withdraw this measure. The Bill could not in any case progress beyond their Lordships' House in the present Session, and was it wise or dignified to press it further under these circumstances and with this prospect? He believed the ultimate accomplishment of the object which the noble Lord had at heart would be best promoted by the withdrawal of the Bill.

LORD LYTTELTON thought the noble Lord could hardly be serious in pressing him to withdraw the Motion for going into Committee on this Bill. The Select Committee which had considered this subject had not reported that it was undesirable to proceed with the Bill, and it was entirely out of his power to accede to the suggestion now made to him. As to the remark that there was no probability of the measure passing in the present Session, that was perhaps true; but he thought it a great advantage that a Bill should pass through one House of Parliament, even if it were not accepted by both.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH also objected to the further progress of this measure at the present time, but not for the reasons urged by the right rev. Prelate, who, he thought, had misstated or misunderstood the case. The measure had been introduced in their Lordships' House not as a means of evading popular opinion, but because, looking to the vast amount of business which occupied the attention of the other House, the subject of the increase of the Episcopate was not likely to receive the attention which its importance demanded. It was very desirable that a general measure of this character should receive the sanction of the Legislature for another reason. If new Sees were to be created it was necessary that the funds for their endowment should be provided by voluntary contributions. The right rev. Prelate had adverted to this, and quoted an admission of the noble Lord at the head of the Government, that if the people desired more Bishops, and were rich enough to pay for them, there was no reason why they should not have them. It seemed to him that the right rev. Prelate endorsed the opinion of the noble Lord; its principle was embodied in the provisions of this Bill. But if the people were to be called upon to endow those new Sees out of their own voluntary contributions, then it was highly desirable that some such measure as this should have previously received the sanction of the Legislature, in order to give full effect to the purposes for which the funds were contributed. It was impossible to suppose that the large sum of £120,000 would ever be raised—which must be raised to provide an endowment for every one of the new Sees—if, after all the trouble and self-denial connected with raising the money it were still to remain uncertain whether the See itself would receive the sanction of the Legislature. He also understood that the principle of this measure was in accordance with the opinion of the members of Her Majesty's Government, for he remembered on a former occasion that the noble Duke at the head of the Colonial Department said that the sub-division of dioceses ought not to be dealt with piecemeal, but that there ought to be some general measure applicable to the whole country. Now that was very much the ground on which this measure proceeded, and it was founded on the recommendations of the Cathedral Commission of 1857. His noble Friend had bestowed much care and attention in preparing the measure in accordance with those recommendations, and nothing, therefore, could be more natural than that his noble Friend should be anxious that the Bill should pass. For himself he was very anxious that the measure should pass; but he would be guided very much by the course which the noble Lord himself intended to pursue under the present circumstances. If his noble Friend did not think that there was a chance of the Bill passing the other House of Parliament, then it would be matter for the consideration of his noble Friend whether he would think it right to pledge their Lordships' House to all the provisions and details of this Bill. He laid the more stress on this advice, on account of one of the provisions in this measure, which was inserted in accordance with what they were told was the opinion of the country—though he, for one, hoped the time was not far distant when the Parliament and the country would think it right to reconsider the question—he alluded to the provision that no part of the common fund of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners should be applicable to the endowment of the new Sees. He should not oppose that proviso, though he thought he could give good reasons why it should not be adopted. He believed his noble Friend himself did not approve of the clause, but had agreed to its insertion from the impression that otherwise it would not pass in the other House of Parliament. But if it was not likely to pass the other House on other grounds he thought it would not be wise to pledge their Lordships' House to that opinion.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, the noble Duke had quoted quite correctly an answer which he gave last summer, when he was asked whether the noble Lord at the head of the Government would not suspend the appointment to the then vacant See of Rochester, to allow time to consider whether the diocese should be subdivided. He then stated his opinion that it would not be desirable while the See was vacant to enter into new arrangements. He was not, therefore, unfriendly to some measure—he would not say this precise measure—but to some measure of the kind now brought forward by his noble Friend. But after the appeal which had been made to him by the noble Duke) who, was a much more decided supporter of the Bill than he (the Duke of Newcastle) was, he could only hope that his noble Friend would not press the measure further on the present occasion. With the feeling evinced on all sides he could not but fear that further discussion at the present time would be rather prejudicial to the objects his noble Friend had in view. He would only say, further, that he could not concur in the opinion of the noble Duke, that the time might come when it would be thought desirable that the common fund should be applied to the endowment of episcopal Sees. He was of opinion that such an application of the fund would be most pernicious and improper.

LORD EBURY said, he felt very anxious on this subject, as he belonged to a diocese that was universally admitted to be too large for the charge of one Bishop—he meant the See of Rochester; and, therefore, he was in favour of the principle of the measure of his noble Friend. But there was a Resolution come to by the Select Committee which took away all the interest he ever had in the Bill, which was that no new bishopric should be constituted until such a sum of money had been raised as would be sufficient not only to provide a residence for the Bishop, but also for an annual income equal to the lowest amount prescribed for the existing Bishops by Act of Parliament—that was to say £4,200. That he thought was not likely to be done—not because the money could not be raised, but because the working clergy did not want an increase of that sort of Bishop; they wanted Bishops with smaller incomes; and, if he might say it without offence to the right rev. Bench, they wanted Bishops who would be nearer to themselves, and not Prince Bishops. He hoped this Bill would not be pressed. He knew from painful experience how galling it was to give up a measure on which much care, and even much affection, had been bestowed; but then the noble Lord must see there was no chance of passing the measure at the present time.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY wished to add his persuasions to those that had already been pressed on the noble Lord to induce him not to proceed with the present Bill. He would not have ventured to give an opinion on the subject, if it had not been for the observations made by the noble Lord himself. The noble Lord considered that great benefit would arise to the cause which he had so much and so zealously at heart if the Bill were to pass their Lordships' House; but, from what he had observed, it was uncertain whether it would pass their Lordships' House, and if it were likely so to pass, ought it to go down to the House of Commons, where the noble Lord had apparently made up his mind that it would either be rejected or dropped? Under these circumstances he ventured to urge on the noble Lord not to press his measure—a course which, however, he would hardly have ventured to take if he had not observed that the same advice was given to the noble Lord, not only by Members of the House generally, but more especially by those noble Lords who were equally zealous with the noble Lord himself in the promotion of the interests of the Church of England. He wished to point out to the noble Lord that he had already obtained one great and important object—he had had the question fully ventilated in the House and in the Select Committee, and he had obtained the opinions of those whose sentiments were of the greatest weight and value on all subjects of this nature. He inferred from the speech of the right rev. Prelate that the noble Lord would not have the support of the right rev. Bench on this question; and seeing this, and seeing also that other noble Lords who had occupied their whole lives with questions of this nature were averse to proceeding further, he put it to the noble Lord whether it would be wise to press his Bill.

EARL GRANVILLE observed that the House was naturally indisposed, from personal respect for the noble Lord who had introduced the Bill, to vote against it, but no single Peer who had spoken had signified his approval of it. Every Peer who had addressed the House, except the noble Lord himself, had either objected to the whole or to parts of it, or thought it was unadvisable to proceed with it this Session. For himself, he would be inclined to support a Bill emanating from a Select Committee, but after the discussion which had taken place and the almost unanimous opinion that had been expressed, he should feel it his duty, if the Bill were pressed, to vote against proceeding further with it at present.

VISCOUNT LIFFORD was understood to say that unless all Bills for the benefit of the English Church were to be rejected in that House, their Lordships ought to read the Bill a second time. The speech of the right rev. Prelate (Bishop of London) came home to every true Churchmen. Four years ago a Bill for the Amendment of Church Discipline was brought in by the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Cranworth). The first Vote he gave in the House was in support of that measure, but it was opposed by every one of the Bishops. He trusted, however, that if the great labours of the right rev. Prelate (Bishop of London) permitted, he would himself introduce a Bill to enable Bishops at a smaller cost than £5,000 or £6,000 in each case to punish clergymen guilty of open immorality.

LORD LYTTTELTON explained that he gave his support to the clause to which objection had been made, because he was assured that it was in accordance with general public opinion, which, however, he was not disposed to believe. He did not feel justified in withdrawing the Bill.

LANDED PROPERTY IMPROVEMENT (IRELAND) BILL.—SECOND READING.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, the object of the measure was to enable landlords who had already improved their land and farm buildings, to borrow money for the further purpose of erecting suitable dwellings for labourers. The Bill had met with no opposition in the other House of Parliament, and he did not anticipate any opposition to it from their Lordships.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, the principle of the Land Improvement Act was to enable landlords to obtain loans for effecting improvements, such as thorough draining, the making of roads, and the like, which increased the actual letting value of the property. That was a perfectly fair principle as between the tenant for life and the person who was to succeed him, and it was only just that the money borrowed should be charged on the estate. The erection of labourers' cottages was not a description of improvements which increased the letting value of the land; but, owing to the peculiar circumstances of Ireland, and the great want of decent dwellings for the peasantry there, he would not object to the extension of the Land Improvement Act to that country, in the direction intended by this Bill. At the same time, if their Lordships adopted the measure they ought to guard against this departure from a sound principle being drawn into a precedent, or extended to a class of improvements for which there might not be the same urgency.

LORD MONTEAGLE addressed a few words to the House which were not heard.

THE MARQUESS OF BATII thought the Government ought to take up the whole question. Act after Act had been passed until the whole law relating to land in Ireland had become one mass of confusion.

THE MARQUESS OF WESTMEATH said that there were no means provided for ensuring that the dwellings should be kept in repair after the land had been saddled with a debt for their construction. He should not oppose the Bill, but he had great doubts of its beneficial operation.

LORD TALBOT DE MALAHIDE admitted that the powers of the Bill, if injudiciously and improvidently applied, might be productive of many evils; but in the present state of Ireland great improvements were necessary and nothing could be done without enlarging the provisions of the Land Improvement Acts as was proposed by this Bill. He had inspected some of the improved dwellings in Ireland, and their state showed that the labourers appreciated the privilege of being clean and comfortable.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON said, he would rejoice to see such a Bill passed into a law if it would be appreciated by the lower classes in Ireland; but he very much feared they were indifferent to improved dwellings, and these would never be kept in the necessary repair unless wholly at the expense of the landlords.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday next.

OFFICERS OF RESERVE (ROYAL NAVY) BILL.—COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

Clause 1 (Power to Her Majesty to accept the Services of Masters and Mates of Merchant Service as Officers of Reserve to the Royal Navy), agreed to.

Clause 2 (Power of the Admiralty to enrol Officers of Reserve to Royal Navy),

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE rose to move the Amendment of which he had given notice, that officers of the merchant service who joined the Reserve should undergo the same examination before the same tribunal as officers in the Royal Navy. It might be said officers of the merchant service had already passed the examination prescribed by Act of Parliament, but the two services were so entirely distinct in the manner of conducting ships, their character, and discipline, and everything else, except the theory of navigation, that it was essential the same examination should be undergone by all officers. Merchant seamen were not true sailors—they were mere navigators who understood the propulsion of vessels by steam. They had no experience whatever in gunnery, and could not be entrusted with the firing of a ship's battery. All he asked was that the officers of the Naval Reserve should be subjected to the same examination as midshipmen in the Royal Navy. The noble Lord moved an Amendment at the end of Clause 2, to add the following words:—

“But before they can perform the executive Duty of Lieutenant aboard any of Her Majesty's Ships they are required to pass the same Examinations, and before the same Tribunals, as the Midshipmen of the Navy do before they are eligible for the Rank of Lieutenant.”

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET entertained great objection to doing by Act of Parliament what could be done equally well by Regulations sanctioned by Order in Council, because the latter could be more readily and effectually adapted to any altered circumstances of the case. He was anxious not to excite the jealousy of the officers of the Navy, and at the same time he was anxious to secure the services of the officers of the merchant service; and he, therefore, thought the Bill should be, as far as possible, of a general character, and that the details of the scheme should be left to Regulations and to Orders in Council. He was very unwilling to fetter the discretion of the present or any future Board of Admiralty on the subject. The examination of masters in the mercantile marine was as strict as that in the Navy, although it was quite true that it did not include gunnery. It was no doubt very desirable that officers of the merchant service should understand gunnery; but, in spite of their deficiency in that respect, should any emergency arise their services would still be of great value on board of steam-vessels, in which they must recollect any future war would be chiefly carried on. The simple truth was that the Admiralty could not do without them. If a war broke out they would be obliged to call in their assistance; and it was of great importance that they should avoid exciting any ill feeling among them by unnecessary restrictions. Care would be taken to drill them well in gunnery, and he had no doubt that before long they would themselves come forward and offer to prove their competency by undergoing examination. He trusted that the noble Earl would not press his Amendment.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: I agree with the noble Duke that nothing should be done by an Act of Parliament which can be done as well by an Order in Council, and, therefore, I am somewhat surprised that this Bill should have been brought in at all, inasmuch as sufficient power already exists in the hands of Her Majesty to effect that which the Bill aims at doing. It is unquestionably not expedient to fetter the discretion of the Admiralty as to the application of our naval resources; I believe, moreover, that if you require officers of merchant ships, before you accept their services, to prove by examination that they possess the same qualifications as milshipmen, you will not get a man to come forward, for they will deem it derogatory to their dignity and position. I am, however, glad to see this measure brought forward, because I am glad to see a determination on the part of the Government to make preparation in time of peace for a war which I have always regarded as inevitable, and which may come upon us no one can tell how soon. It is not sufficient to have your preparations ready at the end of the first six months of the war—you must be ready for the first six days of the war. Whenever war, unfortunately, does break out, you may depend upon it that preparations will have been made for it long beforehand by the enemy, who will be ready for immediate action and invasion; and it will be within the first few days of the war that we shall require the help of all our reserves. I am therefore, most anxious, as we have neither sufficient officers nor men, that measures should at once be adopted to prepare for the worst. We must bear in mind that without some special training merchant officers are not fit to walk the deck of a man-of-war. They may know navigation, but practically speaking that is of little importance,—what is required of them is a knowledge of gunnery, and a knowledge of steam and its management. It is, therefore, very desirable—indeed, absolutely necessary—that the Government should afford to the gentlemen of the merchant service the opportunity of becoming proficient in gunnery as practised on board of war ships, and of learning the practical application of steam to naval purposes. When they have satisfied the Government that they are able to execute the duties of naval officers, then let them acquire the rank and receive all the respect which accompanies it. I do not apprehend that any captain would venture to place an officer fresh from a merchant ship in command of a watch on board of a man-of-war. I do not expect that these gentlemen whose services we are anxious to secure will be employed, nor do I think that they ought to be employed, in large men-of-war. Naval officers, who know the discipline of the Navy, and whom men-of-war's men respect, are the only officers who can exercise authority on board large ships. But the service of these gentlemen will be inestimable in the command of gunboats and of small vessels engaged in the protection of our coasts. The Naval Coast Volunteers, whose services are limited to a certain distance from the coast, and many of whom are not seamen but merely men living on the seashore, may be usefully employed under these commanders. I believe there are 110 gunboats not in commission. They would require 220 officers and 5,500 men. Here we should find the men who would willingly obey these officers, and the officers in these small commands would practically learn a great portion of their duties and become excellent officers of the Navy if the war was continued. I consider these gentlemen in the light of officers of a Reserve of Volunteers rather than as officers of the regular Navy. Whatever they may desire in the way of rank we shall be willing to give them, but it should be rank in the Naval Volunteers, and not rank in the Navy. I have no prejudices, but I respect the prejudices of others, and I should be extremely sorry if anything were done to hurt the feelings of any officer. I think that this measure may be so worked with discretion as not to injure the interests or affect the feelings of any naval officer in Her Majesty's service. I think it may be so managed as to produce the greatest possible good by providing in time of peace for the instant emergency of the first outbreak of war. It is for that emergency that we must provide. I hope the noble Duke and his successors will constantly bear that in mind, and make provision for naval defence in time of peace; as, should they not do so, I know not what calamity might be brought upon us in the first week of a war.

Amendment negatived: Bill reported

PAROCHIAL AND BURGH SCHOOLS (SCOTLAND) No. 2 BILL.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. BLACK said, that he did not object to go into Committee on the Bill, but he did not think it would afford a satisfactory settlement of a subject which had been contested in Scotland for a long time. What was desired was a national sectarian system of education, and he did not think the Bill provided it, inasmuch as it declared that the teaching in the schools should be according to the Shorter Catechism, which set forth the doctrines of the Presbyterian Church. The Church of Scotland, the Free Church, and the United Presbyterians would, no doubt, be satisfied with the Bill, because they got in it all they wanted. But there were some smaller bodies who would not be satisfied. It had been said it was a step in the right direction, but in his opinion it was a complete obstacle to further progress. He should not oppose the Committee, but he wished to express his dissatisfaction with the measure as it now stood.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Interpretation of Terms),

MR. MURE said, he would move an Amendment to the effect that the word "heritors" should mean persons qualified under the Act of 1803.

MR. BUCHANAN said, that by the Bill they were changing the payment of schoolmasters from so many merks Scots to pounds sterling, and he thought some change should also take place in the designation of heritors, whose qualification was an absolute one of £100 Scots, a kind of money that no longer existed.

MR. MURE said, he thought they should adhere to the definition laid down in the Bill of 1803.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he hoped the Amendment would not be pressed. There was not the least doubt as to the meaning of the word, and he would take care that the Bill should be made perfectly clear.

MR. MURE said, he was willing to accept that promise, and he would withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 2 (Salaries of Schoolmasters),

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he wished to move to insert words which would make the minimum salary £35, instead of £30. The Bill provided only how much the heritors should have to pay, but did not intend to limit the salary to so low a sum. The maximum he should propose would be £60, but he would prefer to make it £70, and as that maximum was at the option of the heritors the sum would not be extravagant.

MR. BLACKBURN complained that no grant was given to the parish schoolmasters out of the general educational fund.

MR. G. W. HOPE said, he thought the salaries of the schoolmasters should be in proportion to the number of pupils they had.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE was very much of that opinion. He knew a case in which a school was endowed with salary to the amount of £600 a year, and the master, in order to get quit of the scholars, used to flog all new-comers severely, so that in time the school was deserted.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE proposed, as an Amendment, that the maximum salary should be £70.

MR. DUNLOP said, he would suggest that it should be £80.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. MURE proposed that £50 should be substituted for £40, and £80 for £60, in cases where there might be more schoolmasters than one.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. BLACK proposed to add to the end of the clause words that would enable proprietors and occupants, as well as heritors, to discharge all duties performed by heritors.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 3 (Salary to be fixed by the Heritors and Minister, and to be payable in money at the terms and under the conditions now in use),

MR. DUNLOP proposed to insert a series of Amendments making the salaries of the schoolmasters payable by the parties liable according to the real annual value of their lands as appearing in the yearly valuation roll made up under the recent Valuation Act, instead of, as at present, according to the old "valued rent." That was a valuation made in the reign of Charles II., and not at all applicable to the present state of things. The payment should be based on the rental as at the time of payment, and not on the rental which the lands yielded two centuries ago, since when the proportionate value of properties had totally altered. The first of these Amendments would merely be to provide for the payment of the salaries half-yearly "by equal portions," but he would take the sense of the Committee on the whole plan by moving the insertion of these words.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he did not wish to counteract the view taken by the hon. Member for Greenock, but as his hon. Friend had not said how his proposal was to be carried into effect, he suggested that he should withdraw his proposal in the meantime, and bring up a clause in the Report by which the mode of carrying out the new valuation in the case of schools might be determined.

MR. MURE said, he would propose to add words giving power to heritors holding one third of the valuation of a parish to call a meeting to fix the salary of the schoolmaster when a vacancy took place, in the event of the minister delaying or refusing to do so.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to,

Clause 4 omitted.

Clause 5 agreed to.

Clause 6, (Heritors may provide retiring allowances to Schoolmasters),

MR. MURE proposed to add words to the effect that on a schoolmaster being reported by an inspector of schools and by the Presbytery as infirm or unequal to the discharge of his duties, the heritors and minister might call on him to resign or dismiss him, and should have power to grant to him a retiring allowance of not less than two-thirds of his salary.

VOL. CLXIV. [THIRD SERIES.]

Clause omitted.

Clause 7 (Examination by Examiners appointed by the Universities to come in the place of the examination by the Presbytery),

MR. DUNLOP thought that a Board of Examiners, consisting exclusively of University professors was deficient in one essential element, that of parties conversant with the practical business of teaching in schools, and he proposed an alteration which would have the effect of substituting for two of the professors two members of the Educational Institute of Scotland on the Board of Examiners.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he regretted that he could not consent to the Amendment, not because he had any objection to give the power proposed to the Educational Institute, but because it would interfere with the principle that the examining body should be connected with the Universities. He wished to see the schools of Scotland affiliated to the Universities of Scotland, and though he had the very highest opinion of the Educational Institute he did not see that their services could be made available in this case.

MR. DUNLOP said, his Amendment would leave the selection of the examiners in the hands of the Universities, and he, therefore, could not see that there was any force in the objection taken by the learned Lord. He would, however, add to his Amendment the words "being graduates of the University."

MR. G. W. HOPE said, he objected to the examination of schoolmasters being placed in the hands of a voluntary body like the Educational Institute.

MR. MURE said, he thought it would be of importance to introduce into the Examining Board persons practically acquainted with teaching.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that if his hon. Friend the Member for Greenock allowed the matter to stand over, he would endeavour to introduce a clause on the Report which would give effect to what might be called the practical teaching element in the examination.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. BUCHANAN said, he proposed to leave out the words "licentiates of the Church of Scotland," and insert "Presbyterian Churches in Scotland." In appointing the examiners they should avoid sectarianism as far as possible.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he must oppose the Amendment.

SIR ANDREW AGNEW said, he would rather leave out the latter part of the clause specifying what class of persons should be appointed.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. MURE proposed words to the effect that a Professor in the Faculty of Divinity, or the deputy nominated by him, should always be one of the examiners.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 36, after the word "number," to insert the words "of whom a Professor in the Faculty of Divinity, or the Deputy nominated by him, shall always be one."

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 31; Noes 58: Majority 27.

MR. DUNLOP objected to this which would practically give a veto on the passing of any candidate to the Professors of Divinity.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to, as was also Clause 8.

Clause 9 (Parochial Schoolmasters not to be required to sign confession of faith or formula but to make a declaration, and to undertake to conform to the shorter catechism).

MR. BLACK said, that he had the strongest objection to that part of the Bill, by which a test was imposed upon schoolmasters. He was no party to the compromise by which the Bill had been introduced; but this he thought was the sting of the whole. No man had a right to impose a test upon another, and in that case not only was the principle a bad one, but other safeguards of religion were provided. Not only was a test wrong in principle, but it was dangerous and mischievous in practice. He moved the rejection of the words by which the test was imposed.

MR. ADAMS said, he also opposed the imposition of a test. It had been proved that they could get good religious teaching without tests, and he believed that the feeling of Scotland was gradually rising against them. At the same time he hoped his hon. Friend would not endanger the Bill by pressing his Amendment to a division.

CAPTAIN CARNEGIE said, he also opposed tests, but he hoped the Amendment would not be pressed.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he must appeal to the hon. Gentleman not to divide the Committee. He agreed in every word which had fallen from him as to the uselessness of tests; but he well knew what was the fate of Bills that had been sent up from the House without the test, and he begged him, therefore, to allow the compromise to be effected.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he would likewise urge the hon. Member for Edinburgh not to press his Amendment.

MR. BLACK said, he found plenty of hon. Members to agree with him, but as they would not vote with him he would very unwillingly withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he proposed that the following additional declaration should be taken by schoolmasters previous to entering office—

"And that I will not exercise the functions of the said office to the prejudice or subversion of the Church of Scotland as by law established, or the doctrines and privileges thereof."

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he objected to the introduction of the words.

MR. BLACK said, he would not have withdrawn his Amendment had he thought that the evil of the test was to be aggravated in the way now proposed by the Lord Advocate. He would divide the Committee on the proposal.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he could not consent to the withdrawal of the words. He had only to say that the withdrawal of these words would be tantamount to the withdrawal of the Bill altogether, as he could not see the possibility of carrying the Bill without them.

MR. CAIRD suggested that the hon. Member for Edinburgh should divide upon the next Amendment, which was far more important, as it referred to the tribunal by which schoolmasters were to be judged.

Amendment agreed to.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he would then propose to insert the following words—

"And the wilful contravention by any schoolmaster of the said declaration shall be considered and dealt with as neglect of duty under the provisions of the said recited Act; provided always, that it shall not be competent to insist in any proceedings against any schoolmaster for such contravention without the consent of Her Majesty's Advocate being first obtained, on a representation to him by the heritors of the parish, and after such inquiry as he may think necessary."

MR. DUNLOP said, that he trusted the learned Lord did not consider that the rejection of this Amendment would be tantamount to the rejection of the Bill, as he, and he believed many other Members would rather lose the Bill than consent to the Amendment as it stood, for its effect useful, hard-working, and, in too many cases, but scantily remunerated body, the clergy, both of the Metropolis and of the country.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the operation and effect of the several Burial and Cemetery Acts in reference to the Incumbents and Ministers of parishes and districts in England and Wales, and to the amount of and mode of compensation, if any, to be provided for the loss of fees or other rights and privileges occasioned to them by the closing of Churchyards and Burial Grounds under the said Acts."

MR. BROWN-WESTHEAD stated that from his personal knowledge he was aware that in several cases considerable hardship had been suffered by the clergy by the withdrawal of the fees they had been in the habit of receiving. Only that day he received a statement from a clergyman respecting a church which he had erected himself, in which it was stated that the burial-ground attached to the church formed for a length of time the principal means by which he was enabled to live and perform his duties as a minister. That was in a district of 10,000 inhabitants, and he had spent £8,000 of his own property in the purchase of the land and the erection of the church. The church cost far more than was anticipated, and the consequence was that there were legal encumbrances upon the church that required the payment of £300 per annum. Only the week before last the clergyman had applied to the Home Secretary for permission to continue burials in the churchyard for two years more, and a petition had been presented from the inhabitants of the district to the same effect. The permission had been accorded, but all the income which the clergyman derived was about £450 per annum; so that if he was deprived of the power of burying in his churchyard his income would be reduced to little more than £150 per annum. Yet if the land were capable of being brought into the market its value would be fully £20,000. Under these circumstances he could not but think that if these Burial Acts were to be enforced it was very desirable that some means should be provided for compensating the clergy for the loss they sustained by giving up the burial fees for the benefit of the public. He had complaints from other clergymen, stating that they had vaults which were not allowed to be used as places of interment, although they were fitted for that purpose. Land not consecrated, or such portions as were not occupied, might be sold. Clergymen complained that vaults under their churches, although not full, and covered over with solid arches, were not allowed to be used as places of interment, the consequence of which was a serious deduction from their income. Future incumbents would, of course, take their livings as they found them; but the present possessors were entitled to compensation for that which they gave up for the public good. At all events, they were entitled to an inquiry into their claims. He did not believe that the number of individuals entitled to compensation was large, and there was church property which might be made available for the purpose.

MR. HADFIELD said, he believed that the case to which the hon. Member (Mr. Brown-Westhead) had referred was that of a Wesleyan minister who had joined the Establishment, and had—if he might use the term without implying any disparagement—speculated in church property. He did not think that a gentleman who found himself in the position of a loser under such circumstances should be permitted to charge his loss upon the funds of the country. The proposition of the noble Lord to extend the inquiry to England and Wales was full of objection, and he wished to know from Mr. Speaker whether it was competent to the noble Lord to alter his Motion without notice. If the words "within the bills of mortality" were reinserted, instead of the words now proposed by the noble Lord, he would make no objection to an inquiry; but he must protest against the funds of the country being fixed with any such compensation as that suggested. He knew cases in which the Dissenters could set up stronger claims to such compensation, but they would not think of doing so. The claim put forward by the noble Lord on behalf of clergymen of the Established Church was an unseemly, an unsightly, and an unworthy one. They asked for compensation for the loss they sustained in the burial of the dead. Their office was to cure souls while living, but the Constitution never invested them with an interest in the burial of the dead. It was really most objectionable to hear the disciples of—he would not use a sacred name—coming forward to claim compensation, not for the cure of souls living, but for the burial of those dead.

of the Government property, compared to the rest of the rateable property of the parish, did not appear to him to bring them within the rule which the Treasury applied to those cases.

BURIAL AND CEMETERY ACTS.

COMMISSION MOVED FOR.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, he rose to move an Address for the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire into the effect of the several burial and cemetery Acts upon the position of incumbents of parishes and districts. He spoke not merely in the interests of the metropolitan clergy, but also of clergymen in different parts of England, who had been seriously affected by those Acts. Until the year 1850 the fees upon interments constituted a large proportion of the income of parochial clergymen; but, as burials within the City were prevented by the Metropolitan Interments Act, the Legislature, sensible of the great hardships which such an enactment would inflict upon the clergy, gave power to the Board of Health, under the 32nd to the 36th Clauses, to inquire into the effect which its operation would have upon their revenues. The General Board of Health caused an inquiry "to ascertain the facts bearing upon those claims" to be opened, and the clergy were invited to be examined and to state the amount which they had received in fees during the five years previous to the passing of the Act; secondly, their average annual receipts; and lastly, the amount which they claimed as compensation. A very voluminous paper was presented to the House of Lords, in which these claims, affecting 149 parishes, were set forth. In some cases £300, £400, and that of St. Giles in the Fields as much as £750, were claimed by the clergy. But in 1852, the Metropolitan Interments Act was superseded by the Metropolitan Burials Act, and the jurisdiction previously enjoyed by the Board of Health was transferred to the Home Office, and it accordingly rested with them to consider what compensation should be granted, and out of what funds the money could be obtained. Anxiety was then expressed that before the subject of compensation was taken up all city burial-grounds should be finally closed, and accordingly churchyards to the number of 200, or counting the country districts, to the number of about 700, were shut; but from that day to the present not a shilling compensation had been received by the clergy. It might be urged, in reply to the Motion, that there were no funds for the purpose; but, surely, when the Board of Health in 1850 ordered an inquiry into the subject, they must have had some funds in view as applicable to the purpose, or they would never have given clergymen the trouble of attending and proving their claims. In the Report of the Committee of the House of Lords, which met in 1858 to consider the question of the spiritual destitution of the Metropolis, especial reference was made to the subject of the Motion. The Report stated—

"Burial fees to a great amount, constituting a very large part of the endowment of many incumbents, have been abstracted by the operation of successive Burial Acts. The consequence has been most lamentable; not only has it tended to impoverish many most laborious and deserving clergymen, but also as it has deprived them of the means of procuring help in the discharge of their pastoral functions in their crowded parishes. Reference to the Acts themselves, 13th and 14th of Vict., cap. 52, and 15th and 16th of Vict., cap. 85, shows that both of them alike recognize the incumbent's right, though both of them fail in providing the necessary means of compensation, and in giving due powers to enforce it. Still, the unhappy result of the defective provisions of the statute remains, and a very large part of the incomes of many of the poorest and most laborious of the London clergy has been, contrary to the intention of the Legislature, practically taken from them. It has been the just and honourable course of Parliament to secure compensation to all who have any reasonable claims to it for losses caused by any statute for the public good, and we cannot but express our great regret that no adequate means have as yet been devised of providing a remedy for this very crying evil, by securing that compensation."

The question of compensation was always a difficult one, but instances had occurred in which it had been granted on the abolition of the Six Clerks' offices, as well as to proctors, surveyors, and others whose pecuniary interests had been interfered with by the Legislature; he, therefore, thought enough had been done in that direction to justify his application, which was merely for inquiry into the case of these clergymen. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary last year admitted that—

"Great hardship had been caused by the loss of fees in the way referred to, and if any means could be devised, without making a charge on the funds of the Church, to make up incomes that had been so affected, he would be glad to give it his best consideration."—[3 Hansard clx., p. 205.]

Under all the circumstances, he hoped the House would not refuse to entertain the appeal which he had made on behalf of that useful, hard-working, and, in too many cases, but scantily remunerated body, the clergy, both of the Metropolis and of the country.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the operation and effect of the several Burial and Cemetery Acts in reference to the Incumbents and Ministers of parishes and districts in England and Wales, and to the amount of and mode of compensation, if any, to be provided for the loss of fees or other rights and privileges occasioned to them by the closing of Churchyards and Burial Grounds under the said Acts.”

MR. BROWN-WESTHEAD stated that from his personal knowledge he was aware that in several cases considerable hardship had been suffered by the clergy by the withdrawal of the fees they had been in the habit of receiving. Only that day he received a statement from a clergyman respecting a church which he had crected himself, in which it was stated that the burial-ground attached to the church formed for a length of time the principal means by which he was enabled to live and perform his duties as a minister. That was in a district of 10,000 inhabitants, and he had spent £8,000 of his own property in the purchase of the land and the erection of the church. The church cost far more than was anticipated, and the consequence was that there were legal encumbrances upon the church that required the payment of £300 per annum. Only the week before last the clergyman had applied to the Home Secretary for permission to continue burials in the churchyard for two years more, and a petition had been presented from the inhabitants of the district to the same effect. The permission had been accorded, but all the income which the clergyman derived was about £450 per annum; so that if he was deprived of the power of burying in his churchyard his income would be reduced to little more than £150 per annum. Yet if the land were capable of being brought into the market its value would be fully £20,000. Under these circumstances he could not but think that if these Burial Acts were to be enforced it was very desirable that some means should be provided for compensating the clergy for the loss they sustained by giving up the burial fees for the benefit of the public. He had complaints from other clergymen, stating that they had vaults which were not allowed to be used as places of interment, although they were fitted for that purpose. Land not consecrated, or such portions as were not occupied, might be sold. Clergymen complained that vaults under their churches, although not full, and covered over with solid arches, were not allowed to be used as places of interment, the consequence of which was a serious deduction from their income. Future incumbents would, of course, take their livings as they found them; but the present possessors were entitled to compensation for that which they gave up for the public good. At all events, they were entitled to an inquiry into their claims. He did not believe that the number of individuals entitled to compensation was large, and there was church property which might be made available for the purpose.

MR. HADFIELD said, he believed that the case to which the hon. Member (Mr. Brown-Westhead) had referred was that of a Wesleyan minister who had joined the Establishment, and had—if he might use the term without implying any disparagement—speculated in church property. He did not think that a gentleman who found himself in the position of a loser under such circumstances should be permitted to charge his loss upon the funds of the country. The proposition of the noble Lord to extend the inquiry to England and Wales was full of objection, and he wished to know from Mr. Speaker whether it was competent to the noble Lord to alter his Motion without notice. If the words “within the bills of mortality” were reinserted, instead of the words now proposed by the noble Lord, he would make no objection to an inquiry; but he must protest against the funds of the country being fixed with any such compensation as that suggested. He knew cases in which the Dissenters could set up stronger claims to such compensation, but they would not think of doing so. The claim put forward by the noble Lord on behalf of clergymen of the Established Church was an unseemly, an unsightly, and an unworthy one. They asked for compensation for the loss they sustained in the burial of the dead. Their office was to cure souls while living, but the Constitution never invested them with an interest in the burial of the dead. It was really most objectionable to hear the disciples of—he would not use a sacred name—coming forward to claim compensation, not for the cure of souls living, but for the burial of those dead.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "districts," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "within the Bills of Mortality," instead thereof.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, the hon. Member who had just spoken took every opportunity of reflecting on those who, with himself and other members of the Church of England, held the opinion that the clergy ought to be maintained by legal provision, which was scarcely either fair, or charitable, since they did not attack the voluntary system of the Dissenters, which the hon. Gentleman represented. He had truly observed that the clergy were not clergy of the dead but of the living; but he had omitted to explain what was the real nature of burial fees paid on the occasion of the death of such member of a family, but applied to providing for the religious instruction of the survivors. They were a provision secured by law for the maintenance of the clergy. They were so regarded throughout the debates on the subject in 1850, and the justice of securing them or an equivalent by law was fully recognised. He remembered the exertions made by the right hon. Gentleman, the present Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, who was at that time Secretary of State for the Home Department, to induce the House so to consider these fees, and not to consent to their alienation to enable companies to provide burial grounds beyond the limits of the Metropolis. No doubt it was necessary that those burial grounds should be provided; but, at the same time, that right hon. Gentleman would bear him out in saying that it was not the intention of the Legislature to deprive the clergy of so necessary a source of income. He (Mr. Newdegate) remembered being in repeated divisions in support of the right hon. Gentleman; and in all those divisions they were successful, maintaining the law by which burial fees or an equivalent were to be paid to the clergy, and determining that they ought not to be deprived of their maintenance because the burial grounds of parishes might have become over-crowded, and it was necessary that funerals should take place elsewhere. But, unfortunately, there was at that time a sanitary fever in the House; and a small minority of the House availed themselves of it, they imputed to the clergy

a desire to keep their crowded churchyards as centres of disease within the Metropolis, and misrepresented the clergy as though thus really culpable; nay, so culpable as to be willing, needlessly, to perpetuate disease within the Metropolis, merely for the sake of maintaining their own incomes. These misrepresentations led to the infection of a gross injustice, for the effect was that, notwithstanding the exertions of the right hon. Gentleman and the determination of the majority of the House, the minority forced a compromise, the effect of which had been to deprive many of the clergy of the means necessary to enable them to employ curates for the spiritual teaching of the parishioners committed to their charge. It was a painful circumstance that though the Legislature had tried to remedy this evil, and although his right hon. Friend, the Member for Cambridge, had in 1852 introduced a Bill to remedy this evil, the remedy had entirely failed. By the Act of 1850, cemeteries were established round London in the hands of companies, in great measure on the credit of the fees, abstracted from the clergy. Of course, these were strictly commercial speculations, and it was the interest of those companies that no other burial grounds should be established. The Act of 1852 did this: it enabled parishes, if they thought fit, to establish at their own expense burial grounds for themselves, the fees for the burials in which should accrue to the clergymen of the parishes. But it must be obvious to the House that it was the interest of cemetery companies to prevent anything of the sort taking place; and the companies, accordingly, by appealing to the economical feelings of vestries, had prevented the Act being brought into operation, so as to enable the clergy to receive the emoluments which the Legislature thought essential to their maintenance and the spiritual instruction of the population. The whole matter had gone completely by default, and he (Mr. Newdegate) hoped, that the Government would do the justice of issuing the Commission, which would suggest means by which the House could repair an injustice it never willingly committed. He knew clergymen of parishes containing 130,000 and 150,000 inhabitants, where there were three churches and three burial grounds closed and where the clergy had been totally deprived of the fees which by Acts of Parliament had been declared legal and rightful sources of income for themselves useful, hard-working, and, in too many cases, but scantily remunerated body, the clergy, both of the Metropolis and of the country.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the operation and effect of the several Burial and Cemetery Acts in reference to the Incumbents and Ministers of parishes and districts in England and Wales, and to the amount and mode of compensation, if any, to be provided for the loss of fees or other rights and privileges occasioned to them by the closing of Churchyards and Burial Grounds under the said Acts."

Mr. BROWN-WESTHEAD stated that from his personal knowledge he was aware that in several cases considerable hardship had been suffered by the clergy by the withdrawal of the fees they had been in the habit of receiving. Only that day he received a statement from a clergyman respecting a church which he had created himself, in which it was stated that the burial-ground attached to the church formed for a length of time the principal means by which he was enabled to live and perform his duties as a minister. That was a district of 10,000 inhabitants, and he had spent £8,000 of his own property in the purchase of the land and the erection of the church. Yet if the land attached to the church were brought into the market its value would be fully £20,000. In such circumstances he could not but think that if these Burial Acts were passed it was very desirable that some provision should be provided for compensation for the loss they sustained by the clergy in giving up the burial fees for the public. He had complaints from many clergymen, stating that they were not allowed to be used as places of interment, although they were fitted for that purpose. Land not consecrated, or such portions as were not occupied, might be sold. At all events, they were entitled to an inquiry into their claims. Mr. HADFIELD said, he believed that the case to which the hon. muneration for a special service. If that service was performed in a parish burial ground the clergyman still received precisely the same fees as before the change of law; but if, owing to altered circumstances, the parish clergyman did not perform the service he did not then receive the fees. If, therefore, the fees were considered as a remuneration for a service, then no claim arose for compensation, nor could the House be called on to agree to a Motion for the issue of a Commission, which proceeded on the assumption that there was a ground for compensation. If the House agreed to the proposition, it would affirm the principle that all incumbents, all ministers of every persuasion (for all congregations would be included possessing burial grounds and vaults in churches or chapels), were entitled to compensation, and it would leave the Commission to discover some fund from which compensation could be obtained. His noble Friend had referred to the cases of the Six Clerks and of the proctors compensated under the Probate Act, and seemed to point not indistinctly to the Consolidated Fund as the source from which compensation should come. Now, he was entirely adverse to the principle of making the Consolidated Fund responsible for any supposed claim for compensation arising from that cause; and he trusted that the House would not be disposed to agree to any Motion in which that principle was involved. Well, if that fund was not looked to as a means of furnishing compensation for this class of claims, he supposed that the fund which would be next applied to was that referred to by the hon. Member who last spoke—the fund of the Ecclesiastical Commission. That raised a very difficult question, because it was a suggestion to appropriate to a very limited class of the clergy a fund which the policy of Parliament had appropriated generally to the augmentation of the smallest class of livings; and though there might have been some cases of hardship from the change of law, there were many cases in which there had been no real hardship, and yet compensation would be claimed, if given at all, for both classes of cases. He presumed, too, if such a principle were admitted, that all persons, even Dissenting ministers and congregations, having suffered any loss from this source would be entitled to compensation from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commission, and that would certainly be an unexampled mode of appropriating those funds. He could not believe that the House would sanction the principle of charging either the Consolidated Fund or the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commission for this alleged claim for compensation. If both these funds were set aside the only remaining source from which compensation could be given would consist in a charge on the parish rates. If a claim of the kind for the incumbent could be established it seemed to him that the parish rates would constitute the proper source to look to as the means of compensation; but in that case they would encounter the church rate question under another form. Inasmuch as he did not think it right for any Government or for that House to play fast and loose with a question of the sort, and to appoint a Commission to speculate on some possible fund from which compensation might be drawn, while it was known beforehand that there was no fund chargeable for the purpose without serious objections, he felt it his duty, though reluctantly—for he admitted that some cases of hardship existed—to oppose the Motion. If any hon. Gentleman supposed he could devise any means of providing compensation, the proper mode of proceeding would be to submit some distinct proposition to that effect.

MR. WHITESIDE said, the right hon. Gentleman had neither denied nor refuted the arguments by which the Motion was supported. The Legislature had interfered summarily with certain vested rights of the clergy, and the noble Lord proposed that the injustice committed should be repaired. That House had always given compensation in cases where by its legislation vested rights had suffered. He should give his cordial support to the Motion.

MR. ROEBUCK said, his right hon. Friend (Mr. Whiteside) had said that there was no instance in which wrong had been done by the Legislature without compensation having been given. He would give him one:—The introduction of railroads had materially diminished the funds belonging to the turnpike trusts, and yet no compensation was given in that case. He placed the clergy in the same category as persons who had lent money to turnpike roads, and whose incomes had in consequence been diminished. Therefore, unless a special case was made out on the part of the clergy, he said the House was not called upon to remunerate them for their loss.

MR. MALINS said, there were many parishes in England so slenderly provided that the incumbents were necessarily dependent on surplus fees, and, without wishing to give the slightest opinion as to what particular measure ought to be adopted under the circumstances of the case, he could not help thinking that Parliament ought not to refuse the proposal made by the noble Lord opposite, seeing that in the Act of 1850 the principle of compensation had been affirmed, and that that principle had not been carried into effect.

MR. BAINES observed that in the borough which he had the honour to represent several burial-places belong to Dissenting communities had been closed in the same way as those connected with the Established Church, and with the additional hardship that in the case of the former the grounds had been purchased at the cost, in some instances, of hundreds, and in some of thousands of pounds, by persons living at the time when the closing took place. Dissenting communities must, therefore, in all fairness, be held to have a claim for compensation, if the claims of the much richer communities of the Church of England were allowed. He was, however, of opinion that the Motion of the noble Lord was too extensive; that it rested on a wrong principle; and, that being his opinion, he should vote against it.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the Act of 1850, no doubt, recognized the principle of compensation, for it provided that when any new burial grounds were purchased by the Board of Health, a fee of 6s. 6d., in addition to the ordinary fees, should be paid upon the burial of every person in the consecrated part of the ground, and should be set apart for the compensation not only of the incumbents, but also of the clerks and sextons, and other persons injuriously affected; but the provision had been rendered nugatory, because, as the place of burial was optional, most persons had preferred the cheaper form of burial in unconsecrated ground, and no compensation fund had been raised. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Walpole), repealed the Act of 1850, and re-enacted provisions of a different character in the Act of 1852. That Act provided that where parishioners were buried in consecrated ground the clergyman should be entitled to receive the same fees as he would have received if the burial ground of the parish had not been interfered with. There had, he might add, been no failure on the part of the Government or of Parliament to carry out the provisions of the Bill, which he was, nevertheless, ready to admit might have operated hardly, under the circumstances of the case, on many incumbents. Burials were fewer in the substituted than they were in the original grounds, and from that cause certain incumbents might have sustained some loss. He believed, however, that in many cases arrangements had been made by which clergymen had become entitled to fixed annual incomes in lieu of the fees which they formerly received. At the same time, he had no doubt that there were some cases of hardship; but he hoped the House would not adopt the Motion of the noble Lord. That Motion was vague and uncertain in its character, and was calculated to excite indefinite expectations of compensation from a non-existing fund.

MR. HADFIELD said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, The House divided.

When the Tellers advanced to the Table to announce the result of the division,

MR. BRAND, addressing Mr. Speaker, said he had to report that, though the hon. Member for Dungarvan was in the lobby with the "Ayes," he had not been counted, not having passed through before the tellers left their places.

MR. SPEAKER: Was the hon. Member in the lobby intending to vote?

MR. MAGUIRE: I was, Sir.

MR. SPEAKER: Did the hon. Member hear the question put?

MR. MAGUIRE: I did, Sir, and I intended to vote for the "Ayes."

MR. SPEAKER: The name of the hon. Member must be added to the names of those who voted for the Motion.

Ayes 48; Noes 59: Majority, 11.

AFFAIRS OF POLAND.

PAPERS MOVED FOR.

MR. POPE HENNESSY: * Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt, Sir, that many Members of this House have read with interest two remarkable documents which appeared this morning in the principal organs of the daily press. I allude to an address from certain noblemen and gentlemen of this country to Prince Czartoryski, and to the reply of that venerable representative of the Polish nation. In this reply the Prince says—

"It has given me pleasure to perceive that you have so thoroughly grasped the character of the movement which at this moment agitates Poland. You have appreciated fully the spirit of order and moderation which marks it. Calm and strong in its justice, it had remained clear of all violence; destructive notions and revolutionary passions cannot be discovered in it, nor external influences. The contest is entirely on the field of right, and entirely pacific and moral. What Poland demands, what she expects, is support of the same character. The morality of Europe is now the point in question.

"The dignity, the honour, and the interest of England are bound up in this question of support; the right that she will vindicate is not only the right of Poland, but that of civilized Europe. In the midst of the grave modifications which international interests are undergoing, before the incessant complications of the Eastern question, there is an interest of vital importance to the civilized world, above all to England, of aiding in the reconstitution of a people whose ruin, a flagrant outrage of all laws, divine and human, has produced a profound perturbation in the moral and material condition of Europe."

Sir, these words of Prince Czartoryski explain and vindicate the course I now presume to take. I have endeavoured to comprehend the Continental policy of Her Majesty's Government; I have endeavoured to trace the origin of "these grave modifications which international interests are undergoing;" and I have sought for some clue to "the incessant complications of the Eastern question;" but I find it impossible to touch upon any branch of foreign affairs, more particularly upon anything relating to the Eastern question, without feeling that our ignorance of English policy in relation to Poland is a barrier in the way of our arriving at the truth. These reasons, therefore, in addition to the immediate interests of that heroic people whose patriotism burns so brightly and steadily to-day, furnish, I venture to hope, a fair excuse for calling the attention of the House of Commons to the affairs of Poland. In dealing with this subject there are two principal points to be considered—the partition and the incorporation of Poland—and it is to the incorporation chiefly that I wish to direct attention. The people of England seem to be under the impression that in showing sympathy for the Poles we have to encounter the combined hostility of the three great Powers—Russia, Austria, and Prussia—among whom Poland was originally divided; but that is not the case. Indeed, so far is this from being the fact, that, at various times, one or more of these great Powers expressed genuine sympathy and tendered active support to Poland, whilst England was either silent, or, if active, active as an agent of oppression. When Poland was partitioned, England was silent. Two European Powers only protested against that crime: the Sovereign Pontiff protested against it, and the Head of the Ottoman Empire protested against it. These were public protests of Sovereigns representing two powerful and opposite interests. Second only in importance to these, and, in some respects, even more significant, was the private protest of the Empress of Austria. She was forced to bend under the influence of the Russian Court and the authority of her own servants. Monarchs have often yielded to the dictation of their Ministers; but there is no more painful instance of Ministerial power in the history of Europe than that which compelled Maria Theresa to sanction the partition of Poland. On the instrument announcing the complicity of Austria she wrote with her own hand these words—

"Placet, because so many great and learned men will have it so; but long after I am dead and gone, people will see what will happen for breaking through everything holy and just.

(Signed) "MARIA THERESA."

In a letter to her Minister, Kaunitz, she asked what they would gain by receiving a piece of Poland or Wallachia in return for their lost honour? On another occasion she said that she had brought a great stain upon herself; but that she would be pardoned if her extreme repugnance to the measure had been generally known. As far as the Poles themselves were concerned, the Protocols of partition were but pieces of waste paper. What the pen of the diplomatist failed to do, the sword of the Cossack failed to do. Treaties had been signed, and blood had been shed, but the spirit of Poland was still living; and, when the termination of the great wars of Bonaparte involved a settlement of Europe, the Polish question rose at once to the surface. In 1814 one of the first subjects discussed by the Allies was Poland. Russia was then desirous of making a Russian province of Poland; but Lord Castlereagh not only recognized the justice of the claims of the Poles, but was also fully alive to the importance of making Poland a strong barrier to Russia. This Conservative statesman, writing to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Vansittart, from Vienna, on the 11th of November, 1814, said—

"If His Imperial Majesty (of Russia) shall change his tone, and make a reasonable arrangement of frontier on the site of Poland; if he shall allow the other European arrangements to be equitably settled, including those of Holland, and after his tariff besides, then I must come upon you for my pound of flesh (meaning the Russo-Dutch loan, that is, England taking on herself part of a debt due by Russia to certain Dutch merchants represented by Messrs. Hoops and Co., of Amsterdam). The engagement with Holland shall be no obstacle to this, as I had rather give the Prince of Orange something more to defend and fertilize the Low Countries than assist the credit of a Calmuck Prince to overturn Europe."

Again, in Lord Castlereagh's circular note inserted in the Protocol of the Vienna Congress, dated 21st of February, 1815, we find the same policy announced—

"In the course of these discussions the undersigned has many times been obliged, in the name of his Court, to oppose with energy the re-establishment of a Polish Kingdom in union with Russia, and as making a part of that Empire. The wish constantly manifested by his Government was to see in Poland an Independent State, more or less considerable in extent, over which should reign a distinct dynasty, and which should form an intermediary Power between the three great Monarchies."

Talleyrand energetically supported Lord Castlereagh's policy. But of all the friends of Poland at the Congress Austria was the firmest. Austria insisted on the re-establishment of the Independent Kingdom of Poland. For the very reason that Austria desired the political and national existence of Poland Russia desired its destruction. One of the most sagacious of Russian diplomatists, Pozzo di Borgo, in a despatch to the Emperor Alexander, dated October 20th, 1814, thus expounds the Muscovite scheme—

"The destruction of the political existence of Poland forms the entire modern history of Russia. The system of aggrandisement on the side of Turkey has been merely territorial—I might say secondary—compared with that which has been carried out on the western frontier. The conquest of Poland has been made principally for the sake of multiplying the relations of Russia with the other nations of Europe, and to open to her a vaster field and a more noble stage for the exercise of her power and her talents, and for the satisfaction of her pride, her passions, and her interests. From this design, crowned as it has been by the most complete success, habits have resulted which it is impossible to efface by a mere proclamation, without injuring the empire in its most essential and most delicate element, that of unity of Government."

"If there existed between Russia and the rest of Europe a civilized mass of nine millions, constituting one nation, the reciprocal influence and communication of Russia and Europe would incessantly diminish. The Russians, restrained within their ancient frontier, or merely passing it as travellers, would become almost unknown to the other nations. To withdraw Poland from under the imperial sceptre would be to compel the Russians to receive everything at second hand."

The hindrance which this separation would be to the development of their moral faculties, to their education, to their participation in enlightenment, arts, and liberal ideas, is incalculable. It was for the purpose of plunging Russia for ever in barbarism, and of rendering it an exclusively Asiatic power, that Napoleon imagined the restoration of Poland, as it was for the purpose of gaining for Russia a distinguished place amongst the most civilized nations of Europe that your Majesty's predecessors desired conquests which must necessarily lead to contact with them."

The escape of Napoleon from Elba led to a new disposition of the Great Powers in respect of Poland. The Duc de Richelieu, on the part of France, did not maintain the same ground as that taken by Talleyrand. England also yielded. Austria alone still held firmly to the cause of Poland; and, when she was forced to give way, she did so under a grave protest, which is, to this day, a record of the wisdom of her statesmen, as well as a solemn assertion of Polish nationality.

Sir, it was under such circumstances that the Treaties of Vienna and the subsequent charters were signed. These instruments imposed conditions upon the great Powers, and reciprocal conditions of allegiance upon the Poles. Be it remembered, however, that the latter were not willing parties to these engagements. But, putting that aside, whether the Poles were parties to the conditions of 1815, or whether they were not, I am bound distinctly to declare that, in my opinion, it was not the Poles who violated the conditions. What were the conditions under which Russia obtained her share of Poland? The Treaty of Vienna stipulated that the civil rights of Poland should be maintained, that the nationality of Poland should be preserved, that the commercial system of Poland should be continued, that the Diet should be summoned every two years, and a Budget laid before them every four years, that no Russian official should hold office in the administration of Poland, and that the rights of the Catholic and the United Greek Church should be preserved. It was alleged by Russia that these conditions were broken by the Poles when they rose in insurrection in 1831. This is totally false. The Treaty of Vienna was the title-deed by which Russia held Poland, and I defy any friend of Russia to maintain that the trusts of that deed had been broken by the Poles. No, they were broken by Russia. The Poles rose in insurrection to defend their rights from the flagrant breaches of the treaty committed by Russia. The statement of the Poles to that effect has never been openly denied by any Minister in this House. We are, however, in almost total ignorance of what the conduct of England has been in regard to the events of 1831 and 1832. Many hon. Members have asked over and over again for copies of the despatches which passed between the Courts of St. James's and St. Petersburg, but no one has succeeded in getting them. I hope the Foreign Secretary will not now refuse to produce them. Russia then incorporated Poland, and the Emperor addressed the Poles in a speech at Warsaw, telling them that he did so as King of Poland no longer, but as Czar of Russia. Austria at that time was friendly to the Poles, and even during the insurrection assured them of her support if the other great Powers would join her. In 1831, the Envoy of the Polish National Government, whilst engaged in conferences with Prince Metternich, received from the Emperor Francis, through his Minister of Interior, Count Kolovratz, the following confidential message:—

“The Emperor feels that the time is drawing near when he shall have to appear before the great Judge; the possession of Galicia weighs on his conscience as a crime; and he would be ready to restore that province to Poland, provided it were not annexed to Russia.”

The French Government, at the suggestion of Austria, not only took up the case of Poland, as Austria had done, but addressed a despatch on the subject to the British Government. I hope this despatch will now be published by the noble Lord. M. Louis Blanc, in his Ten Years, gave the reply of the then Foreign Secretary of England (Lord Palmerston) to Prince Talleyrand. In this despatch his Lordship stated that the object of the note presented to him by the French Ambassador was “to induce the British Government to interfere in concert with France in the affairs of Poland, for the purpose of stopping the effusion of blood, and of procuring for the country a political and national existence.” This course, the noble Lord said, His Majesty refused to take on account of “the frank and amicable relations existing between the Courts of St. Petersburg and of St. James's,” being also of opinion that the time had not arrived for adopting the proposals then made “against the will of a Sovereign whose rights are incontestable.” I hope for the credit of this country that this despatch is not genuine. What! Talk of the rights of the Czar over Poland as being incontestable, those rights resting upon a treaty every important part of which had been violated in the face of Europe! I call on the Secretary of State to publish this despatch. If it be a forgery, let the noble Lord tell us that it is a forgery; he has the honour of the English Foreign Office in his keeping, and it is now in his power to dispose one way or another of this great scandal. The proposal of France must have been to establish Poland as an independent and a self-existing Power, but the noble Lord's despatch, if correctly set forth by M. Louis Blanc, appeared only to recognize and to advocate the Treaty of Vienna, for it declared “that His Majesty will insist upon the maintenance of the political existence of Poland as established in 1815, and of her national institutions.” But even this wretched compromise was not carried out by England. So far with regard to the years 1831-2. The Poles were on the high road to independence. Austria and France were preparing to assist them. The Belgian Catholics, at the instigation of M. de Merode, voted eighteen articles in Congress in favour of the Poles. The distant governments of Turkey and of Sweden proffered aid to the Poles. The sympathy of Europe was on their side. Russia, for a moment, stood alone, and seemed about to give way; when suddenly the influence of England is manifested; the rights of the Czar are called incontestable, and a hypocritical appeal is made to the hollow and useless Protocol of 1815. Thus Poland, through English diplomatic treachery, is lost.

Since that time the Polish question has undergone some phases. The religious persecution prevailing in Poland since then has not escaped the attention of Europe. The Count de Montalembert, with a voice that rang throughout the civilized world, denounced the tyranny and intolerance of Russia. The French press still re-echoes his eloquent appeal. Even the press of England seems now to be sensible of the truth. In a recent number of Fraser's Monthly Magazine I find the following passage, and I quote it the more readily because it appears in a magazine of strongly marked Protestant principles:—

“The feeling of antipathy against the Russian invader is fostered also by the difference in religion. The great mass of Poles are Roman Catholic; a great number of whom are of the sect known as ‘United Greeks,’ especially in the Lithuanian provinces; these, being in communion with Rome, and acknowledging the Pope as their spiritual chief, form a powerful sect, between which and the orthodox Greek Church—the Church of the State—there is an antipathy great in proportion to the slight difference of their creeds.

“The Roman Catholics have been aggrieved by suspension for years in the nomination of Bishops, but the United Greeks are positively oppressed by violent efforts to make them conform to the national Church.

“Scenes have occurred since the accession of the present Emperor, and with his personal approbation in which peasants have been flogged and imprisoned for refusing to communicate in the ‘orthodox communion.’”

Within the last few weeks, the Chief Rabbi and the Jewish consistory at Warsaw, addressed a circular to their co-religionists, in which they thus refer to their oppression—

“Thirty years have elapsed since 1831, during which more than 100 enactments respecting the Jews have been published by the Government, not one of which contained any alleviations of our sufferings, but rather tended to increase our oppression. Of all who profess our religion throughout Europe, we are the only ones who groan under the barbarism of the Middle Ages. The number of Jewish taxes are innumerable, and our means of gaining a livelihood are more and more limited daily.

In 1841, the Russian Government issued ukases still further pressing on Poland. But the event of the greatest interest to the country since 1831 was the Crimean war. Now, I am informed by the highest authority, by an authority the value of whose testimony every European diplomatist would recognize, that the Austrian Government told us at that time that they were prepared, and were most anxious, to re-establish Poland, and actually asked the allies for a contingent of 100,000 men for the purpose. France approved of the Austrian proposals; but what did England do?

Who can answer that question? It is said—and the numerous petitions I had the honour of laying on the table to-night furnish us with some evidence of the fact—that the people of this country are deeply interested in the fate of Poland. Now, it is well known that negotiations on this subject took place during the late war, but these negotiations have been studiously concealed from the people and from Parliament. As far as official papers, blue books, or despatches are concerned, we are totally destitute of information as to the language held by the English Government at the time of the Crimean war with regard to Poland. But some time ago Mr. Nassau, senior, made known a report of some remarkable conversations, one of which took place in May, 1854, with General Shainofski, who said—

“I have reason to believe that Austria is thinking seriously of reconstructing Poland. Ever since she joined with Russia in the partition of Poland she has felt Russia pressing more and more heavily on her. I have lately seen a letter from Bourqueney to a friend of mine in Paris, in which he says that the Cabinet of Vienna proposed to join England and France, on condition of their lending themselves to restore Poland.”

It is to be hoped that Her Majesty's Government will to-night give us some information with reference to this subject. The intimate alliance existing between England and Russia before the Crimean war might to some extent account for the treacherous conduct of England. In 1850 the Marquess of Lansdowne said—

“The most intimate communications with respect to everything that occurs affecting the Powers of the North, and more particularly affecting them at this moment, are constantly taking place between the Russian and the English Governments—we availing ourselves of the suggestions of Russia, and Russia expressing her confidence and reliance in our views, and advising other Powers to follow the course and adopt the sentiments suggested by us.”—Hansard, 17th June, 1850.

The present Foreign Secretary made similar remarks. He said—

“There is no week passes that my noble Friend (Lord Palmerston) is not in communication with Russia with respect to points of policy on most important subjects, on which the two Powers are fully agreed.”

And when he (Lord John Russell) held the seals of the Foreign Office in 1853, he availed himself of his brief tenure of power to insult the cause of Poland and violate historic truth by thus writing in a despatch to St. Petersburg, on the 9th February—

“Upon the whole, then, Her Majesty's Government is persuaded that no course of policy can be adopted more wise, more disinterested, more beneficent to Europe, than that which His Imperial Majesty has so long followed, and which will render his name more illustrious than that of the most famous sovereigns who have sought immortality by unprovoked conquest and ephemeral glory.”

I say that the present Secretary of State, who professes to be such a champion of liberty, insulted the cause of Poland and ignored the most striking events in modern history when he addressed such language to the Court of St. Petersburg. Lost, indeed, and doubly degraded would be the cause of Poland, if the noble Lord was justified in describing the Imperial policy, which had been “so long followed,” as “wise, disinterested, and beneficent to Europe." No, the old and consistently continued policy of Russia is the very reverse of all this. But, puffed up and lauded by the Secretary of State, and steadily supported by the noble Viscount, that policy has flourished. No wonder, under such circumstances, when the Crimean war gave England such an opportunity that England neglected it. Thus, again, through the action of the same Minister the occasion is lost, and Poland once more sacrificed to Russia.

But it has been said, by the school of "economists and calculators," is it an English question at all? Does it touch our pockets, does it affect British finance? Has it anything to do with our Estimates? Now, in one sense, all this is a very narrow ground to take; but I am not indifferent to its importance, and would respectfully ask the attention of this economic school to the increase of the military expenditure of the Powers of Europe, and more particularly of England, consequent on the destruction of Poland. Even in the half and half condition in which Poland was left by Lord Castlereagh and the Treaty of Vienna she was intended to be a barrier to Russia. The truth of what the first Napoleon said was remembered, that if Russia destroyed Poland England would lose India. The action of Poland in the West would check Russian encroachments in the East. That was the opinion of Lord Castlereagh and all the statesmen of his day. Succeeding events justified that opinion, for, from the time Poland was destroyed an extraordinary increase took place in the military armaments of Europe and England. The Committees that from 1818 to 1828 inquired into the expenditure in their Reports laid down the principle that, as a rule, the expenses of the military armament of England should not exceed £5,000,000 a year; and up to the period when Poland was incorporated into Russia a reduction of the military Estimates took place year by year. After that incorporation, the Estimates, military and naval, began to increase, not merely in England, but on the continent of Europe also. An increase in one country led to an increase in others. The lesson that has been taught by this rivalry of the European Powers is one this House ought to take to heart; and they could trace it to the effect of the incorporation of Poland with Russia, and the removal of the great Western barrier to that Power. Again, how has that measure affected the commerce of England?

A few years after the incorporation, in September, 1842, The Times thus wrote—

"One of the fundamental conditions on which the kingdom of Poland was constituted and handed over to Russia was the freedom of commercial intercourse by land and by water throughout all the provinces which had formed a part of that unfortunate State before the first partition. Cartes traites, commercial prohibitions, frontiers hermetically sealed against the ingress of merchandise and the egress of men, and all the machinery by which jealous States protect what they call their interests, formed no part of the system of government which was promised to the several portions of Poland. But in defiance of stipulations Russia has now advanced the strict cordon of her prohibitive system to the furthest western limits of the Emperor's dominions."

English goods were once admitted into Poland with a duty of 5 per cent; now they are, in many cases, practically prohibited. What has been the loss to the commerce of England by the prohibitory laws of Russia in Poland? I have calculated it at £1,000,000 per annum. But this calculation does not take into account what what would have been the effect of the free trade policy England adopted fifteen years ago. Poland was one of the great corn growing countries of Europe; and our free trade policy would have enabled us to extend our Polish commerce; so that, taking all things into consideration, our annual loss at present is much more than £1,000,000. But this is not all. Russia prohibited the export of corn from Poland so strictly that the production has diminished. In many places it is no longer grown, because it is not allowed to be sent out of the country. Russia did this to develop the resources of other portions of her corn growing dominions. These facts, I hope, may interest the "economists and calculators."

But this is, in truth, a far greater question than the preservation of British commerce. The interest of England goes beyond the preservation of commerce. She has had several opportunities of supporting Austria and France in procuring the independence of Poland; but England has purposely evaded those opportunities, and we now behold the state of Poland. I do not wish to encourage revolution. Nor do I regard this as a revolutionary question in the slightest degree; it is eminently Conservative. If the preservation of the faith of public treaties be Conservative so is the question of Poland; if the preservation of the ancient traditions of a kingdom, and above all, if the preservation of right against despotic force and truth as opposed to fraudulent diplomacy, be Conservative, then I say the principles involved in this question are Conservative principles. Lord Castlereagh and Prince Metternich were not revolutionists: they laboured to restore the Polish kingdom. Austria is not a revolutionary power, and Austria, but for English intervention, would have gone to war to secure the nationality of Poland. On the other hand Russia is at the head of that revolutionary movement which, bewildering Europe, gives power to Russian intrigues; and, in oppressing Poland, Russia is mainly aided by the leaders of English liberalism.

I have said that England has been to blame throughout the whole of this business. When Lord Clarendon touched the Polish question he did it damage. Lord Aberdeen and other British statesmen of his day injured it. The present Secretary of State has contributed his share to the armoury of Russian arguments. But the Minister who has from the beginning to this hour done the most against Poland is the present Premier. It may surprise some hon. Members to be told that when other great Powers were anxious to assist Poland, the noble Lord, on behalf of England, stepped in and prevented them. Had I myself heard such a statement some time ago, and had I heard it unsupported by the facts I have submitted to the House, I should probably have been surprised also. But this Session I have seen many things which must lessen the confidence of the country in the noble Lord. I have observed him rise in his place and lose his temper when accused by one of his own supporters of falsifying Sir Alexander Burnes's despatches. I have watched influential Members of the Liberal party recording their votes against the noble Lord when that grave charge was denied but not disproved. I have heard another supporter of the Government, when he brought forward the case of the Baron de Bode, taunted by the noble Lord with bringing forward a case involving fraud, and I have then seen, on that issue, the Minister defeated by a majority of this House, and the charge of fraud flung back upon the noble Lord. And, not the least disgraceful, I have seen the House counted out by the Government when charges equally serious were made against the noble Viscount by the noble Lord near me (Lord Robert Montagu).

Proofs of the Prime Minister's policy in regard to the Polish question are thickening; I ask the Secretary for Foreign Affairs to supply the links that are still required. I particularly ask him to give the correspondence between France and England in 1831 and 1832; and any between France, England, and Austria relating to Poland at the time of the Crimean war. I also wish to ask whether a circular letter addressed to the Cabinets of Europe, in April last, by Prince Gortschakoff, is authentic? I do not ask the noble Lord to produce the papers relating to that circular; I know the answer would be the stereotyped one, that they refer to still pending events in Warsaw, and that it would be inconvenient to give them. I only ask, therefore, whether the circular is authentic?

Having said so much of the past history of the question, I now ask the House whether the recent events in Poland and the present attitude of the people, even if there were no other interest at stake, do not justify some consideration of the subject? But, above all, if England, as I have shown, was a party to the oppression of Poland—if England did not avail herself of the opportunities there had been for giving Poland its independence, do not these facts justify the House in showing that country some consideration now?

Sir, in this story of English connivance at Polish oppression there is an instructing moral. I commend it to the consideration of what is called the Liberal party. Hon. Members who have comprehended the guilty action of England may fairly ask what pretension have British statesmen to style themselves the champions of freedom? If the noble Lords opposite (Lord Palmerston and Lord John Russell) have done so much to maintain Russia against Poland, and, in doing this have deluded Europe, and mystified their country with all the specious cant of Liberalism; surely their foreign policy to-day should not be exempt from scrutiny; and, when they call the loyal peasants of South Italy "brigands," and when they publicly approve of the barbarous conduct of Cialdini and Rivelli, we may be pardoned for remembering that the English statesmen who now support Piedmontese oppression in Italy, are the same English statesmen who supported Russian tyranny in Poland.

Probably, on another occasion, some Member of greater influence and position than I have the honour to hold, will make a more important Motion on this subject.

If, however, no one else will be prepared to do so, I shall certainly not shrink from taking that course. At present, with the double object of endeavouring to obtain information and of calling attention to a subject so disgraceful to British diplomacy in the past, and so full of European interests in the future, I content myself with moving that an Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her to direct that certain Correspondence which took place in the years 1831 and 1832 with reference to Poland, be laid on the table of the House.

MR. MONCKTON MILNES: I rise to second the Motion of my hon. Friend opposite. I need hardly say that there was much in his speech with which I by no means agree; but in the substantial part of it—namely, as to the importance of from time to time directing the attention of this House to the condition of Poland, I entirely concur. No one feels more than I do the impolicy of interfering capriciously with the administration of foreign countries, even if it be wrong; but if treaty rights are to be respected we have certain responsibilities with reference to the condition of Poland which we cannot altogether set aside, and certain duties to perform which we cannot altogether neglect. That the independence of Poland formed a substantial part of the Treaties of Vienna, and that if those treaties are to be appealed to at all that independence must be respected, are facts upon which it is not necessary to expatiate; but at this moment I think it would be well if the great Powers of Europe who rest so much upon the Treaties of Vienna would remember that if this question of the independence of Poland is to remain unsolved, and if such an outrage as the destruction of the Republic of Cracow is to continue unremedied, it is impossible for those Powers with an unfaltering voice to ask France or any other Power to respect those treaties. If we are, as it is said, upon the eve of great changes; if French ambition, not, perhaps, so much that of the Emperor as of the nation, is likely to lead that country to endeavour to recover its natural frontiers, I cannot see how England could be called upon to assist those Powers in protecting what they consider their legitimate rights, unless they each do what they can to remedy the infractions of the treaties which have taken place. I cannot agree with my hon. Friend that the conduct of England towards Poland has been such as he has described. The question of the nationality of Poland has always excited deep and permanent interest in the minds of the people of this country—a singularly permanent interest, considering how little intercourse there has been between the two countries, and how little material interest we have in the fortunes of Poland. There was, however, about the disruption of Poland in the last century a cold-blooded immorality which shocked the conscience of Europe, and the feeling of which, despite the great events which have since occurred, the shock of the French Revolution, the wars of the Empire, and other important and stirring movements, remains now as strong, and, perhaps, stronger, than it was when that act of spoliation was committed. The interest which is taken in the affairs of Poland is entirely disproportioned either to the political importance of that country or to the political contingencies which might occur upon its disruption, because it rests upon a deeper basis than anything connected with political circumstances. The events which have lately occurred at Warsaw have greatly shocked the people of England, because we thought we had reason to believe that the Government of Russia under the new Sovereign would do nothing to shock the opinions of the nations of Europe. We saw the Emperor of Russia engaged in one of the most noble, and at the same time, one of the most difficult operations that have ever been undertaken by a Sovereign—determining, almost in the face of a hostile aristocracy, to liberate his people from serfdom. I only wish that that Sovereign could be made sensible of the feeling of deep disappointment which spread over this country when we saw that while with one hand he was labouring in this great and glorious work, with the other he was striking cruel blows of physical force upon the unarmed and defenceless population of Poland. All that we can do is to implore the Sovereign and rulers of Russia to remember that the great social questions which they are agitating do in a certain degree require for their settlement the moral confidence and the moral assent of the people of Europe. Russia is no longer separated as she used to be from the rest of Europe. Every day by railways and other means she is brought into closer physical contact with other European nations, and it will be impossible for her to maintain much longer the sort of almost Chinese exclusion which at one time separated her from the rest of the world. The Russian Government, enlightened and well informed as it is, cannot fail to perceive that the one question which is now agitating the public mind of Europe is that of the orderly direction of the national spirit of peoples. They must see what an effect the feeling of nationality produced in Italy, and what results it is slowly working out in Germany. In the face of that feeling of nationality, rising even in places where it was supposed to be extinguished or overlaid by other intellectual processes or moral feelings, can the Russian Government suppose that any good is to be done with Poland, which has maintained that feeling unbroken and unshattered through such a series of years, except by in some degree recognizing and regulating it? If there is one country which owes more than another to national feeling it is Russia. When the events of our time become the history of the world, the defence of Sebastopol by the Russian nation and the Russian army against the combined forces of three great Powers will be recorded as one of the most glorious instances of national feeling and national sacrifice which have ever been witnessed. Let not, therefore, the Russian Government, which owes so much to that feeling, believe that it can, with the approbation and assent of Europe, continue to keep down and utterly destroy the national feeling of Poland. There is no reason why these nationalities should be antagonistic or repulsive, or why one should lead to the destruction of the other. On the contrary, if they are to be properly recognized, and duly regulated, they may be advantageously united and prove a source of strength where now there is only weakness.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I cannot say that I am at all surprised that the hon. Gentleman should have brought forward the question of Poland. It is a country which, after all its vicissitudes, has preserved its national spirit, which must cause everyone to respect it. At the same time, by some unhappy fate, it seems impossible—almost impossible—that she should be able to unite her scattered provinces under one Government, and with a national Government of their own. The hon. Gentleman has alluded to various points in the history of Poland. It seems, as I have said, that there has been always something which has prevented the recognition of an established Government—of the independence of Poland. One might have thought that the first Napoleon who disturbed so many countries, who gave away provinces and crowns, that he might have thought it an object of ambition worthy of his great power and extended fame to restore the national existence of Poland. We know well that his opinion was that although he might raise a legion of Poles yet that as Russia, Austria, and Prussia were all possessors of Polish provinces, it was beyond even his power to hope to establish permanently an independent Government of Poland. The hon. Gentleman has alluded to the period of the Congress of Vienna. I must say I think that everything that could be effected by British diplomacy was done by Lord Castlereagh at that time. It is evident that Lord Castlereagh wished, when Europe was to be reconstructed, that Poland should rise from her ashes, and should again possess an independent Government. We may observe in the correspondence of the time, that when the Emperor Alexander I. expressed a wish that there should be a kingdom of Poland, and that he should be the possessor of it, Lord Castlereagh always said he desired the independence of Poland, but that he could not conceive that that independence was consistent with Poland being placed under the dominion of so powerful a Sovereign as the Emperor of Russia. Whatever Lord Castlereagh, with the assistance of France and Austria might have done, was completely thwarted and set aside by the event of the landing of Napoleon from Elba. From that time all the Powers of the Continent began again that work which they thought they had carried to a completion the year before. Their whole attention and their most mighty efforts were devoted to checking the ambition of Napoleon, and to confining within due limits the power of France. At that time, therefore, the independence of Poland was not thought of, and I must say that although there was a wish, as was shown by the Articles of the Treaty of Vienna, that the Polish people should have certain liberties, and certain privileges, that wish has been very imperfectly accomplished by the terms of the treaty which was agreed to. It was agreed that Poland should be united to Russia by a constitution—that she should have national institutions and national representation, but it was said in a subsequent part of the article that those national institutions and that national representation should be given by Russia, by Austria, and by Prussia in the manner which those Governments should think most suitable to their own institutions. That, of course, left a very wide scope for interpretation, but beyond that there was a feeling which acted from that time, and which is acting at the present time, namely, that while the Emperor Alexander I. wished to retain his power over Poland, at the same time he wished to grant to Poland large privileges and to make it, at all events, a flourishing province under the name of the Kingdom of Poland, but the general feeling at St. Petersburg, the seat of power, was that Poland ought not to be indulged with privileges more large and more liberal than were granted to Russia. The consequence of those opposite feelings was that to which the hon. Gentleman has alluded. The hon. Gentleman has said that the Treaty of Vienna was violated. I do not wish to enter upon that question. We are certain of this, that dissensions between the Government of Russia and the people of Poland broke out into insurrection and civil war, and a conflict was for some time carried on. At the termination of that contest the Emperor of Russia set about, not to utterly incorporate Poland with Russia so as to abolish the name of Poland, but he did deprive the Poles of the privileges which they had hitherto enjoyed. He deprived them of a national representation — of anything like representative institutions, and of a national army, which had hitherto been their greatest pride. Russian institutions were imposed upon them, and many grievous wrongs were suffered by them. During the administration of Earl Grey my noble Friend, who was then Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, addressed several despatches to the Russian Government. The hon. Gentleman asks for those despatches. The time is distant — they were written thirty years ago — and I do not think there can be any public injury arise from giving those despatches. The House will then see that my noble Friend contended that the Treaty of Vienna was still to be carried out in its true spirit; that by its spirit Poland ought to have a separate constitution, and the House will see how it has arrived that the Government of Russia has put forward a species of right of conquest, and assumed the right of abolishing all the privileges of Poland under the treaty. The hon. Gentleman, alluding to a subsequent period, has said — and I think he gave more than one reason for his allegation — that England had declined the task of reconstructing Poland, and that, therefore, she was guilty of contributing to the evils which Poland has suffered. I do not think that charge is justified by anything that has occurred. The hon. Gentleman will see that to the partition of Poland Great Britain was a stranger, and my belief is that if, at the time of the Crimean war, it had been proposed to restore Poland with all her former provinces, both Austria and Prussia would, in all probability, have joined Russia to prevent the accomplishment of such a plan. Now, as to this question, I must say I hope the House will consider what is becoming the dignity of this nation, and what is the duty of the British Minister who is to represent it. There are Powers with whom you may hold most friendly communication, even with respect to their own internal arrangements, but with regard to Russia, as I have said on former occasions, I cannot believe that any representation we could make upon the subject of the Russian government in Poland would be met in any other way than by a declaration that the government was conducted in the best manner, and that the advice of England respecting it was quite out of place. If that be the case would it become us to make useless representations? Is there any one who will say that we ought to interfere further — that we ought either by ourselves, or by endeavouring to form alliances with other Powers to break with Russia — to make war, in fact, with Russia with the view and hope of establishing the independence of Poland? I will not go into general principles, nor will I enter upon a consideration of the evils that would be caused to the world at large by a principle of constant interference; but I will only say that I think, with regard to Russia, that it would lead to a disastrous war, and, in the present situation of Poland, I do not believe that her independence can be achieved by such means. And, therefore, whatever may be our sympathies for Poland, I believe her interest points to tranquillity, and to petitions and requests for a more liberal form of Government, and for institutions similar to those which were granted at Vienna, and not to any hardened insurrection against the power of Russia. I believe, moreover, that the confidence of Poland would be entirely misplaced if she expected that any of the Powers of Europe would join her in such an attempt. Still, looking to a distant period, one cannot but think that for a people endowed with so much courage and with so much intellect, and which has so long kept alive the holy flame of national existence, a time is reserved when she may recover her ancient glory, and take her place again among the nations of Europe. I do not, however, say that this is that time, or that anything the British Government can do would hasten its arrival. A matter to which my hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Monckton Milnes) has alluded gives us encouragement with regard to this subject. Within a very few years we have seen great changes in several of the nations of Europe in the direction of representative Constitutions, of greater freedom of person, greater freedom of the press, and greater encouragement of those powers which bad Governments take away, and which good Governments are delighted to see their subjects enjoy. Russia has made a step in that direction. The Emperor of Russia, with great boldness, as well as with great liberality, has declared that within a period of two years the institution of serfdom shall be completely abolished. One cannot but think that modifications will be consequent on this great organic change; and that if, as seems to be the case, constitutional and representative Governments are to prevail in France, in Italy, and in Germany, in Russia also the germs of representative Government will at length take root, and finally grow up into a healthy plant. One cannot but think that in Russia also these advantages of free communication of thought, and of guarantees for personal liberty will be acquired by the improved and enlightened condition of her nobles, and by the popular spirit which will grow up when nobles and serfs will no longer be placed in antagonism. Whenever a change of that kind takes place in Russia the feeling will no longer prevail which is now entertained by nearly every Russian—a feeling of jealousy towards Poland, and a desire that she should not have privileges and liberties which are totally denied to the empire to which he belongs. But while I look forward hopefully to the future history of Poland, I am convinced that any hasty, premature intervention on the part of this country would be neither justifiable nor wise. I cannot say that I wish to maintain any relations with Russia but those of a friendly nature, and, from the extended relations of commerce between the two countries, I believe it is for the interest of both that they should remain on amicable terms. It is not, as I conceive, either for our own interests, or for the interests of Poland, that we should continually be making representations to Russia with regard to her mode of government. I offer no opinion with regard to the institutions that have been lately given to Poland; but they are institutions which seem to me to derive all their authority, and to depend for the spirit in which they are to be administered upon the will of the Emperor, as they are all to depend for their existence upon his pleasure. Still, it is impossible that district and provincial councils and municipal bodies can continue to act and be elected without effecting improvements in the condition of the people; and, indeed, the most patriotic Poles have of late years turned their attention to national objects under the guise—I will not say under the disguise, because I believe their efforts in that direction are genuine—but under the guise of agricultural improvement. The amendments which must thus be accomplished in the condition of the people by the promotion of knowledge and of education will all tend to the progress of the nation, and, therefore, while I do not think any active co-operation on our part would be wise, I believe Poland, so far from being destined to political extinction, will, by a gradual and peaceful course of enlightenment, at length resume her place among the nations of Europe.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, the speech to which the House had just listened was the most hopeful sign for Poland which he remembered in the course of a long Parliamentary experience. The statement of the noble Lord would give hope to the Polish nation, without exciting them to forcible attempts to obtain their rights. He was most anxious that nothing should be said in that House which would give rise to the expectation that England was likely to interfere by force of arms for the restoration to the Polish nation of their rights; but it was at the same time of great importance that they should state calmly and dispassionately their opinion that those rights had been violated, and that the events which had recently occurred were the consequence of that violation. He was confident, that although no active measures were pressed upon the Government, that there was in this country a feeling of the deepest sympathy with the Poles, and admiration for their conduct as shown in the late events at Warsaw, when, instead of flying to arms, the population tranquilly exposed themselves to be shot down, desiring no more glorious fate than to suffer for the independence of their country, and, by their martyrdom, to attract the sympathy of the nations of Europe. The Poles had, indeed, shown themselves worthy of institutions which they did not at present possess, but which in course of time they might possibly obtain. The noble Lord had given a sufficient reason why the Russian Government should be unwilling to confer liberal institutions upon Poland, when he said that it would produce jealousy on the part of the Russian people, who did not possess the same advantages. But the Poles were not without friends in Western Europe, and whenever the time came when free institutions could be secured for them without involving us in war, he believed that the British nation would come forward most willingly and most anxiously to obtain for them such institutions. And if there was a strong manifestation of public opinion in this country on behalf of the Polish nation, he believed that the manifestation in France was no less strong, and that the Emperor Napoleon would be ready to go hand in hand with our Government in any steps that might be taken to obtain for them more freedom and more liberal institutions.

MR. WHITE said, he could not join the hon. Member for Buckingham (Sir Harry Verney) in his exuberant eulogy of the noble Lord's speech, which he must say abounded in the feeblest platitudes that could be uttered on a great question. From that speech one moral was to be gathered—namely, that if a great Power were guilty of any enormity or atrocity its conduct would not provoke a protest from this country. Despatches were freely written respecting the late King of Naples, respecting Greece, Turkey, Brazil, Spain, and Portugal; but when a great Power was concerned a remarkable reticence was observed, which induced people out of doors to think that our Government was prepared to interfere in the wrong cause and at the wrong time, and very reluctant to do it for the right cause and at the right time. He thought it became the dignity of England, upon the occurrence of an event like that which had recently taken place in Poland, to put on record a deliberate protest against such acts as disgraced our common nature. He, therefore, hoped to hear a stronger expression of feeling from the Ministerial bench than had fallen from the lips of the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, that while concurring in all the generous sentiments which that debate had elicited, he wished that those who gave utterance to them on behalf of a distant country would not refuse to practice them nearer home. He trusted the Poles would not be induced, in consequence of that discussion, to place themselves in collision with the great Powers which now ruled over them, because if they did so they would find that they would receive no support from England beyond a few spirited speeches. It was true, as the noble Lord said, that the Czar was acting nobly in liberating many millions of serfs, but that act of enfranchisement extended to Russians, not to Poles. In this country we had a most liberal Government, which did everything liberal for England, but which did not assist in removing the oppressions under which the sister island laboured. Ireland was an exact parallel to Poland, with this only difference, that it was a very much worse case. When he had been requested to advocate the cause of Poland in that House, he had asked those who made the request to come down there and see the reception he would meet with in attempting to bring forward the wrongs of Ireland, and they would find that the grievances of any country in the world would awaken a better response than those of Ireland. When 250 destitute human beings were turned out upon a bleak mountain side, and their characters blasted, an inquiry into their case was denied. If hon. Gentlemen were sincere in the generous sentiments they enunciated on behalf of foreign nations, they would surely place a country which was under their own rule upon an equality with the rest of the kingdom.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: As the despatches now moved for are those which I myself wrote when at the Foreign Office, I wish merely to take the opportunity of saying that I entirely agree with my noble Friend in respect to their production. I then entertained the opinion which the British Government of that time entertained and expressed as to the course which the Government of Russia adopted towards Poland; and that opinion, couched in those friendly terms befitting the relations then subsisting between England and Russia, was that the course so taken was a complete and decided violation of the stipulations of the Treaty of Vienna. I agree with my noble Friend that it is impossible for anybody who has any admiration for high national qualities, for patriotism, endurance, love of liberty, not to admire the Polish character. And it is equally impossible for anybody who has any sense of wrong not to lament those misfortunes which have befallen the Poles from the time of the first partition of Poland down to the present moment. That partition was a gross violation of national right. The stipulations of the Treaty of Vienna were broken almost as soon as concluded. The British Government, upon every occasion on which it was called on to pronounce an opinion, or on which it thought it could pronounce an opinion usefully, declared that to be its view. And when the hon. Gentleman (Mr. White) says that the English Government interferes in some cases by opinion and advice, and does not interfere in others, I must tell him that the English Government interferes in proportion as it thinks it can do so usefully; that when it thinks its opinion may prevail it expresses it in the form which it believes the most likely to prevail. But when the Government feels that its opinions will not be attended to, and that the result will be that it will either have to submit to a refusal or to ask the country to take up arms—an appeal which the Government knows full well the country would not answer—why, prudence, and even the interest of the parties concerned, would lead it not to exasperate where it is unable to convince. The hon. Member who made this Motion thinks the British Government has neglected several opportunities when it might, in conjunction with other Powers, have restored Poland to independence. Why, the occasions to which he alludes were occasions on which war must have been made; and I ask any hon. Gentleman I am now addressing whether, in the course of his memory, any period ever arose in which he believes this country would have been induced to enter into an European war for the emancipation of Poland, however much we may have sympathized with her wrongs and desired to see her independence re-established? Take the Crimean war. During that war we were engaged in operations which had the security of Turkey for their object, and all the military and naval resources which England and France could command were directed to the Crimea and the Black Sea. Had we sent any of the forces which were engaged in those operations to the Baltic to act on behalf of

Poland we might have failed in accomplishing that for which we had undertaken the war, for a most important consideration in naval and military operations is the concentration of your forces to one point. Therefore, it is manifest that it would have been extreme folly to attempt warlike enterprises in two such distant quarters, even if we had the means of doing so. The hon. Gentleman thinks that Austria would have been a willing and powerful ally at that time for the emancipation of Poland. Does the hon. Gentleman remember that Austria, supported and encouraged by Russia, committed the greatest violation of the Treaty of Vienna perpetrated by any of those three countries? I will take the liberty of saying that perhaps the greatest violation of a treaty that has ever taken place in the history of the world was that which occurred in the case of Poland, because here were three Powers who undertook by treaty to support and defend the independence of the republic of Cracow, which had been established under their auspices, and yet those trustees and guardians of that republic combined to destroy that independence, and to incorporate the republic itself with the Empire of Austria. I do not think the case was a hopeful one for our getting the assistance of Austria to achieve the independence of Poland; but, be that as it may, we were engaged in another country, and we had not the means, even if this country had the will, to embark in such an operation. I concur with my noble Friend in thinking that a nation which, under such a long course of oppression, has resisted all attempts to destroy its national spirit must be destined, some day or other, for a better fate; but if the object of the hon. Gentleman was to induce the Government to take more active steps than are involved in the expression of opinion, I would say, in the first place, that I do not think we should be supported in such a proceeding by the people of this country; and, secondly, that the Government are not prepared to ask the country to make those sacrifices and engage in those arduous operations by which alone active measures for such a purpose could be brought to a successful issue.

MR. HENNESSY said, his object had merely been to obtain information. He would not presume to give the Government advice, but did he venture to do so, the last advice he should think of giving them was to interfere in the manner they had done in continental affairs.

Motion agreed to.

Address for "Copies or Extracts of any Correspondence on the subject of Poland, which passed in 1831 and 1832 between the Governments of Great Britain and Russia."

ANCHORS AND CHAINS (MERCHANT SERVICE).—RESOLUTION.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he rose to call the attention of the House to the Report of the Select Committee on chains and cables of 1860, and moved that in the opinion of this House it was the duty of Her Majesty's Government to take measures to ensure that all sea-going vessels, especially those employed in the carriage of passengers, should be sufficiently supplied with anchors and chains, properly tested as to strength and workmanship. All the statements he had made in moving the appointment of that Committee had been borne out in evidence. It was proved, in the first place, that the cables supplied to ships belonging to Her Majesty's service were seldom or never found fault with. They were subjected to tests so very effectual that on very few occasions were they discovered to be defective. It was proved by the evidence of manufacturers that the state of matters was so bad that nothing but an authorized compulsory test would be of any use. It was proved that a large portion of the chain cables used in the merchant service were made of inferior material and workmanship. At Liverpool no less than 82½ per cent of the anchors sent to be tested failed under a test of comparatively limited pressure. At Sunderland, where the insurance offices, or "northern clubs," were more exacting, and where a testing machine had been in operation for a considerable period, the cables were of a better quality. There all the chain cable makers who were examined concurred in the necessity of a test, wishing to protect themselves against the manufacture of inferior articles. So bad were some of the cables that they had been known to break on accidentally falling out of the cart in which they were being conveyed to the harbour. The Report further stated that the iron which in Staffordshire was fit for no other purpose was manufactured into chain-cables, chiefly used for small vessels. The wrecks on the coast of the British Islands, and which amounted to over 1,000 last year, were principally of small vessels. No inquiry took place as to the nature of the cables of those vessels ; and, whereas the chain which brought up coals and the men who mined it was tested, and the owner was liable to the punishment of manslaughter if the chain broke ; only put the same coals into a brig and wreck the vessel on the Yarmouth Sands, owing to the defect of her ground tackle, and nothing more was heard of the matter. The total loss of life on the coasts of the British Isles amounted to more than a line-of-battle ship's company ; and a very considerable portion of the deaths might be attributed to defective cables. It might be said that it was not the duty of the Government to prescribe to merchants the way of rigging their ships. But that was an exceptional case. Government did interfere in various ways where human life was concerned ; and he did not think it would be carrying that interference too far if they included the testing of chain-cables in the category of Government interference. The Committee came to the Resolution that good grounds had been laid by the evidence before them of the absolute necessity of public tests, and especially that all vessels employed in the conveyance of emigrants or Government stores should be obliged to furnish themselves with tested cables. There could be little difficulty in carrying out such a test. The Committee were unanimous in their recommendation ; and that which the Committee saw in theory, the dock companies interested in the management of such a supervision of cables had investigated practically. One point had thus been brought out, that a ship could now procure a cable which would hold her under any ordinary circumstances of wind and weather of a cheaper description than those which ships were formerly supplied with, the weight of the one cable being much less than the other. His object on the present occasion was not to force on the Government any abstract Resolution, but simply to find out whether it was their intention, with such a mass of evidence before them, to take up and deal with this question. He knew the difficulties which attended the efforts of private Members in endeavouring to pass a Bill on such a subject, or he should have undertaken the task himself. When the matter was of so much importance to the country in every respect, he thought it was the bounden duty of Her Majesty's Ministers to take it up and make it a Government measure.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT, in seconding the Motion said, that as a Member of the Committee, he cordially concurred with his hon. Friend as to the necessity, propriety, and imperative duty of the Government in taking measures to satisfy themselves that all vessels leaving the ports of this country, especially those carrying passengers, were properly supplied with anchors and chains duly tested by proper authorities. It would afford him the highest gratification if the Government would give a satisfactory reply to the Motion.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, the hon. Baronet had succeeded in eliciting a great deal of valuable information on the subject of the chains and anchors supplied to merchant vessels through means of the Committee for which he had moved last Session, and in calling the attention of the shipowners of this country to the great importance of having cables and chains in use which had been adequately tested, he had done a very good service. He (Mr. Gibson) had read over some of the evidence, and he agreed in the main with the opinion to which the Committee appeared to have come. He would read the main recommendation of the Committee. They stated—

“That although they cannot overrate the advantage of having the chains of every vessel subjected to a test, they are unwilling to recommend that the test should be made compulsory.”

Now, in that lay the whole question. If he were a shipowner, he should certainly desire that every chain cable he used should be properly tested, to see what strain it would bear; but if the plan of the hon. Baronet were carried out—if the test were made compulsory—contrary to the recommendation of his own Committee, a very great deal of inconvenience and expense would be occasioned to shipowners, and it would be necessary to have at the various ports throughout the country Government officials to see that the cables and anchors of every ship were properly marked. Then, where was such a supervision to end? There must be some limit. If the Government were to test the anchors and chains, why not also the masts and spars? Where one vessel went to sea with a defective anchor or chain many were provided with defective spars and masts. It would be necessary, therefore, first to inquire what proportion of wrecks were caused by defective anchors and chains, and what by bad masts and spars? He believed that very few wrecks in proportion were caused by imperfect chains and anchors. It was said that the anchors and chains of men-of-war rarely failed. But they were made much heavier than those in the merchant service, and it could not be intended that merchant vessels, with their small crews, should carry these heavy anchors and chains. He should say, however, that, as a rule, merchant vessels were supplied with anchors and chains that were too light. All the service that could be rendered in a matter of the kind the hon. Gentleman (Sir James Elphinstone) had performed by calling public attention to the subject. He doubted the policy of any legislative measure, and thought that the Committee had come to a wise decision when they recommended Parliament not to subject the chains and cables of merchant vessels to any compulsory test. He thought it would be very impolitic to place any such Resolution on their Journals as that it was the duty of the Government—

“To insure that all sea-going vessels, especially those employed in the carriage of passengers, shall be sufficiently supplied with anchors and chains properly tested as to strength and workmanship.”

He must, therefore, ask the House not to agree to the Motion.

MR. BENTINCK said, that he wished to bear testimony to the ability and energy with which his hon. Friend (Sir James Elphinstone) had brought the matter before the House. When his hon. Friend (Sir James Elphinstone) first brought the question before the House, he (Mr. Bentinck) was much impressed with its importance; but the views he then had of its importance fell very far short of those which he was compelled to entertain at the termination of the labours of the Committee of which he was a Member. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade had endeavoured to give a trivial aspect to the matter, and he had not grappled with the question in a manner which its importance demanded. He had thrown a sort of suggested slur upon the statement of his hon. Friend (Sir James Elphinstone) as to the large proportion of wrecks upon the coast which were caused by the badness of anchors and chains; but he had not endeavoured to show that the statement was not strictly accurate. Under these circumstances they were bound to believe the evidence taken before the Committee, and, if it could be shown that a large loss of life could be averted the Government were bound to take the duty on themselves. As to the extensive system of fraud practised in the manufacture of chains and anchors, the President of the Board of Trade would himself have been startled if he had heard it, and he would not then have treated the subject as one of trifling importance. Eighty-two and a half per cent of the chains which were tested at one of the principal sea ports failed under a very much smaller amount of pressure than it was considered they ought to bear; and, in addition, most of the chains made were not tested at all; because those who made them knew that they would not stand the test. On the coast with which the right hon. Gentleman was best acquainted, hundreds of light colliers had nothing but their anchors and chains to trust to in a gale, and went ashore like a snowdrift if their chains and anchors failed them. The professional evidence was all one way. It established that a great loss of life took place on the coast of England owing to the defects of anchors and chains, particularly the latter, and that there was but one way for the Government to take the matter up—namely, by making the test compulsory. The right hon. Gentleman altogether rested his case on the fact that the Committee did not recommend that the test should be compulsory. He (Mr. Bentinck) had in the Committee opposed this paragraph of the Report, believing that the Committee, in hesitating to recommend the compulsory test, were shrinking from a responsibility that they were bound to undertake. So long as the Government, with the evidence they had before them, refused to deal with the question, he considered that they would be responsible for the casualties and loss of life which occurred from the badness of chains and anchors. The right hon. Gentleman said that the proposal would entail inconvenience to the shipowners. “Inconvenience” seemed to be an odd word to use under the circumstances. If it was inconvenient for the shipowners to submit to regulations by which anchors and chains might be tested, it was a much greater inconvenience for men to be drowned and ships to be lost in consequence of the want of good anchors and chains. The right hon. Gentleman proposed to leave the matter to the shipowners, but that was exactly the present state of affairs; and it was because the shipowners were too shortsighted and indifferent that the hon. Member for Portsmouth called on the Government to make up for their want of energy, foresight, and humanity. The House had just been told that merchant vessels, being short-handed, could not carry the same anchors and chains as men-of-war; but the question was not the weight and proportion of the anchors—it was the defective character of the chains, and the systematic frauds practised by a great number of chainmakers in this country. The honest chainmakers, being damaged to a certain extent by those fraudulent proceedings, desired to have some regulation established by which the work of the honest man might be distinguished from that of the fraudulent dealer. A large amount of life and property was annually sacrificed in consequence of this fraudulent system, and all the evidence went to show that the evil might be averted by the adoption of some plan of compulsory testing; and he had heard nothing from the right hon. Gentleman to justify the Government in saying that they considered themselves exonerated from any responsibility in not attempting to deal with the fraudulent practices which led annually to great loss of property and life.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he thought that the hon. Member for Norfolk had not dealt quite fairly with the observations of his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade; for, instead of saying that the matter was of trivial consequence, his right hon. Friend acknowledged the importance of the subject, and stated that he was glad that the Member for Portsmouth had brought it under the consideration of the House. What his right hon. Friend objected to was that the Government should take on themselves the entire responsibility of testing anchors and cables for the merchant service. If they did so they must test those articles, not only when they were new, but after they had been used for a certain number of years, so that it might be ascertained that they were in good working order. He agreed with his right hon. Friend in thinking that if the Government interfered in this sort of way with the trade of the country, they would have the shipowners in a body complaining that their liberty of action was trammelled and controlled by the Government of the day. No one was a better judge of what the shipowners thought of interference on the part of the Government than his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade. The House would remember that a Merchant Shipping Act was passed some time ago, in which various measures were taken as proper precautions for the preservation of life and goods on ward passenger ships. Since then they had never ceased to hear from the shipowners that they had been unduly interfering with their private trade, and that the measure was productive of great inconvenience to shipowners and the public. Well, then, if they undertook to test anchors and chains they must do other things. They must see that ships had proper pumps, masts, and sails, for instance. The hon. Member for Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) had said that many ships were lost for want of proper anchors and chains, but he might have gone further and said that many of them were lost through bad pumps, and from the want of good masts and sails. If the Government was to make itself responsible for the ground tackle of ships it must do it for other matters. He was extremely glad the subject had been brought before the House, because he hoped it would induce the insurance offices at Lloyd's not to insure ships which were not properly found. They were the people who were most deeply interested in the matter, and if their attention were called to it by the discussions there much good might ensue.

SIR MICHAEL SEYMOUR said, that as a Member of the Committee which had been alluded to, he fully concurred in most of what fell from the hon. Baronet (Sir James Elphinstone) in reference to this question. With respect, however, to the testing of chain cables, he was at a loss to understand how the system proposed by his hon. Friend could possibly be applied. From experience in Government yards he was able to say that the test was not merely applied to new cables. Old ones, which had had years of service, had to undergo a series of examinations before they were served out again to other ships. He was at a loss to understand how to secure to merchant ships what the Admiralty did for the Royal Navy. He could not, therefore, support the Motion.

MR. HASSARD said, that the right hon. Gentleman had entirely forgotten the latter part of the recommendations of the Committee, which was, that from 1861 all ships which came under the Passengers' Act should be required to produce certificates that their cables had been properly tested. No one asked the Government to test the cables themselves, but merely to provide that a proper sanction should be placed upon the marks of testing, and that the forging of the marks should be made penal, so that the parties examining the cables might have some sort of guarantee that the cables had been properly tested when they saw those marks upon them. Lloyds at that moment required tests, but the complaint was that the test was fallacious, and the way the Report proposed to deal with the matter was, by making it necessary that the chain should have passed through a certain test yard.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, that when ships were first built they were supposed to start with good gear of every description, and when they came to Lloyds for their second registration they were put into dock, and it would be no hardship to require a second test on that occasion when they took a different class from what they took at first. With regard to restrictions he was opposed to restrictions of all kinds except in cases that affected life. A book was lately issued which showed that in the last eleven years a total of 6,883 annuities had lost their lives by shipwreck, and what would the country give now to have those men? [MR. MILNER GIBSON: How much of that loss was owing to bad chains?] Out of a long list of casualties to vessels a vast proportion were set down as "stranded," and if those vessels did not lose their anchors first the commanders must be mad. The argument derived from pumps did not apply, because every ship had got a good pump; and the reason why pumps went wrong was, either because the sand got into them, or they were choked by the shifting of the ship's cargo.

Motion made, and Question.

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is the duty of Her Majesty's Government to take measures to ensure that all Sea-going Vessels, especially those employed in the Carriage of Passengers, shall be sufficiently supplied with Anchors and Chains, properly tested as to strength and workmanship."

Put, and negatived.

LICENCES.—RETURN MOVED FOR.

MR. AYRTON moved for a return of the number of licences granted by the Board of Inland Revenue in each parish within every city and town, and within the county beyond the limits thereof in England and Wales, for the year ending the 30th of March, 1861, distinguishing the licences under certain heads.

MR. PEELE said, he must object to the Return in its present form, as it could not be given without great labour. He called for a Return of the number of each of 14 different kinds of licence in each parish. There were 15,000 parishes and more than 100,000 licences of one description only. He had another objection—namely, the difficulty of obtaining the required information, for the Inland Revenue Office in London did not possess it, but would have to apply to the several local offices throughout the kingdom. He would agree to the Return, if instead of “each parish” it was for each “borough and county only.”

Motion agreed to.

Return ordered,

“Of the number of Licences granted by the Board of Inland Revenue within every city and borough, and within the county beyond the limits thereof, in England and Wales, in the year ending the 30th day of March, 1861, distinguishing the Licences under the following heads:—

Licences under the Certificates of Justices of the Peace:

1. For the sale of Beer only;
2. For the sale of Beer and Wine only;
3. For the sale of Beer and Spirits only;
4. For the sale of Beer, Wine, and Spirits:

Licences under the Act 1 Will. 4, c. 64:

1. For the sale of Beer to be consumed on the premises;
2. For the sale of Beer not to be consumed on the premises:

Licences under the Act 23 and 24 Vic. c. 27:

1. For the sale of Wine to be consumed on the premises,
2. For the sale of Wine not to be consumed on the premises:

Licences held together under both of those Acts for the sale of Beer and Wine:

Licences for the sale by wholesale,

1. Of Beer;
2. Of Beer and Wine;
3. Of Beer and Spirits;
4. Of Wine and Spirits;
5. Of Beer, Wine, and Spirits.”

DERRYVEAGH EVICTIONS.

RESOLUTION MOVED.

MR. BUTT said, he rose to move the Resolution of which he had given notice on the subject. He wished to assure the House that he would not have ventured to revive the question if he had not the conscientious feeling that it was necessary to the peace and tranquillity of Ireland that there should be an inquiry into the whole case. It might take place either by a Committee of that House or by a Royal Commission. Upon that point all he could say was that he would willingly allow it to be made in any way which the Government might propose, but he contended that there never was a clearer case for inquiry. The owner of an estate had evicted the whole of the population on that estate; 47 families, or 350 individuals, had been turned out simultaneously, and their houses levelled to the ground, and that had been done not in the ordinary exercise of the rights of property, but as a punishment for the murder of a steward. In his first communication with the Government on the subject Mr. Adair represented that the state of society in Donegal was such that he had been driven to defend his life and property by his own armed retainers. The Lord Lieutenant, in his reply, called Mr. Adair's attention to the serious responsibility that would devolve on him if he took the step he contemplated. In his next letter to the Government, of the 16th February, Mr. Adair distinctly said that the eviction was not intended to benefit his property, but as an act of public vengeance. There was a distinct allegation on the part of Mr. Adair that it was his bounden duty to remove these people as the only means of ensuring safety to himself and family and servants. He drove these people from his estate. That did not rest upon his own assertion, but had been endorsed in that House by one of the representatives of the county, while the other hon. Member remained silent. They ought not to rest satisfied without further inquiry, and, indeed, they would not do their duty if they did not grant a Commission to inquire into that state of things in the county of Donegal. He could not conceal from himself that these evictions had given rise to a very strong feeling among the higher classes of society and the owners of land in Ireland, and the House ought to express some sympathy for these poor people who had been so cruelly evicted and driven from their homes. Mr. Adair admitted that his was an act of vengeance in superseding the law of the land; and after what had passed in the House there ought to be further inquiry, and, therefore, he begged to move the Resolution which stood in his name.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That, having regard to the papers which have been laid before this House in relation to the evictions which have recently taken place on the lands of Derryveagh, in the county of Donegal, the nature and extent of those evictions, and the allegations as to the causes by which they are said to have been produced, this House is of opinion that it is expedient that a full and efficient inquiry should be instituted into all the circumstances attending these transactions.”

MR. CARDWELL said, he was not aware that when the question was brought before the House on a former occasion the conduct of the Government was in any way impeached, nor did he think it necessary to defend it. The letter written from the Castle, and his own remarks on the subject, evinced, he thought, very plainly the feelings of the Government in regard to the eviction of so many families, a great part of whom could not have been concerned in the outrage which was said to have occasioned the measure. He also felt it his duty to state that the Government would not have been justified in removing Mr. Adair from the commission of the peace on account of their individual opinion on an act which was not in itself illegal, and the pith and gravamen of the charge having failed, he did not think it would be right to seek in Mr. Adair's correspondence for an excuse for such a step. The former Motion was a Motion for inquiry; but, like the Motion then before them, was simply for inquiry, and not with an express view to any definite result. He would ask them if it were in the power of the Government to invite the House to concur in an inquiry when they did not know the result to which it was to lead? That result was not stated in the Motion, and he had failed to collect it from the speech of his hon. Friend who had moved it. If its object were to discover the person who had committed the murder to which reference had been made in the discussion, he would reply that there were already persons responsible for the inquiry. There were resident magistrates and police on the spot whose bounden duty, earnest desire, and constant object it was to arrive at the discovery of the crime, and to bring the perpetrators of it to justice. But would they favour the discovery of the crime if they appointed a Royal Commission to inquire into it? Such a Commission was armed with no power to take evidence on oath, or to compel reluctant persons to answer the questions which might be put to them. It appeared to him that by such a Commission they might frustrate the object of justice, as they might give publicity to the tracks of evidence by which it was hoped to detect the criminals; but they could not possibly promote the ends of justice. Returns showing the state of the district for the last ten years were ready to be laid on the table, and no Royal Commission could add to the information which would be furnished to the House. The appointment of a Royal Commission might interfere with the efforts of the constituted authorities to detect the perpetrators of the murder, but could not lead to any practical or useful results. He could not, therefore, advise the House to do otherwise than adhere to the opinion which upon the occasion of the former Motion they had expressed.

MR. MORE O'FERRALL said, he regretted the determination of the right hon. Gentleman, particularly after he had condemned, in as strong language as an official could make use of, the conduct of Mr. Adair in regard to those evictions. It was a fact to be noticed in the case that the rent of the parties evicted had been paid up to the moment of their removal. It was a question, then, whether the laws for the protection of property had not been perverted to the purposes of vengeance; and he thought it would be a fitting subject of inquiry to see whether the law could not be so altered as to restrain individual landlords from these gross outrages, while preserving the protection which it afforded to the rights of property. He thought that in such cases a landlord should be made to intimate his intention beforehand to one of the superior courts in Dublin, and that such wholesale evictions should be carried out under the sanction and control of the law. Great sympathy had been evoked by the ejection of these poor people. They were the descendants of those who two hundred years ago were driven from the fertile plains of Ulster. They took shelter in these lone mountain recesses, and remained unnoticed until the modern demand for land tempted speculators, and stories were raised about the crime of the country in order to justify their wholesale eviction. He did not know any case which had excited so much sympathy in Ireland as that referred to, and he thought it a very proper one for a Government inquiry.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he thought the Government not entitled to remove a gentleman from the commission of the peace who had only exercised the rights of property which the law gave him in Ireland; but deemed it the worst part of the case that Mr. Adair had not transgressed the limits of the law. No doubt that his hon. Friend would be satisfied with a Parliamentary inquiry if any special objection existed to a Royal Commission. The picture drawn by the hon. Member for Donegal the other evening of the state of the county was greatly exaggerated. It had been said that a gentleman had been obliged to fly from Donegal because he was in danger of losing his life. The fact was, the gentleman alluded to became insolvent, and had to remove from the county on that account. There was a strong feeling against Mr. Adair among the gentry of Ireland, and resolutions had been unanimously passed at a full meeting of a board of guardians, at which eleven justices were present, proclaiming their indignation and horror at the conduct of that gentleman. An attempt had been made to justify that conduct on the ground of the outrageous state of the county; but, as that was denied by those who knew the county best, he thought it was incumbent upon the Government to step in and inquire into the truth.

Mr. MONSELL said, he thought the Chief Secretary for Ireland had not taken into consideration the special circumstances of this case. He never remembered any case where the eviction of so large a number of persons had been justified by such motives. The indignation of Parliament ought to be brought to bear on every man who was guilty of such a barbarous outrage. An attempt had been made the other night to justify the act of Mr. Adair by reference to the proceedings of the late Lord Lorton in the county of Roscommon. But there was not the slightest analogy between the two cases; for Lord Lorton removed no one from his property except by purchase, and every family received money enough to take it to America. The manner in which the case had been justified, and the atrocity of the case itself, did call for exceptional treatment at the hands of the legislature, and he trusted that his right hon. Friend would not continue to oppose a Motion which was supported by nearly every Irish Member on that side of the House.

Mr. BRUEN said, he regretted that his hon. Friend, the Member for Donegal, was not in the House to justify the statement he had made on a former occasion, which was that night called into question. He did not think that the language of his hon. Friend went to that extent which the hon. Member for Dungarvan seemed to imagine.

Mr. VINCENT SCULLY said, he had hoped some English Liberal Member would have stepped forward and uttered a few words of sympathy with the Irish sufferers who were the objects of that discussion. The case had created more sympathy in Ireland than any other that he had ever known. His own wish in the Motion he had himself made was not for a personal inquiry, but an inquiry into the general subject of evictions. He had, however, given way to the advice of hon. Gentlemen, and especially to that of the hon. Member (Mr. Butt) himself, who had told him that to take up an individual case was no more frittering the subject away than the impeachment of a single statesman was frittering away the cause of the people of India. He had taken more pains to get up the facts than he had ever done before in his life; and he maintained that the allegations made by Mr. Adair respecting the state of the country in the neighbourhood of Derryveagh were totally untrue, and that Mr. Adair had in his possession the means of ascertaining their utter groundlessness. A very able article had appeared in The Times, which, in his opinion, set forth the necessity of further information. On the other hand, the Conservative organ in this country had alluded to Mr. Adair's assertions as established. The writer of that article commenced by observing "Mr. Scully has had his meed of revenge, and we congratulate him upon it."

Mr. SPEAKER intimated that it was contrary to the rules of the House to read articles from newspapers in the course of their discussions.

Mr. VINCENT SCULLY said, he would express his regret at having infringed upon the rules of the House, and would conclude by saying that he thought, therefore, a clear case was made out for inquiry, and hoped hon. Members on both sides of the House would concur in granting it.

Mr. W. E. FORSTER said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland would not press the House to a division, but would agree to the Motion of the hon. Member for Youghal. The hon. Member for Youghal had stated, and it was admitted by the right hon. Gentleman himself, that society in that part of our common country was in such a state of disorganization that two classes were at war with one another. The landlord stated that for the protection not merely of property but of life, he was obliged to use his rights of property for vengeance. He thought that the House should have information as to what brought society in any part of the United Kingdom into such a state, and he should, therefore, support the Motion.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I am not at all surprised that the transaction which has been the subject of discussion should have excited a great amount of feeling, both in Ireland and in this country. I do not find fault with those who have thought it expedient to discuss it in this House, in order to elicit the opinions and sentiments it entertains upon that transaction. But at the same time I must say, when the House of Commons is called on to address the Queen for a Commission of Inquiry into the subject, the question assumes a different character. I think the House should pause and deliberate carefully before it takes any step of that kind. There is no doubt of the powers of the House of Commons; those powers, I may say, are almost unlimited. But great as those powers are, there ought to be a limit to their exercise. It ought to be very careful in the exercise of powers that are not denied, not to overstep that bound, and exercise its powers in a manner not justified by the principles of the constitution. It may very properly inquire into any public transaction, or into the conduct of the Government, or any matter affecting the interests of the nation at large. But it would be a most outrageous and dangerous abuse of the power of the House if it interfered with the private transactions of any individuals within the limits of their legal rights. If they have done anything beyond the limits of the law, if, from any motives whatever, they may have exceeded their power, the law itself will correct the evil. But it is not necessary for this House to interfere unless the Government has had a duty to perform, and has neglected to perform it. That might have been urged, had it been shown that the Irish Government ought to have removed Mr. Adair from the commission of the peace. But I am prepared to show, and it has almost been admitted, that this is not the case; the Government, therefore, ought not to be taken to task for not having done it. We are now called on to make an inquiry into the subject. What is to be the consequence of that inquiry? The hon. Member who spoke last says the state of Ireland is dreadful—that there is a war raging between different classes. I am not aware that that is the fact; certainly it is not in the county with which I am connected, which is not very remote from Donegal. I am not aware that such a calamity exists as a war of classes. But we are called on to institute an inquiry; it might be a fair reason for inquiry into the social state of Donegal, if it was alleged that the county is in a state of insurrection and lawless violence, that crimes are committed there every hour in the day, and that some effective measures are necessary to repress them. So far a knowledge of the state of Donegal might be the foundation of proceedings to be taken either by the Executive Government or by the House. Well, this material will be furnished to the House immediately by the Return moved by the hon. Member for Donegal of the amount of crime in that county committed during the last ten years. When that Return is made it will be for the House to consider whether it furnishes grounds on which other steps ought to be taken, or whether a Coercion Act ought to be applied to that county. If it should be thought, on the whole, that no inquiry into the state of Donegal is necessary, are we to address the Crown to ascertain who was the guilty party in the murder of Mr. Murray. ["No!"] My hon. Friend says "No," and certainly no sensible man can say "Yes;" for, if this House is to address the Crown for a special inquiry into the circumstances of every such murder, that would be assuming the functions of the Executive Government, and imposing on the House duties quite foreign to its attributes. We might much sooner address the Crown to investigate the Road murder, that excited so much interest in the public mind, or any of the strange murders that are from time to time committed. The object of inquiry, therefore, not being the state of Donegal or the murder of Mr. Murray, the only question that remains is the exercise by Mr. Adair of his unquestionable right to eject his tenants; but that is not a fit subject for an inquiry by this House. If any one alleges that he has exceeded his legal power over his tenants, they or their friends have a remedy by process of law. But it is admitted that this exercise of power on the part of Mr. Adair was within his legal attributes and functions. If the House is to inquire into the conduct of individuals in exercising the rights the law gives them merely because it considers and, perhaps, justly considers them in the wrong, and not justified by the circumstances of the case, then I say we may assume to be the censors of the private conduct of every private individual in the country, and our authority would be carried to the extent of abuse. The House of Commons, I trust, will never be induced to take the first steps in such a proceeding. I do not mean to justify Mr. Adair. I have a great abhorrence of the system of clearing estates, that has been practised extensively in parts of Ireland, though not so much of late years as formerly. But when hon. Gentlemen say that this act of

Mr. Adair is more unjustifiable than any similar clearance that ever was enforced, I must dissent from that proposition. When a man, merely from interested motives, and for the purpose of filling his purse, ousts hundreds of unhappy beings who cannot find a refuge anywhere but on the roadside, in the suburbs of a town, or—since the establishment of the Poor Law—in the workhouse, the Act is far worse than that committed by Mr. Adair. I am not going to justify him, but he might allege that the interest of society was his object; that the Ribbon conspiracy had spread among his tenants, and the only way to check it was to let its agents see that they could not execute their vengeance without punishing many persons in whom they took an interest. That may have been a wrong view, but it is one that could be urged in justification, and a person who acted with this object stands on fairer ground than the man who acts solely on the sordid motive of self-interest. I say again I am not defending Mr. Adair. A man's mind must, indeed, be very much distorted who can fancy it a real justification for sweeping away a whole population that he thought they ought to give evidence against a murderer, when probably they knew no more about the deed than he did himself. But the House of Commons cannot inquire into the motives from which an individual has exercised rights that none deny. With reference to Mr. Adair, therefore, there is no proper ground for inquiry. But the hon. Member for Kildare (Mr. More O'Ferrall) says the House should inquire with a view to legislation. My hon. Friend said that we might inquire with a view to legislation, and recommended the introduction of a measure giving fixity of tenure in Ireland. I may remind him, however, that the facts as they would affect such a measure are all granted, and that, therefore, on that account no inquiry is needed. I hope that the House will not be led by feelings which are honourable in themselves into what would be an entire departure from the proper functions of Parliament, and might lead to abuses so intolerable that the whole country would rise in indignation against the proceedings of this House.

Mr. MORE O'FERRALL said, that he had been misrepresented unintentionally by the noble Lord. He had not said one word about fixity of tenure or permanent tenure. What he had said was that an inquiry might be instituted as to whether the law had not been misapplied for purposes of vengeance, and, if so, whether such an alteration could not be made as would prevent landlords from applying the law to such purposes?

Mr. BUTT in reply said, he must deny that the conduct of Mr. Adair was a private transaction. Upwards of 200 policemen, who were supported by the country, were brought to the aid of Mr. Adair for the purpose of ejecting his poor tenants. Was that not a public transaction? The people of Ireland would be justified in inferring from the tone of the Government speeches that there was no sympathy for them in that House, and he would warn the Government that that opposition to the wishes of every one of their Irish supporters, could not, in the nature of things, continue much longer, and that they would soon lose all Irish support.

CADASTRAL SURVEY COMMITTEE.

RESOLUTION.

VISCOUNT BURY said, he would move that the Select Committee have power to adjourn from place to place.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he should be glad to know to what the Committee referred.

Mr. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, that hon. Members would be glad to have some explanation of the scope and objects of the inquiry pursued by the Cadastral Survey Committee, and why it should be anxious, in the terms of the notice, "to adjourn from place to place."

VISCOUNT BURY said, the Committee was appointed to consider whether a part of Great Britain which had been surveyed on the 1-inch scale should be re-surveyed on the 25-inch scale. Sir Henry James had invented a number of improvements for reducing the cost of maps on a large scale, and the Committee sought power to proceed to Southampton for the purpose of witnessing experiments in connection with those inventions.

Motion agreed to.

Ordered, That the Select Committee on the Cadastral Survey have leave to adjourn from place to place.

UNIVERSITY ELECTIONS BILL.
COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Electors to vote by means of Voting Papers),

MR. AYRTON said, he would propose to omit the words "nominate any elector or electors." In the Select Committee on the Bill he (Mr. Ayrton) had proposed that a voter might give his vote without going to the poll by going before a magistrate, and making a declaration as to the candidate for whom he voted. The Committee, however, did not adopt that suggestion, but allowed the clause to stand, by which any person entitled to vote at an University election, having filled up his voting paper, was authorized to send it to another elector by whom it should be presented to the returning officer. The effect of that provision would be to introduce a system of voting by proxy, because the voter might send a number of papers filled up with different names, and leave the recipient to use which of them he pleased. He would put it to the Committee whether it was expedient to sanction so wide a departure from the principle on which English elections were conducted, as that one elector should have the control over another's vote? In his view, the proper course to follow in the case of non-resident voters was for each voter to vote at the place where he resided, and that some machinery should be arranged by which the vote should be transmitted to the returning officer of the University to be properly recorded. It seemed to him that it would be better to disfranchise the University altogether than to sanction the principle adopted by the Bill.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 9, to leave out the words "nominate any other Elector or Electors of the same University."

MR. DODSON said, that the principle of the Bill had been already sanctioned by the House upon the second reading, and was to the effect that provided the voting paper had been signed before a creditable witness it should be received at the poll. The hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets treated that as a vote by proxy; but the essence of proxy was that a man empowered another to do something for him at the discretion of that other man. But in the case contemplated by the Bill the person who handed in the voting paper was simply a vehicle. He merely took the place of the postman, and if he wrongfully tendered the vote he would expose himself to the same penalties as an elector who voted twice. He did not think the alteration proposed was either important or necessary, and as its introduction would involve the re-casting of the Bill, and thus preclude its passing during the present Session, he must oppose it.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought the Bill was one which would require very careful consideration. The Bill provided that after the proper officer had made a declaration that the election was to take place on a certain day, up to that time the voter might sign a paper before a magistrate and hand it over to some gentleman resident in the university to tender it in his behalf to the returning officer, but no provision was made for successive candidates coming up. Was there any provision for withdrawing the papers when once given; and might a man give two, three, or more of those papers to be made use of according to circumstances? It was said that it was not proxy, but it appeared to him worse than proxy.

MR. DODSON explained that the voter might change his mind up to the time the paper was handed in. If a fresh candidate came into the field, unless the paper was actually handed in it would be in the power of the voter to withdraw it.

MR. HENLEY said, that when the voting paper was given in cadet questio; but when A had sent his voting paper to B to be delivered to the returning officer, had A the power of withdrawing it?

MR. DODSON said, that it was like sending a letter by one's servant—once it was put in the post it could not be withdrawn; so, once the paper was handed to the returning officer it could not be withdrawn, but up to that time the voter might do so.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the proposition was one of considerable importance, not only because it introduced a new system of voting in the Universities, but because, that system once established on the statute book, it would be regarded as a precedent for counties, and also possibly for boroughs. The objections raised to the Bill were by no means satisfactorily or conclusively answered. In the first place, it had been shown to depart from the established principle that a man was master of his own vote; the person to whom duplicate and possibly triplicate proxies were to be forwarded having an entire discretion as to the candidate for whom the vote of the absent elector was intended, and even a power of withholding it altogether. He would be in the position of a Peer in the other House of Parliament, to whom, according to the established doctrine as laid down by Mr. May, was delegated "the absolute right of decision, without any reference to the opinion of the absent Lord, expressed even after the signature of the instrument." But Members of the House of Lords were limited to a small number of proxies, while in the Bill there was nothing to prevent an indefinite number from being placed in the hands of one individual. The principal of a large college, the leader of a religious body, anybody with considerable influence among the mass of the electors might easily get fifty or sixty votes, or even more, placed in his absolute discretion, and, by withholding these till the last moment, he would practically become arbiter of the fate of candidates, and by exercising a power almost resembling that of nomination, which it had always been the object of the House to put down, where parties were evenly balanced, he might almost convert one of the Universities into a rotten borough. If these were not objections to the Bill, they were certainly consequences necessarily flowing from it, which ought to be very carefully considered by the House before sanctioning this measure. Again, the holder of the proxy might altogether suppress the vote of the elector whom he represented, for it was the essence of a proxy that the holder was put into the shoes of the donor, and might give or withhold the vote as he pleased. But let the principle be extended to counties, and let an active political agent collect the votes of 500 or 600 non-resident freeholders, and it would soon be evident what a new and formidable power the House was invited to sanction. There was another consideration, not of equal importance, but which ought still to have some weight. In the case of ordinary elections candidates met their constituents in the shire or town-hall, and were liable to be questioned and called to account for their opinions; moreover, during their canvass they were to a great extent brought into contact with the electors, who, by a sort of rude yet wholesome process, acquired an insight into the opinions of their representatives before their election. The pursuit of canvassing was useful rather than pleasant to most Members, but he should look with great disfavour upon any change in the electoral system which would tend to diminish the intercourse between a candidate and his constituents. In Universities, on the contrary, it was the etiquette for candidates not even to issue addresses to their constituents; they made no public declaration of their opinions, and did not canvass the electors. The consequence was, particularly in a highly-educated constituency, that many of the voters were likely to be influenced by arguments, by representations, and explanations as to facts; and it was, therefore, highly desirable that they should be allowed the benefit of reflection. But a voter in Truro or Carlisle who had to sign his paper and send it off was practically called upon to antedate his vote by several days, during which explanations might be afforded, or possibly a change of opinion effected.

MR. ROEBUCK said, that the law at present was that a man could vote by going to the University. What the hon. Gentleman now proposed to do was, to save the voter that trouble by enabling him to record his vote without going to the University. The difficulty with regard to a plurality of voting papers might be got rid of by enacting that the voter should only be allowed to sign one paper, and if he wanted to revoke it that he should come up and vote in person. If the holder of a proxy were compelled to put it in he would not enjoy any objectionable discretionary power; and even if he collected a number of proxies he would have no more influence than was at present exercised by a man who got a number of his friends round him and induced them to vote as he desired.

MR. LOCKE said, if voting papers were to be used at all the only safe plan would be to cause them to be sent direct to the Vice Chancellor. If influential private individuals were allowed to collect proxies the result would be that "the dons" would return anybody they pleased. He denied that those upon the spot were better judges of the merits of a candidate than the out-voters who mixed with the world. On the contrary, when he had gone up to record voting, and he should, therefore, give his vote, he found the persons residing in the University not only not in advance, but very much behind the rest of mankind. In the present day there was but little difficulty in voting at a college election. Formerly it was necessary to go up by coach, and sometimes to sleep on the way. Now, but little more than an hour was required to run down by railway from London; and the dinner in the hall, where old friends met, was one of the most pleasant reunions which could be wished for. The change contemplated by the Bill was not introduced for the sake of the voters residing in London, but of those who used to be called "Fen parsons." During French revolutions, it was said, a class of men came to the surface who were never seen except in troubled times. In the same way at University elections, parsons came up in brown cord-breeches and top-boots to give their votes, and had an opportunity of mixing with the rest of the world, but should this Bill become law and enable them to vote by proxy they would never be seen except by their parishioners in the Fens. It was desirable to continue the present system, if only to afford these clergymen the occasion for meeting the ordinary class of human beings. He had heard no answer given to the objection that had been urged that the recipient of the papers might record the vote or not as he pleased. He looked on proxy voting as a perfect abomination, and he wished to warn hon. Gentlemen opposite that if introduced the bulwarks of the Constitution would be broken down; for if the House adopted the principle with regard to the Universities it would be attempted with respect to other constituencies.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he had not been a member of the Committee to whom the Bill was referred, but as he knew probably as much of University elections as most Members of that House, having been engaged in three contested elections, he wished to confirm the statement made by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets, that papers would be sent up in duplicate and triplicate, with instructions to proxy holders to exercise a discretionary power in using them. When the contest lay between two candidates for a single seat, no difficulties with regard to proxies were likely to arise; but where there were three candidates for two seats, there would always be a struggle to obtain split votes, and the electors would seek by their papers to act in the same way as they now did with their votes, which they were willing enough to split, providing their favourite was safe; but if his seat were endangered they plumped in his favour. If the Bill passed they would send up two papers, one filled up as a plumper, and the other with a split vote, with instructions to use one of them according to circumstances. Whatever might be said in favour of the general principle of the Bill, he should certainly object to anything which would encourage proxy voting. He should, therefore, give his vote in favour of the Amendment of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets.

MR. HUNT said, he thought the precautions which the Committee had introduced into the Bill had been rather lost sight of. It was thought that if the holding of proxies were limited to those who would be able solemnly to declare that they were personally acquainted with the absent elector, and that they believed the paper correctly represented the vote which he intended to give, a satisfactory limit would be imposed to the accumulation of proxies. The 5th Clause provided that any person fraudulently withholding a voting paper should be held to have committed a misdemeanour, and be punishable for that offence; and to meet the objections which had been raised in the course of the discussion he proposed to add these words—

"Provided that no person shall be entitled to sign or to vote by more than one voting paper at any election, and shall declare before a magistrate that he has not signed more than one voting paper."

He, likewise, thought the personal vote of the elector ought to supersede the authority of the voting paper, and, therefore, he would suggest the addition of these words,

"Every elector shall be entitled to vote in person, notwithstanding that he has duly signed and transmitted his voting paper to another elector, if such voting paper has not already been tendered at the poll."

The Bill so altered would then contain every reasonable security and would afford a very great relief to a large class of University electors.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, it was no doubt possible to amend the Bill in the way suggested, but taking it as it stood, which was the only form in which it could be dealt with, it did not seem to offer sufficient securities in relation to proxy vote in favour of the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Tower Hamlets, which, he understood, was directed against that part of the Bill which affirmed the principle of proxy voting. His objections to the plan proposed were these—first, that the Bill admitted a duplicate and triplicate vote; secondly, it allowed the elector to withhold the vote at his discretion; and thirdly, it allowed a person to hold a plurality of proxies. The personal experience of the hon. Baronet (Sir Stafford Northcote) ought to have great weight with the Committee, and it was, on the whole, a question whether the system which it was proposed to introduce would not contain more evils than the one which it was sought to amend.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he would admit that it was possible to take objection to the Bill in its present shape, as well as to the shape in which it was first introduced. The right hon. Gentleman had very clearly pointed out the objections to proxy voting, and he might, likewise, have pointed out the objection to voting papers. But it must be recollected that the question referred to the Committee for decision had reference to the best mode for carrying out the object which the House, by entertaining the Bill, appeared to approve. It was difficult to decide a question which had to be determined by a preponderance of evidence. The Vice Chancellor of Oxford was invited to give his opinion on the very question at issue, and he declared himself in favour of voting by proxy, and gave his reasons. A witness from the University of Dublin suggested that to prevent fraud these proxies should be tendered by an elector, who should be prepared, if required, to state on oath that he was acquainted with the voter from whom he had received the proxy paper, and that it was in his handwriting. The Vice Chancellor of the University of Oxford declared that if a vast number of voting papers were received pending an election there would be great difficulty in verifying them. That that was no idle objection was proved by a fact which came within his own knowledge, where for a Poor Law election, apparently of minor consequence, some hundreds of fraudulent voting papers were sent in. Had the safeguard been required in each case that proxies should be sent to persons in whom the voters had confidence, such an occurrence could never have taken place. He entirely objected to the duty being thrown on the returning officer of scrutinizing hundreds of voting papers as best he might. The Bill appeared to have so many opponents, and so few friends, that he was afraid the clergy in the country would be compelled to go on voting in the present troublesome and expensive manner; and that the hon. and learned Member for Southwark (Mr. Locke) would continue under the painful necessity of seeing Gentlemen as enlightened as himself coming up at intervals to inform the University how much they were behind the intelligence of the age.

MR. COLLINS said, he should support the Bill, as he thought non-resident electors who still formed part of the Universities ought not to have difficulties thrown in their way in exercising the franchise. The course which the Committee ought to pursue was to go on with the clause and afterwards amend the Bill in other respects, if they should arrive at the conclusion that it needed Amendment.

SIR WILLIAM HEATHCOTE said, he felt that the question was involved in difficulty; but he thought that the plan of sending written papers by post was open to greater objections than those which would exist in case of voting by proxy. There was hardly one of the objections to voting by proxy which would not apply to papers sent by post; and, in addition, there would be, in the case of the latter, fresh difficulties arising from uncertainty in the carriage of these papers. If doubts and mistakes arose, they would have, for the first time, petitions in the case of University elections. He thought, therefore, that if the plan could be safely worked at all it could only be by employing persons as provided by the Bill as it then stood, to act as proxies, and as little more than messengers to deliver the votes at the elections. At the same time he was bound to say that he could not answer some of the objections of his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary; and, under these circumstances, he would suggest whether it might not be well to let it stand over for another year, in order that it might be more fully considered?

MR. ROEBUCK said, he was not surprised at the difficulties raised by the Members for the Universities, because when the mode of voting in that House was being altered the same doleful cries were heard. They were told that the new system would never work; that they were departing from the safe course laid down by their ancestors, and, in fact, that they were going headlong to perdition. Well, they changed their mode of voting, and the functions of the House had been as well performed since then as they had before the change. When the hon. and learned Member for Southwark talked of parsons in the Fens it was to be remembered that while a journey to Cambridge might be a matter of entertainment to him it might not be regarded in the same light by gentlemen with large families and small means. He would give the right of voting in all cases in which it could with safety be conferred, and have it attended with the least possible difficulty. It had been found that since voting papers were used in parishes a much larger number of persons took part in the voting than had previously done so. Though he did not agree generally with the clergy of the country, he thought them an honourable and intelligent body. The whole difficulty arose from the possible variety of votes that might be given by the same individual; but if there were only one paper given, and if that could be revoked only by the person himself, no danger could result.

MR. AYRTON explained that, in moving to omit the words he did not do so with the view of proposing any plan of his own. He did so, because he thought the plan proposed by the Bill an objectionable one, and one which ought to be rejected.

MR. WALPOLE said, that having taken a part in the proceedings of the Select Committee, and supported his hon. Friend the Member for Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt), he was anxious to explain why he approved the form in which that hon. Member wished the Bill to pass, rather than that in which the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets admitted he wished to put it. The difficulties of the case were very great, though in the object of the Bill the Committee generally seemed to be agreed. It was conceded that, when constituencies were scattered over the country, it was unreasonable to deprive them of the right of voting except at a great expense and inconvenience. The difficulties of allowing those constituencies to vote without such expense and inconvenience arose when they came to consider the machinery by which effect was to be given to the leading principle of a Bill of this kind. Serious objections existed to voting by paper without sufficient checks. Who was to ascertain whether the voting paper was that of the person from whom it purported to come? It might be answered, "There would be witnesses to that effect." But, supposing that to be challenged, the result would be that for the first time they would have scrutinies in the Universities to see if the votes were correctly given. Canvassing would be going on, and they would have all kinds of—he would not say frauds—but mistakes. Now, they were bound to provide against that as far as possible. His opinion was that they could guard against such evils only by requiring some person to appear and be responsible for the vote tendered, and who should then and there tender it. It had been suggested that under the Bill one man might hold 100 proxies. That might be a reason for limiting the number to be held by any one person, but it was none for supporting the Amendment. On the whole, he had arrived at the conclusion that no plan was so safe, practical, and good, as that which the Select Committee had adopted. He thought that the Members for the Universities were much indebted to the hon. Member for Northamptonshire; and he had much pleasure in supporting him in the form in which he had cast the Bill.

MR. LOWE said, that the object of the Bill was to relieve the voters of the Universities from that inconvenience to which they, in common with other non-resident voters in the country, were subjected in coming up to vote at elections. It was very desirable that should be done, if it could be done without creating a greater inconvenience than the one which it was proposed to remove; but there was no obligation on that House to adopt any plan by which a greater difficulty might be introduced than that which they desired to get rid of. It must be remembered that the inconvenience sustained by the non-resident voters of the Universities had been much mitigated by the establishment of railways throughout the country. They were much better off than they were thirty years ago; still, if greater facilities for voting could be given to them, without introducing any serious difficulty, he should be glad to assist in affording it. It must, however, be remembered that the Bill now before the Committee had never been read a second time. The proposition contained in the Bill which they had read a second time had been negatived by the Select Committee, because it seemed to them impossible that Parliament could adopt a scheme by which any precedent for counties, and also possibly for boroughs. The objections raised to the Bill were by no means satisfactorily or conclusively answered. In place, it had been shown the established principle master of his own vote, whom duplicate proxies were to be entirely at the discretion of the voter, whom the vote was intended, and it altogether of a Peer, ment, to ed doct' delega' witho abse nat' of proceeding in the Bill in its present shape, as well as in the shape in which it was first introduced. The right hon. Gentleman had very clearly pointed out the objections to proxy voting, and he might, likewise, have pointed out the objection to voting papers. But it must be recollected that the question referred to the Committee for decision had reference to the best mode for carrying out the object which the House, by enacting the Bill, appeared to approve. It was difficult to decide a question which had to be determined by a preponderance of evidence. There was hardly one of the objections to voting by proxy which would not apply to papers sent by post; and, in addition, there would be, in the case of the latter, fresh difficulties arising from uncertainty in the carriage of these papers. If doubts and mistakes arose, they would have, for the first time, petitions in the case of University elections. He thought, therefore, that if the plan could be safely worked at all it could only be by employing persons as provided by the Bill as it then stood, to act as proxies, and as little more than messengers to deliver the votes at the elections. At the same time he was bound to say that he could not answer some of the objections of his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary; and, under these circumstances, he would suggest whether it might not be well to let it stand over for another year, in order that it might be more fully considered?

MR. ROEBUCK said, he was not surprised at the difficulties raised by the Members for the Universities, because when the mode of voting in that House was being altered the same doleful cries were heard. They were told that the new system would never work; that they were departing from the safe course laid down by their ancestors, and, in fact, that they were going headlong to perdition. Well, they changed their mode of voting, and the actions of the House had been as well formed since then as they had before the change. When the hon. and learned Member for Southwark talked of parsons in the Fens it was to be remembered that while a journey to Cambridge might be a matter of entertainment to him it might not be regarded in the same light by gentlemen with large families and small means. He would give the right of voting in all cases in which it could with safety be conferred, and have it attended with the least possible difficulty. It had been found that since voting papers were used in parishes a much larger number of persons took part in the voting than had previously done so. Though he did not agree generally with the clergy of the country, he thought them an honourable and intelligent body. The whole difficulty arose from the possible variety of votes that might be given by the same individual; but if there were only one paper given, and if that could be revoked only by the person himself, no danger could result.

Mr. AYRTON explained that, in moving to omit the words he did not do so with the view of proposing any plan of his own. He did so, because he thought the plan proposed by the Bill an objectionable one, and one which ought to be rejected.

Mr. WALPOLE said, that having taken a part in the proceedings of the Select Committee, and supported his hon. Friend the Member for Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt), he was anxious to explain why he approved the form in which that hon. Member wished the Bill to pass, rather than that in which the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets admitted he wished to put it. The difficulties of the case were very great, though in the object of the Bill the Committee generally seemed to be agreed. It was conceded that, when constituencies were scattered over the country, it was unreasonable to deprive them of the right of voting except at a great expense and inconvenience. The difficulties of allowing those constituencies to vote without such expense and inconvenience arose when they came to consider the machinery by which effect was to be given to the leading principle of a Bill of this kind. Serious objections existed to voting by paper without sufficient checks. Who was to ascertain whether the voting paper was that of the person from whom it purported to come? It might be answered, "There would be witnesses to that effect." But, supposing that to be challenged, the result would be that for the first time they would have scrutinies in the Universities to see if the votes were correctly given. Canvassing would be going on, and they would have all kinds of—he would not say frauds—but mistakes. Now, they were bound to provide against that as far as possible. His opinion was that they could guard against such evils only by requiring some person to appear and be responsible for the vote tendered, and who should then and there tender it. It had been suggested that under the Bill one man might hold 100 proxies. That might be a reason for limiting the number to be held by any one person, but it was none for supporting the Amendment. On the whole, he had arrived at the conclusion that no plan was so safe, practical, and good, as that which the Select Committee had adopted. He thought that the Members for the Universities were much indebted to the hon. Member for Northamptonshire; and he had much pleasure in supporting him in the form in which he had cast the Bill.

Mr. LOWE said, that the object of the Bill was to relieve the voters of the Universities from that inconvenience to which they, in common with other non-resident voters in the country, were subjected in coming up to vote at elections. It was very desirable that should be done, if it could be done without creating a greater inconvenience than the one which it was proposed to remove; but there was no obligation on that House to adopt any plan by which a greater difficulty might be introduced than that which they desired to get rid of. It must be remembered that the inconvenience sustained by the non-resident voters of the Universities had been much mitigated by the establishment of railways throughout the country. They were much better off than they were thirty years ago; still, if greater facilities for voting could be given to them, without introducing any serious difficulty, he should be glad to assist in affording it. It must, however, be remembered that the Bill now before the Committee had never been read a second time. The proposition contained in the Bill which they had read a second time had been negatived by the Select Committee, because it seemed to them impossible that Parliament could adopt a scheme by which any

and had to remove from the county on that account. There was a strong feeling against Mr. Adair among the gentry of Ireland, and resolutions had been unanimously passed at a full meeting of a board of guardians, at which eleven justices were present, proclaiming their indignation and horror at the conduct of that gentleman. An attempt had been made to justify that conduct on the ground of the outrageous state of the county; but, as that was denied by those who knew the county best, he thought it was incumbent upon the Government to step in and inquire into the truth.

Mr. MONSELL said, he thought the Chief Secretary for Ireland had not taken into consideration the special circumstances of this case. He never remembered any case where the eviction of so large a number of persons had been justified by such motives. The indignation of Parliament ought to be brought to bear on every man who was guilty of such a barbarous outrage. An attempt had been made the other night to justify the act of Mr. Adair by reference to the proceedings of the late Lord Lorton in the county of Roscommon. But there was not the slightest analogy between the two cases; for Lord Lorton removed no one from his property except by purchase, and every family received money enough to take it to America. The manner in which the case had been justified, and the atrocity of the case itself, did call for exceptional treatment at the hands of the legislature, and he trusted that his right hon. Friend would not continue to oppose a Motion which was supported by nearly every Irish Member on that side of the House.

Mr. BRUEN said, he regretted that his hon. Friend, the Member for Donegal, was not in the House to justify the statement he had made on a former occasion, which was that night called into question. He did not think that the language of his hon. Friend went to that extent which the hon. Member for Dungarvan seemed to imagine.

Mr. VINCENT SCULLY said, he had hoped some English Liberal Member would have stepped forward and uttered a few words of sympathy with the Irish sufferers who were the objects of that discussion. The case had created more sympathy in Ireland than any other that he had ever known. His own wish in the Motion he had himself made was not for a personal inquiry, but an inquiry into the general subject of evictions. He had, however, given way to the advice of hon. Gentlemen; and especially to that of the hon. Member (Mr. Butt) himself, who had told him that to take up an individual case was no more frittering the subject away than the impeachment of a single statesman was frittering away the cause of the people of India. He had taken more pains to get up the facts than he had ever done before in his life; and he maintained that the allegations made by Mr. Adair respecting the state of the country in the neighbourhood of Derryveagh were totally untrue, and that Mr. Adair had in his possession the means of ascertaining their utter groundlessness. A very able article had appeared in The Times, which, in his opinion, set forth the necessity of further information. On the other hand, the Conservative organ in this country had alluded to Mr. Adair's assertions as established. The writer of that article commenced by observing "Mr. Scully has had his meed of revenge, and we congratulate him upon it."

Mr. SPEAKER intimated that it was contrary to the rules of the House to read articles from newspapers in the course of their discussions.

Mr. VINCENT SCULLY said, he would express his regret at having infringed upon the rules of the House, and would conclude by saying that he thought, therefore, a clear case was made out for inquiry, and hoped hon. Members on both sides of the House would concur in granting it.

Mr. W. E. FORSTER said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland would not press the House to a division, but would agree to the Motion of the hon. Member for Youghal. The hon. Member for Youghal had stated, and it was admitted by the right hon. Gentleman himself, that society in that part of our common country was in such a state of disorganization that two classes were at war with one another. The landlord stated that for the protection not merely of property but of life, he was obliged to use his rights of property for vengeance. He thought that the House should have information as to what brought society in any part of the United Kingdom into such a state, and he should, therefore, support the Motion.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I am not at all surprised that the transaction which has been the subject of discussion should have excited a great amount of feeling, both in Ireland and in this country. I do not find fault with those who have thought

MR. COLLINS said, that the voting paper would be filed, and every one would have access to them. The poll-book of the University would always be published, and it would be easy to prove the forgery for an election Committee if any voting paper were forged.

MR. CONINGHAM said, the Bill was calculated to throw an amount of power into the hands of certain resident members of the University which was most objectionable. It was a monstrous proposition to introduce the system of voting by proxy in the election of a Member for any one of the Universities.

MR. WALPOLE remarked that the vote would be signed in the presence of a justice of the peace, who would forward it. The object of the declaration was not to test the validity of the signature, nor was it, properly speaking, a voting by proxy. The elector voted as he pleased, and his paper was intrusted in confidence to some person to deliver.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he thought that if these words were omitted from the clause it would be necessary to restrict the number of proxies which any elector might hold.

SIR WILLIAM HEATHCOTE said, he was in favour of retaining the words in the clause.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he was disposed to agree with the hon. Member for Devizes, that these words would be no restraint to some members of election committees, whose eagerness might be great at the moment of contest, and a very slight acquaintance would be considered as sufficient ground for making the declaration. He doubted whether it was desirable that the words should stand. The Bill, in his opinion, would diminish and increase the power of the resident electors. It would increase the power of the few and diminish the power of the great body of the resident members. It would enable a few members to exercise an undue influence upon a contested election. Nevertheless, he saw no disposition on the part of the Committee to counteract the evils which, in his opinion, would arise from no limit being fixed to the number of proxies that a person might hold.

MR. ROEBUCK observed that the Committee were generally agreed that it was not desirable to limit the number of proxies any person might hold.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that the Vice Chancellor was, under the clause, obliged to receive and record every vote that was brought to him duly signed. The clause ought to provide that no person should vote in person and also by voting paper.

MR. HUNT said, he intended to move a proviso to effect that object.

Amendment negatived.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, that as a provision against the forgery of the signature to a voting paper, he would move as an Amendment to insert, after the words "personally acquainted with A. B." to add "and that I know his handwriting, and believe this to be his signature."

MR. WALPOLE thought the right hon. Gentleman had overlooked the fact that the voting paper had been already authenticated by the justice before whom the document was signed. The voter was sufficiently identified when the instrument was tendered by the party who stated that he believed it came from the voter. No other words were necessary.

Amendment negatived.

SIR GEORGE GREY moved the following proviso :—

"Provided that no such voting paper shall be received and recorded if the person signing the voting paper shall have already voted in person at the said election."

Proviso agreed to.

The following proviso was also added :—

"Provided also that every such elector shall be entitled to vote in person, notwithstanding he has duly signed and transmitted the voting paper to another elector, if such voting paper has not been tendered and received at the poll."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 3 and 4 were also agreed to.

Clause 5 (Penalty for falsely signing Voting Papers),

MR. HUNT said, that when they came to the schedule he proposed to make the voter declare that he had not signed any other papers at that election. He proposed to make a false declaration on that point a misdemeanour equally with the other false declarations in the Bill, and moved the introduction of words to effect that object.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause agreed to, as was also Clause 6.

MR. HUNT said, he proposed to introduce into the schedule a declaration on the part of the voter that he had signed no other voting paper at the election.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, that they should have security that the signature was attached to the paper in the presence of the justice; and, therefore, he proposed to insert the words "in my presence."

MR. DODSON assented.

The Schedule and Preamble were then agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported, as amended; to be considered on Friday, and to be printed. [Bill 221.]

INDICTABLE OFFENCES (METROPOLITAN DISTRICT) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. WALPOLE said, he rose to move the Second Reading of this Bill, which had come down from the Lords, and he should have thought it was one which would not have met with any opposition, but it appeared it was likely to be opposed in some quarters, and one hon. and learned Gentleman had given notice of a Motion for the Bill to be read that day six months. The Bill had received the sanction of the late Lord Chancellor and all the law Lords. A few of the provisions it first contained were objected to, but after it had gone through a Select Committee they all acquiesced in it. The whole of the principle of the Bill might be said to lie in the first and second clauses. The first clause provided that charges were not to be tried at the Central Criminal Court, or at any General or Quarter Session of the Peace within the City of London or the Metropolitan Police district, without previous investigation by a magistrate. In other words, it was provided that no charge should be preferred against a person by going behind his back to a grand jury in the first instance, when there was an opportunity of going to a trained professional magistrate, who could understand the charge, and see whether it was of such a nature and supported by such proofs as rendered it proper that the person charged should be sent to trial. The second clause enacted that when a charge was investigated by a justice of peace, in open court, it should no longer be necessary to go to the grand jury, who sat in secret, before whom witnesses were not confronted with each other, and who were not professionally trained, so as to be able to give that judicial opinion on the subject which a trained professional person was competent to pronounce. The main objection which was urged against the Bill was that it tended to supersede the grand jury system; and in that case, it was asked, what was to be done with a class of offences called political offences, in respect to which the grand jury system had acted as a shield of protection, and as a barrier between the Crown and the subject? His answer to that objection was that the 8th Clause of the Bill provided that the Bill should not apply to that class of offences, and if the clause should not be deemed sufficient for the purpose it could be amended in the Committee. It was said, and truly said, that the grand jury system had been a great protection to the people of this country against improper accusations, and against the undue exercise of power on the part of persons in authority. Nobody felt that that had been the case more strongly than he did; and if there was anything in the Bill which could supersede that system, he for one would not move the second reading. But what ground was there for such an apprehension, when in fact the grand jury system would, under the present Bill, be as complete in the country as now, and when political cases in the metropolitan district were by the 8th Clause excepted from the operation of the present Bill? Surprise was expressed that a Member of the Conservative party should introduce a principle leading, it was alleged, to the extinction of the grand jury system, which had proved so valuable not only in protecting the subject against the Crown, but in bringing the Judges of the land into constant intercourse and association with the landed gentry. His answer was that the Bill did nothing of the kind; and whoever considered the subject would see that the grand jury system was introduced for purposes for which at the present time it was no longer applicable in the Metropolis, though it might be very advantageously kept on foot in other parts of the kingdom. Fifteen years ago the Criminal Law Commissioners considered this subject, and directed questions to be put to a vast number of persons—Judges, magistrates, barristers, recorders, solicitors, and other persons acquainted with the practice of the criminal courts, and there was scarcely an answer given which did not amount to an acknowledgment that in the Metropolis the grand jury system was in almost all cases superfluous, and in many cases was very mischievous. One of those who gave an opinion at that time was the late Lord Denman, who, when referring to an article in the Edinburgh Review, said it contained an opinion he had formed some years before, that no benefits were produced by the grand jury system but the co-operation of the higher and middle classes in the administration of justice. In 1846 a presentment was made by the grand jury at the Middlesex Sessions, in which they stated that in their experience grand juries in the metropolitan district were a positive impediment to the administration of justice, and they went on with these significant words—

"Though they were perfectly aware that the court had no power to accord them any relief, and that it was only by reiterated representations that any consideration could be expected from the Legislature, they were the more induced to this step for a consideration of the nature of the cases which occupied the time of the jury, cases of so frivolous a character that the intervention of a grand jury seemed to have no possible object but the detention of the prisoners and the lengthening of the proceedings of the court, and did not as far as they conceived tend to any possible good."

In 1847 a remarkable observation fell from a Judge whose recent death they had had to deplore, who was not inferior to Lord Denman—he meant Mr. Justice Patteson—who, addressing a grand jury of Middlesex, said—

"It was not in his power to give them any information as to the cases which would be brought before them, because he had really no means of knowing what those cases might be, nor indeed was he aware that they would be troubled with any cases at all. They might think it strange that they should be brought together to hear this, but still it was a tribunal before which any of Her Majesty's subjects might prefer any charge. It was the law that they should be thus called together, and they must obey it."

In 1848 another presentment of the grand jury was made to the Central Criminal Court to a somewhat similar effect to that of the grand jury of Middlesex which he had already read. These matters were pressed so much on the consideration of the Government, that in 1849 the then Attorney General brought in a Bill to amend the law in respect to the grand jury system within the metropolitan district. The Bill was sent to a Select Committee, the witnesses before which expressed views similar to those he had just detailed to the House, one of them declaring the grand jury to be the hope of the thief. Before the Bill passed a new Government succeeded, and then he, as Home Secretary, together with the Attorney General of that time, (Sir Frederic Thesiger), introduced a measure for the amendment of the law. They had not an opportunity of passing all the measures they desired, but he believed that history would hereafter say, that there had been no Session during the last twenty-five years in which so many laws were passed for the improvement of the legal and social system as in the Session of 1852. Again, in 1853 the matter was brought before the attention of his right hon. Friend opposite by a memorandum drawn up by the Middlesex magistrates, who made three divisions of the subject:—First, where the magistrate sent the case for trial; second, where he refused to do so; and third, where the parties went before the grand jury without a preliminary investigation before a magistrate. In regard to the first they were of opinion that there was no necessity for a further investigation before the prisoner was subjected to trial. In regard to the second, they said there ought to be a further opportunity for investigation; and in regard to the third they said, the power of going before the grand jury in the first instance was oftener a means of enabling parties to get up cases for the purpose of extorting money from persons against whom they made accusations. The latter practice had to a certain extent been got rid of by the Vexatious Indictments Bill, and the present Bill would have a further effect in the same direction. In 1857 another Bill was brought in on the subject of grand juries, but it was lost in consequence of the lateness of the Session. A Bill had also been in 1860 introduced on the subject in the House of Lords, but the business of the Session had not admitted of its being proceeded with in the House of Commons. He had now stated fairly the nature of the case, but he might, perhaps, before resuming his seat, be allowed, in reply to the objection that there were no stipendiary magistrates in the City of London, or in those districts subject to the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court, to observe that from all he could learn, the clerks who assisted the mayor and aldermen in the discharge of their magisterial duties in the City were men of so much ability and experience that there would be in their case no greater risk of a miscarriage in the administration of justice under the operation of the Bill than in those instances in which the stipendiary magistrates were the persons presiding; whereas, so far as the outlying districts which were under the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court were concerned, the Bill removed all difficulty by providing that the cases with which it dealt should be investigated by two justices sitting in open court. He should simply add, that he did not think the Bill would be found practically to interfere with the working of the grand jury system throughout the country generally, inasmuch as it merely set forth that forty juries should not every year be summoned for Middlesex and the Metropolis, but that there should instead be three for the Central Criminal Court and four for quarter sessions. Having made these observations, he begged to move the Second Reading of the Bill.

MR. AYRTON said, he could not but express his regret that the right hon. Gentleman should have thought it necessary to submit the Bill to the House at that period of the Session, because it was quite impossible to discuss it with the care and attention it deserved, and he regretted it the more because the hon. and learned Member for Wexford, who had given notice of his intention to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months was not present. It was also extremely undesirable to proceed with the Bill at a moment when there was no opportunity of learning with respect to it the opinions of the law officers of the Crown. There was, he added, another very good reason why he was opposed to the course which the right hon. Gentleman asked the House to take, and that was that the Committee which had during the present Session been appointed to inquire into the government and taxation of the Metropolis, and which had evidence adduced before it which might tend materially to alter the views even of the right hon. Gentleman himself on the question at issue, had not yet been able to lay that evidence before the House. While admitting, therefore, that the number of grand juries summoned in the Metropolis might be looked upon as a great evil, he could not concur with the right hon. Gentleman as to the expediency of asking hon. Members to assent to a measure which was calculated entirely to subvert the existing system of administering justice as that which was now proposed. He was also prepared to maintain that, however much the right hon. Gentleman might endeavour to separate the Metropolis from the rest of England, yet the principle which he advocated was in the main applicable to grand juries throughout the country at large. The Bill, indeed, as it stood extended to the City of London, and those districts which might be called rural, where justices of the peace exercised the functions of their office in the same way as justices of the peace did in other parts of England. The right hon. Gentleman, it was true, said that he did not propose to abolish grand juries for all purposes, and that its provisions were not intended to apply to charges of treason, misprision of treason, or any offences against Her Majesty, the State, or the Government; but he might remind the House that in times of great political excitement a simple charge of assault might involve considerations of a political character, and that under the operation of the Bill there would always be the difficulty of deciding what was to be regarded as a political offence, and what as merely a private wrong. He looked upon it also as a very strong objection to the Bill, that while, in accordance with the existing law, any person committed for an offence within the police district possessed the advantage of having his case brought to trial within a short period, any person prosecuted by the Crown might, if grand juries were abolished, as proposed, be kept in prison for three times the period which he would if the prosecution were instituted at the suit of a private individual. It was, however, said that the system of grand juries gave rise to a considerable amount of collusion and fraud, and they, no doubt, like all other human institutions, had some imperfections; but a similar objection might be urged against the existence of every grand jury in every county in England, and even against petty juries themselves, as the experience derived from our courts of justice abundantly proved. He could, of course, very well understand that many persons in the Metropolis who wished to lead a life of ease, and did not like to be troubled by being called upon to discharge the duties of grand jurors, might support the views which the right hon. Gentleman advanced; but if those Gentleman were informed that they would be called upon to sit on petty juries he thought it not improbable that their opinions on the subject might undergo a material alteration. The right hon. Gentleman did not state that the observation of Mr. Justice Patteson which he quoted was made to the grand jury in the Queen's Bench, where the grand jury had really nothing to do. He (Mr. Ayrton) saw no objection to the abolition of a mere nominal grand jury. The question was not whether it would be convenient to this man or to that to have the grand jury system abolished, but whether a man should be put on his trial for felony unless his case had undergone a preliminary ordeal, and men of repute had declared it to be which demanded fuller investigation; those who contended that it did not, all, matter to a man who was innocent whether such was the case or not, for he might feel confident his innocence under the proposed system, be made manifest, he would simply say that the trial of being placed in the dock was to which they themselves, however it they might be, would like to be subjected. He must further observe that the right hon. Gentleman had not given weight to the fact that great changes had been made in the law since the agitation of the question at issue stood at its highest height, and he must remind him that at that time Lord Campbell had introduced into the other House of Parliament a Bill, which had been passed into a law by means of which many of the evils which had been complained of were obviated. That being said he thought he had said enough to point out to the right hon. Gentleman the inconsequence of proceeding with this Bill. He thought it would be withdrawn for the present session. He (Mr. Ayrton) must remind the House that the Bill was not confined to the Metropolis either in principle or in fact. If the principle were a true one, it did not the right hon. Gentleman come forward and frankly propose a general measure applicable to the whole country? At present until that was done, the Metropolis was not to be placed in an exceptional position and deprived of the benefit of an existing legal institution.

GEORGE LEWIS said, he had in more than one previous debate in that House had occasion to observe that the opinion of the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken with respect to the time necessary for a due discussion of Bills were of a comprehensive character. Indeed, he could not help imagining that the hon. Gentleman's idea of Utopian perfection in a legislative assembly must be that at least one of its Members should speak upon every question which came before it, and that each of those twenty Members should speak for at least two hours in the delivery of a speech. The hon. Gentleman contended that there was not, at that period of the Session, sufficient time for the discussion of the Bill under the notice of the day, which consisted of only eleven clauses and some formal schedules, and he then proceeded to say that the Bill should not now be dealt with for the additional reason that there was a Committee sitting upstairs on the subject of the government and taxation of the Metropolis. The first of those objections appeared to him, he must confess, to have but little weight; while, so far as the second was concerned, he should merely remark that in assenting to the appointment of the Committee he had distinctly stated that he did not look upon it as calculated to preclude the House of Commons from discussing any legislative measure with respect to the Metropolis which might be brought under its consideration. If the contrary were the case the legislative operations of the House would, he could not help thinking, be very considerably narrowed. He was prepared to give his vote for the second reading of the Bill, which had been considered in former Sessions and appeared to be founded on a just principle. He dissented from the doctrine that there was no distinction between the Metropolis and country districts with respect to grand juries. In the country a grand jury was composed of the principal persons of the county, and the committals were made by the magistrates sitting in petty sessions, whose decisions were not as a rule reported in the public press. A grand jury in London could not be considered as corresponding in point of social position to a grand jury in the country, and the committals in London were made either by professional magistrates or by aldermen, assisted by professional clerks. Both magistrates and aldermen sit in the presence of the public, and their decisions were reported by the newspapers. He thought, therefore, that there was sufficient ground for the establishment of a distinction between the Metropolis and the country with respect to grand juries, and he saw no reason why the House should not at once agree to the Bill. He admitted that there was a difficulty in drawing a line between political and other offences; but that was a question of detail which might be amply discussed in Committee.

MR. H. B. JOHNSTONE said, he was satisfied that there were cases in which the working of the grand jury had been highly detrimental to the well-being of the community and to the welfare of individuals. He could mention an instance within his own knowledge of a gentleman who, while travelling on the Continent, had an indictment preferred against him by a low attorney, for having made a mistake in an affidavit. As soon as the indictment was preferred the attorney made overtures for money to suppress the case; but the overtures were rejected and the case was abandoned. The gentleman against whom the charge was made being of a nervous temperament, the charge had such an effect upon him that he died in a fortnight. Now, that was not a solitary case. The cases of extortion had been very frequent, and it was the duty of the Legislature to provide protection to the public.

Mr. HUNT said, he would deprecate the passing, almost sub silentio, of a Bill which proposed to disturb an integral part of our criminal jurisprudence. The Bill provided that in the metropolitan districts a person should be sent to trial for felony without the intervention of a grand jury. That was an entirely new principle, and one which he hoped would never receive the sanction of Parliament. It was a mistake to suppose that the publicity given in London to the decisions of the aldermen and stipendiary magistrates rendered the intervention of a grand jury unnecessary; at all events, there was no difference in that respect between the Metropolis and the rest of the country, for all the principal decisions of county magistrates were reported in the local papers. But what were the stipendiary magistrates of London? They were persons holding office at the pleasure of the Crown, and in troubled times what was to prevent a tool of the Government from sending a man to trial without just cause? If such a case were to occur the country would regret the abolition of the grand jury system—a system which might be regarded as a great bulwark of liberty between the Crown and the subject. The Bill proposed that a grand jury should interpose in certain cases; but he should like to know how political offences were to be defined. Not long ago a man was tried for stealing a despatch. It was a case of simple larceny; but many foreign papers treated it as a political trial. He could not help thinking that the Bill was fraught with the greatest danger to the liberty of the subject and the cause of justice. At the time of the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill and the Durham Letter no Roman Catholic Bishop would have had the slightest chance of getting a fair trial if, without the intervention of a grand jury, he could have been sent by a stipendiary magistrate before a Judge who was a strong partisan. The grand jury system had come down to us from our forefathers, and he had no fear that it would be parted with lightly as long as the names of Jeffries and Scroggs were remembered by the English people. The hon. Member moved that the Bill be read a second time that day three months.

SIR MATTHEW RIDLEY seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now" and at the end of the Question, to add the words "upon this day three months."

Mr. NEWDEGATE said, he would move the adjournment of the debate, as he felt that at that hour (20 minutes to six o'clock) it was impossible to proceed with the discussion of the Bill.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

CHURCH RATES LAW AMENDMENT

(No. 2) BILL [Mr. CROSS].

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. CROSS said, he wished to appeal to the Government whether they would not assist those hon. Gentlemen who wished to bring about a settlement of the question by fixing some morning for its discussion—possibly next week, on Thursday?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he believed the noble Lord at the head of the Government, when a similar appeal was made to him, had stated that he was not prepared to fix any Government night for the discussion of the Bill. The hon. Member had mentioned a morning sitting for Thursday; but Thursday was a Government day, and at that time of the Session it was not usual to have a morning sitting on Government days. He was, therefore, afraid it was out of his power to assent to the proposal of the hon. Gentleman. He would further add, that a large portion of the Session had been already occupied with a discussion of this question, and one morning probably would not suffice to dispose of it.

Mr. CROSS said, that in order to secure the first available day for a discussion, and in order that it might be clearly understood that a discussion would take place, as Wednesday, the 17th, was already occupied, he would put down the second reading for Wednesday, the 24th of July.

the higher and middle classes in the administration of justice. In 1846 a presentment was made by the grand jury at the Middlesex Sessions, in which they stated that in their experience grand juries in the metropolitan district were a positive impediment to the administration of justice, and they went on with these significant words—

"Though they were perfectly aware that the court had no power to accord them any relief, and that it was only by reiterated representations that any consideration could be expected from the Legislature, they were the more induced to this step from a consideration of the nature of the cases which occupied the time of the jury, cases of so frivolous a character that the intervention of a grand jury seemed to have no possible object but the detention of the prisoners and the lengthening of the proceedings of the court, and did not as far as they conceived tend to any possible good."

In 1847 a remarkable observation fell from a Judge whose recent death they had had to deplore, who was not inferior to Lord Denman—he meant Mr. Justice Patteson—who, addressing a grand jury of Middlesex, said—

"It was not in his power to give them any information as to the cases which would be brought before them, because he had really no means of knowing what those cases might be, nor indeed was he aware that they would be troubled with any cases at all. They might think it strange that they should be brought together to hear this, but still it was a tribunal before which any of Her Majesty's subjects might prefer any charge. It was the law that they should be thus called together, and they must obey it."

In 1848 another presentment of the grand jury was made to the Central Criminal Court to a somewhat similar effect to that of the grand jury of Middlesex which he had already read. These matters were pressed so much on the consideration of the Government, that in 1849 the then Attorney General brought in a Bill to amend the law in respect to the grand jury system within the metropolitan district. The Bill was sent to a Select Committee, the witnesses before which expressed views similar to those he had just detailed to the House, one of them declaring the grand jury to be the hope of the thief. Before the Bill passed a new Government succeeded, and then he, as Home Secretary, together with the Attorney General of that time, (Sir Frederic Thesiger), introduced a measure for the amendment of the law. They had not an opportunity of passing all the measures they desired, but he believed that history would hereafter say, that there had been no Session during the last twenty-five years in which so many

laws were passed for the improvement of the legal and social system as in the Session of 1852. Again, in 1853 the matter was brought before the attention of his right hon. Friend opposite by a memorandum drawn up by the Middlesex magistrates, who made three divisions of the subject :—First, where the magistrate sent the case for trial ; second, where he refused to do so ; and third, where the parties went before the grand jury without a preliminary investigation before a magistrate. In regard to the first they were of opinion that there was no necessity for a further investigation before the prisoner was subjected to trial. In regard to the second, they said there ought to be a further opportunity for investigation ; and in regard to the third they said, the power of going before the grand jury in the first instance was oftener a means of enabling parties to get up cases for the purpose of extorting money from persons against whom they made accusations. The latter practice had to a certain extent been got rid of by the Vexatious Indictments Bill, and the present Bill would have a further effect in the same direction. In 1857 another Bill was brought in on the subject of grand juries, but it was lost in consequence of the lateness of the Session. A Bill had also been in 1860 introduced on the subject in the House of Lords, but the business of the Session had not admitted of its being proceeded with in the House of Commons. He had now stated fairly the nature of the case, but he might, perhaps, before resuming his seat, be allowed, in reply to the objection that there were no stipendiary magistrates in the City of London, or in those districts subject to the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court, to observe that from all he could learn, the clerks who assisted the mayor and aldermen in the discharge of their magisterial duties in the City were men of so much ability and experience that there would be in their case no greater risk of a miscarriage in the administration of justice under the operation of the Bill than in those instances in which the stipendiary magistrates were the persons presiding ; whereas, so far as the outlying districts which were under the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court were concerned, the Bill removed all difficulty by providing that the cases with which it dealt should be investigated by two justices sitting in open court. He should simply add, that he did not think the Bill would be found practically to interfere with the working of the grand jury system throughout the country generally, inasmuch as it merely set forth that forty juries should not every year be summoned for Middlesex and the Metropolis, but that there should instead be three for the Central Criminal Court and four for quarter sessions. Having made these observations, he begged to move the Second Reading of the Bill.

MR. AYRTON said, he could not but express his regret that the right hon. Gentleman should have thought it necessary to submit the Bill to the House at that period of the Session, because it was quite impossible to discuss it with the care and attention it deserved, and he regretted it the more because the hon. and learned Member for Wexford, who had given notice of his intention to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months was not present. It was also extremely undesirable to proceed with the Bill at a moment when there was no opportunity of learning with respect to it the opinions of the law officers of the Crown. There was, he added, another very good reason why he was opposed to the course which the right hon. Gentleman asked the House to take, and that was that the Committee which had during the present Session been appointed to inquire into the government and taxation of the Metropolis, and which had evidence adduced before it which might tend materially to alter the views even of the right hon. Gentleman himself on the question at issue, had not yet been able to lay that evidence before the House. While admitting, therefore, that the number of grand juries summoned in the Metropolis might be looked upon as a great evil, he could not concur with the right hon. Gentleman as to the expediency of asking hon. Members to assent to a measure which was calculated entirely to subvert the existing system of administering justice as that which was now proposed. He was also prepared to maintain that, however much the right hon. Gentleman might endeavour to separate the Metropolis from the rest of England, yet the principle which he advocated was in the main applicable to grand juries throughout the country at large. The Bill, indeed, as it stood extended to the City of London, and those districts which might be called rural, where justices of the peace exercised the functions of their office in the same way as justices of the peace did in other parts of England. The right hon. Gentleman, it was true, said that he did not propose to abolish grand juries for all purposes, and that its provisions were not intended to apply to charges of treason, misprision of treason, or any offences against Her Majesty, the State, or the Government; but he might remind the House that in times of great political excitement a simple charge of assault might involve considerations of a political character, and that under the operation of the Bill there would always be the difficulty of deciding what was to be regarded as a political offence, and what as merely a private wrong. He looked upon it also as a very strong objection to the Bill, that while, in accordance with the existing law, any person committed for an offence within the police district possessed the advantage of having his case brought to trial within a short period, any person prosecuted by the Crown might, if grand juries were abolished, as proposed, be kept in prison for three times the period which he would if the prosecution were instituted at the suit of a private individual. It was, however, said that the system of grand juries gave rise to a considerable amount of collusion and fraud, and they, no doubt, like all other human institutions, had some imperfections; but a similar objection might be urged against the existence of every grand jury in every county in England, and even against petty juries themselves, as the experience derived from our courts of justice abundantly proved. He could, of course, very well understand that many persons in the Metropolis who wished to lead a life of ease, and did not like to be troubled by being called upon to discharge the duties of grand jurors, might support the views which the right hon. Gentleman advanced; but if those Gentleman were informed that they would be called upon to sit on petty juries he thought it not improbable that their opinions on the subject might undergo a material alteration. The right hon. Gentleman did not state that the observation of Mr. Justice Patteson which he quoted was made to the grand jury in the Queen's Bench, where the grand jury had really nothing to do. He (Mr. Ayrton) saw no objection to the abolition of a mere nominal grand jury. The question was not whether it would be convenient to this man or to that to have the grand jury system abolished, but whether a man should be put on his trial for felony unless his case had undergone a preliminary ordeal, and

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY, in moving the second reading of this Bill, explained that its object was to afford facilities to local authorities for raising funds in order to construct new or improve existing harbours. The proposal was that the Public Works Loan Commissioners should be empowered to grant advances for harbour improvements on application made by the local authorities and sanctioned by the Board of Trade. The money was to be repaid within fifty years. When the money borrowed did not exceed £100,000 the interest was to be $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent, and any amount exceeding that sum was to pay a higher rate, but not more than 5 per cent. The Bill also proposed to abolish "passing tolls" from and after the 1st of January, 1862. These tolls were levied on vessels passing four ports on the Eastern coasts—Bridlington, Whitby, Ramsgate, and Dover. In some of these cases the harbours did not at all answer their purpose as harbours of refuge, inasmuch as at low states of tides they were incapable of being entered by the vessels which were, nevertheless, called upon to pay the tolls. They amounted altogether to £35,000 a year, and as money had been advanced on their security it was proposed, in respect of the debts of Bridlington and Whitby, to transfer them to the Exchequer. With regard to Ramsgate no debt existed; and although on Dover harbour there was a debt of £8,000 or £9,000, there was ample property to be handed over to new trustees as security for that amount. The Bill abolished all dues levied by certain authorities for charitable purposes, making provision for existing pensions. The Bill also dealt with the differential duties on foreign shipping. In consequence of reciprocity treaties, by which foreign shipping was placed on the same footing as British, Parliament had undertaken the payment of these dues to the corporations, Trinity House, and other institutions which in different towns were entitled to receive them. In 1826, which was the date of most of the reciprocity treaties, they amounted to no more than £10,000 a year; but in consequence of the great increase of foreign shipping they now amounted to £58,000 a year, with every prospect of their continuing to increase. It was most important to relieve the Exchequer from payment of these dues; but, as certain engagements had been made on the faith of their being continued, it was proposed that the abolition should not take place until 1872, by which time sufficient money would have been paid to meet those engagements. He thought that by giving the present recipients of the shipping dues ten years notice of their entire abolition, they could bring no charge against Her Majesty's Government that they had taken the harbour trustees by surprise, and they would also be enabled to make full provision for the contemplated changes. At Dublin there was a payment of £4,000 a year, originally imposed in respect of the harbour of Dunleary, which would also be abolished. It was proposed to make an alteration in the Dover and Ramsgate trusts. The Ramsgate trust would be transferred to the Board of Trade until further provision was made by Parliament. It had been suggested that it should be handed over to the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company; but for that purpose another Act of Parliament would be necessary. The Dover trust would be transferred to seven trustees, of which the Lord Warden would be President, and nominees of the Board of Trade, the Board of Admiralty, the South Eastern Railway, and the London and Chatham Railway would be members, as well as a certain number elected by the Corporation. This arrangement, he believed, afforded general satisfaction to the town. The Bill had received the general concurrence of all parties interested. It would clear up a number of questions which had been long agitated, and it would confer great benefit on the mercantile interests of the country. He hoped, therefore, that their Lordships would agree to read it a second time.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2nd.

to suppress the case; but the overtures were rejected and the case was abandoned. The gentleman against whom the charge was made being of a nervous temperament, the charge had such an effect upon him that he died in a fortnight. Now, that was not a solitary case. The cases of extortion had been very frequent, and it was the duty of the Legislature to provide protection to the public.

MR. HUNT said, he would deprecate the passing, almost sub silentio, of a Bill which proposed to disturb an integral part of our criminal jurisprudence. The Bill provided that in the metropolitan districts a person should be sent to trial for felony without the intervention of a grand jury. That was an entirely new principle, and one which he hoped would never receive the sanction of Parliament. It was a mistake to suppose that the publicity given in London to the decisions of the aldermen and stipendiary magistrates rendered the intervention of a grand jury unnecessary; at all events, there was no difference in that respect between the Metropolis and the rest of the country, for all the principal decisions of county magistrates were reported in the local papers. But what were the stipendiary magistrates of London? They were persons holding office at the pleasure of the Crown, and in troubled times what was to prevent a tool of the Government from sending a man to trial without just cause? If such a case were to occur the country would regret the abolition of the grand jury system—a system which might be regarded as a great bulwark of liberty between the Crown and the subject. The Bill proposed that a grand jury should interpose in certain cases; but he should like to know how political offences were to be defined. Not long ago a man was tried for stealing a despatch. It was a case of simple larceny; but many foreign papers treated it as a political trial. He could not help thinking that the Bill was fraught with the greatest danger to the liberty of the subject and the cause of justice. At the time of the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill and the Durham Letter no Roman Catholic Bishop would have had the slightest chance of getting a fair trial if, without the intervention of a grand jury, he could have been sent by a stipendiary magistrate before a Judge who was a strong partisan. The grand jury system had come down to us from our forefathers, and he had no fear that it would be parted with lightly as long as the names of Jeffries and Scroggs were remembered by the English people. The hon. Member moved that the Bill be read a second time that day three months.

SIR MATTHEW RIDLEY seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now" and at the end of the Question, to add the words "upon this day three months."

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he would move the adjournment of the debate, as he felt that at that hour (20 minutes to six o'clock) it was impossible to proceed with the discussion of the Bill.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

It would clear up a number of questions which had been long agitated, and it would confer great benefit on the mercantile interests of the country. He hoped, therefore, that their Lordships would agree to read it a second time.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^d.

the Bill, and had no intention of opposing the second reading, yet thought it highly important that their Lordships should clearly understand what they were about to do. He had no objection, of course, to the provisions for advancing money for the improvement of harbours; but in regard to the abolition of passing tolls it behoved their Lordships to consider well what that proposition really was. The passing tolls had been granted to the Commissioners of Whitby Harbour by Queen Anne, and renewed by subsequent Parliaments, and, finally, in 1826, Parliament declared that they were to continue for ever. He did not mean to say that it did not lie in the wisdom of Parliament to correct the legislation of times gone by; but still, the assurance of their being continued for ever ought to induce their Lordships to pause before they did away with them. It was true that the debt would be thrown upon the Consolidated Fund, but there was no provision made for those objects for which the toll was originally imposed. As to these harbours not being generally accessible, he could only say that in the course of six years 8,707 vessels had taken refuge in Whitby. He should like to see a longer time given to the Harbour Commissioners, that they might have an opportunity of creating a new fund.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, at the time these tolls were imposed vessels were much smaller than at present, and the harbour of Whitby might, therefore, at that time be used as a harbour of refuge; but it was of little or no use now; and in consequence of the state of the harbours on the eastern coast the witnesses examined before the Harbour Commission recommended the expenditure of large sums of money in the construction of harbours on the coast at Hartlepool, Filey, and the mouth of the Tyne. He thought the Government were quite right in abolishing the dues levied for the support of Whitby as a harbour of refuge. He should like to know how much of the debt of £46,000 owing by the Commissioners of the Dover Harbour would be paid by the Treasury, and how much out of the local funds. As to the charities supported by funds levied on shipping in certain ports, he thought there ought to be a clause in the Bill prohibiting the managers of the charities from appointing fresh pensioners on these funds. With regard to the compensation paid to charitable corporations, their Lordships were, perhaps, not aware that the Hull Trinity House, in 1860, received from the country for differential dues alone the sum of £13,000. This sum, which was extracted from the public purse, was not applied to the improvement of the harbour or to the benefit of shipping in any way, but went to increase the funds of a charity whose operations were, he believed, absolutely injurious to the town. With regard to Ramsgate Harbour he should have preferred its being transferred to the Admiralty rather than to the Board of Trade. The local authorities of Ramsgate had for many years levied tolls on shipping in aid of its local taxation, and an Act was passed some years ago empowering the town Commissioners to levy a tax of 2s. a ton on coal coming into the port, and on the security of this tax, coupled with their rating powers, they borrowed a sum of £18,700. The Bill exempted coal in certain cases from this tax, and as the security on which the money was advanced was thereby affected, he should like to know if the parties advancing the money had given their consent to that clause. We had adopted a free trade policy, and now ought to remove all restrictions on trade. The Commissioners of many harbours, particularly on the eastern and southern coast, in some cases on the authority of Parliament and in other cases on the authority of charters, now levied considerable taxes on shipping, which were not applied to the improvement of the harbours, but to the purposes of the town, such as paving and lighting, in relief of the local rates. That, he thought, was indefensible in principle; and if such a proposition were made now on behalf of any town in England he was quite certain that neither the other House of Parliament nor their Lordships would listen to it for a moment.

LORD TAUNTON expressed his great gratification at the prospect of this intricate and complicated question, which had long been a source of complaint on the part of the shipping interest of this country, being at last satisfactorily settled. At the same time he must agree that, in strict justice, the price which the public were to pay to the local authorities for the abandonment of their rights was rather high. He well remembered the contest to which the Bill introduced a few years ago on the same subject, and which was one of strict justice, gave rise in Parliament. He could himself never understand the claim which these local corporations had to tax the shipping interest of the country for their own local benefit. It always appeared to him that their powers were for public purposes, and that the dues they collected could not be brought within the category of private property. Therefore, he never had any scruple in supporting the principle of that Bill; but the Government of that day could not cope with the opposition which it encountered; the defenders of these local interests were active and zealous, and the Government was not sufficiently powerful for them. He believed, however, that the present Government had made a good bargain for the public, since at the end of ten years these dues were entirely to cease, and great credit was due to the President of the Board of Trade for having managed to pass the measure through the House of Commons with very little opposition on the part of local interests. He could not help agreeing with the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Donoughmore) that, as the navigation laws had been abolished it became the duty of Parliament and the Government to lose no opportunity of removing every disadvantage and burden under which the merchant shipping of this country laboured, in consequence of the complete competition with their foreign rivals to which they were now exposed. Some of these burdens still remained; but he trusted that in a short time they would be entirely swept away. In abolishing the system of protection which formerly existed they had done not only no injury, but the greatest benefit to the shipping interest; but while he said that, he thought that the fact of exposing them to the competition of the whole world gave them the strongest claim to every assistance and support which, consistently with sound principle, could be extended to them.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY said, the reason why the trustees of Whitby Harbour had not paid off the debt was that they had entered upon extensive works for the improvement of the harbour.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY expressed his satisfaction at the speeches of two noble Lords who had just spoken, and said that he, too, hoped that what little remained to be done upon this matter would soon be accomplished. He rejoiced to see the reception the Bill had met with, and he would mention that when the Bill was originally introduced five years' compensation was proposed, but that term was afterwards extended to ten years. This amount of compensation was, in fact, the price which the Government had agreed to pay for purchase of certain advantages, and the price he did not regret, considering the benefits which would be derived.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

LOCOMOTIVES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF CAITHNESS, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, that the object of the measure was—not to give power to run locomotives upon common roads, because that power already existed—but it proposed to provide for the regulation of tolls, so that they might not be practically prohibitory to locomotives upon roads. Some years ago a gentleman at Manchester demonstrated by experiment that engines of this kind could be successfully and with economy used on ordinary roads, by using a locomotive for the haulage of coals a distance of about seven miles, and it appeared that the cost of the carriage was 2s. per ton, instead of 3s. 6d., which was the expense of horse power. The locomotive, however, had to pass through two turnpikes, and the tolls levied amounted to 4s. per ton, while if the coals were hauled by horse power the tolls were only 3½d. per ton. There could, of course, be no fair chance of success under such circumstances. One advantage which locomotives upon common roads had over waggons drawn by horses was the much less space they occupied. He had recently seen the crank shaft for the Black Prince drawn from Mr. Penn's factory by one of Bray's engines. The shaft, together with the truck, weighed 38 tons, and if horse power had been employed a great number of animals and men would have been required to perform a task which was performed by a single engine with perfect ease. Some persons apprehended danger to the public from the use of these engines upon common roads; but the Bill contained a provision giving power to the Secretary of State to prohibit the use of any engine, upon representations being made to him by the proper authorities that it exposed the public to any danger. For his own part, he (the Earl of Caithness) did not believe that any danger would arise from the use of engines. In 1802 a locomotive was used on a common road in Cornwall, and subsequently was exhibited in the ground now occupied by Euston Square. Mr. Scott Russell also ran one for the conveyance of passengers between Paisley and Glasgow; but so great was the objection of the local authorities to it that they covered the road with many inches of broken stones, which only had the effect of diverting all the horse traffic elsewhere. Mr. Scott Russell persevered with his locomotive for a considerable time; but, as he wore out two pairs of wheels every journey he was compelled to abandon the experiment. Objections had also been raised that the use of engines would injure the roads, but he was of opinion that the wheels of an engine would not cause so much damage to a road as the feet of a number of horses drawing heavy loads. The noble Earl then read several letters from leading engineering firms, testifying to the value of these locomotives in removing large boilers and other machinery from their factories. In some parts of the country the appearance of these traction engines occasionally astonished and perplexed the unsophisticated inhabitants. While riding on one of them in his own neighbourhood one day he passed the door of a cottage where a little boy was standing. The lad was astonished at the novel sight, and called out to his father, who was inside, "Come, and see! the carrier's cart has taken fire, and his horse has run away." In another instance, when a locomotive came to a turnpike with the steam full on, the tollkeeper, on being asked what there was to pay, replied with evident trepidation, "Oh! nothing, nothing! drive on, dear Mister Devil, as fast as you can." The noble Earl concluded by earnestly requesting their Lordships to give the Bill a second reading.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^d.

THE EARL OF EGLINTON had not paid any very great attention to this Bill, but could not help thinking it a measure of considerable importance, and one, therefore, which their Lordships ought not to pass without due deliberation. It appeared that these engines were not new, but had been first used in 1802. If that were so, the fact was not much in their favour, because although they had been long before the world they had certainly not made any very rapid strides in public estimation. He was not aware of anybody but the noble Earl opposite who had yet set up a private steam carriage of his own. No doubt traction engines might be very useful in conveying heavy loads for short distances; but this Bill went much further, and would legalize their use on roads generally. The measure, in his opinion, was rather premature, there being no general demand in the country for such legislation; and before they passed it they should see what were the grounds on which they were asked to legislate on the subject. He could not but think that the use of locomotives on common roads would give rise to dangerous accidents. Horses would be apt to take fright at them, and human life might as a consequence be jeopardized. Nothing was said in the Bill as to the width of the roads in which they were to be allowed to run. It would not be sufficient to enable the Secretary of State to check their employment in certain cases: the same power ought to be vested in the municipal authorities of boroughs; while in Scotland the right to interdict them should be given to the sheriffs of counties. These were, indeed, points of detail, but they suggested the propriety of the House pausing before it rashly assented to the measure.

EARL GRANVILLE thought the noble Earl could not have listened very attentively to the clear and able speech in which the second reading of the Bill had been moved. It was a mistake to say that this Bill legalized the use on common roads of these locomotives, which, in some out of the way districts might perhaps frighten a few peasant boys, tollkeepers, and some other timid animals of that kind. Their use was already legal, and the only object of the measure was to regulate the tolls chargeable upon them, which in some instances reached a prohibitory rate. The Government having considered the Bill saw no objection to its provisions, and he trusted their Lordships would not refuse to adopt it.

THE EARL OF EGLINTON said, what he had meant was that the Bill would have the effect of legalizing the use of these engines in Scotland. At present, if any one applied to the sheriff to stop these locomotives from running on the public roads, the sheriff would, no doubt, interdict them. But, if the Bill passed, it would give a sanction to their use.

LORD BELHAVEN was understood to deny that sheriffs in Scotland had interdicted the use of these engines when applied to for that purpose.

After a few words from the Earl of DONOUGHMORE,

LORD REDESDALE said, he would not oppose the second reading; but he thought the Bill of extreme importance, and he hoped the noble Earl (the Earl of Caithness) would have no objection to its being referred to a Select Committee. There were many points in which the Bill was defective. It contained no provision whatever as to what a "locomotive" was to be, and it was exceedingly important that they should lay down proper rules on that head, so as to secure the public as much as possible from inconvenience arising from their construction. He was not satisfied that the tolls to be levied were so high as they ought to be. All that the Bill said was that these vehicles were to pay a toll more or less in proportion to the number of their wheels. At all events, they should specify proper rules as to construction. Indeed, he believed it was already provided that the locomotives should not be more than seven feet wide. A provision ought to be inserted that when they exceeded a certain weight they should not pass over bridges. If this Bill went before a Select Committee its provisions might be rendered much safer, and some evils might be remedied. He had no unfavourable feeling towards the Bill, but he thought that the public security should be ensured.

THE DUKE OF MONTROSE concurred in the suggestion that the Bill should undergo the revision of a Select Committee. He thought there was not much probability of these locomotives coming into general use.

THE EARL OF EGMONT hoped the noble Earl who had charge of the Bill would not consent to its being sent to a Select Committee.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 2^d accordingly.

LORD REDESDALE proposed to commit the Bill to a Select Committee.

EARL GRANVILLE confessed he saw no reason why certain noble Lords were anxious to send every Bill to Select Committees from which the public were excluded. Surely the Amendments to be proposed could suitably be introduced in a Committee of the Whole House.

Subject dropped.

VOL. CLXIV. [THIRD SERIES.]

STEAM COMMUNICATION BETWEEN IRELAND AND NORTH AMERICA.

QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE asked Her Majesty's Government, What Steps they proposed to take for the Re-establishment of a direct Postal and Steam-Packet Communication between Ireland and North America? The Postmaster General, on the 15th of May, put an end to the contract with the Royal Atlantic Mail Steam Navigation Company, whereby provision had been made for a regular packet service direct between Galway and North America. He would not say one word as to the justice or injustice of that proceeding, because the matter was now being investigated by a Committee of the House of Commons. He apprehended, however, that that inquiry would be limited to an investigation of the circumstances under which the contract had been terminated; but, as he understood, the contract was absolutely at an end, and no proposition had been made for its renewal. He thought, therefore, he was justified in asking the present information from the Government. He would remind the House that, although the way in which the contract to which he referred had been carried out had been brought in question, the propriety of having a continuous direct service between North America and Ireland had never been questioned: on the contrary, it had been acknowledged by every one who took part in the discussion in the House of Commons that great advantage was derived from having speedy communication by that route. Only yesterday an illustration was afforded of the value of such a service. The important intelligence received from New York was ten days old; whereas no one could deny that one result of the experience of the last year was to show that it was perfectly practicable to have direct communication between Ireland and the United States within six days. It was, therefore, important to ascertain whether the Government had done anything towards the re-establishment of the service. The Company to which he referred said they had not had sufficient time allowed them to prepare vessels for the postal service. That was a point on which he would express no opinion, though he must remark that it had always been considered that some time must elapse before any Company could perform a service of such a nature satisfactorily. If he understood the matter rightly, the contract which had existed during the past year was now completely at an end. Even if the case were otherwise a new contract would be desirable, inasmuch as the last included conditions which, he believed, were never imposed on any Company before. A Bill relating to the improvement of Galway Harbour would shortly be brought before their Lordships, and that was an additional reason why this subject should receive full consideration. Direct postal service between Ireland and North America was, in his opinion, so important that the Government ought to lose no time in making preparations for re-establishing it in such a manner that the public would be satisfied that it would be well and properly carried out and permanently maintained.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, his noble Friend had, in fact, anticipated the answer which he would be obliged to give; and would not, therefore, be surprised when he said that he must decline to express any opinion on the subject until the Committee of the House of Commons appointed to inquire into the circumstances under which the Galway contract had been terminated had made its Report. He was sure his noble Friend must see that it would be premature for him to make any statement at that moment. He would, however, remind his noble Friend that Ireland at present enjoyed postal communication with America by means of no fewer than three services weekly. The Cunard line of packets which left Liverpool on the Saturday touched at Queenstown on the Sunday, and took on letters from Ireland, as well as letters sent on by the Saturday evening mail from London. The Liverpool, Philadelphia, and New York line, commonly known as "Inman's," started from Liverpool on the Wednesday and touched at Queenstown on the next day. There was a third service by the Canadian line of packets, which left Liverpool every Thursday and touched at Londonderry every Friday. Thus, on Sundays, on Thursdays, and on Fridays there was direct postal communication between Ireland and America. The only advantage derived from the Galway packets was that once a fortnight there was an additional service on Tuesday. He, therefore, did not anticipate that any material inconvenience, as far as postal communication was concerned, was at present experienced in consequence of the discontinuance of the Galway line. But he was quite ready to admit that there was very great advantage in the more rapid communication with St. John's and the much later telegraphic communication by that means with America, and that advantage was obtained in a greater degree by the Galway than by any other line. Their Lordships would see that under the circumstances it was quite impossible for him to express, on the part of the Government, any intimation of what their views might be with regard to any future arrangements for direct postal communication between Ireland and America.

DILAPIDATION OF GLEBE HOUSES. QUESTION.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON inquired, Whether any measure to amend the Law relative to Dilapidation on Glebe Houses is likely to be laid on the table during the present Session? He considered that some measure of the kind was absolutely necessary, and if a good one it would have his cordial support.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, that a Bill had been prepared, and would be laid on the table in two or three days. At the same time, having regard to the difficult and complicated nature of the subject, as well as to the advanced period of the Session, it was not probable that anything more would be done than that the Bill would be presented in order to give their Lordships the opportunity of considering it before next Session.

House adjourned at a quarter before Seven o'clock, till To-morrow, half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, July 4, 1861.

MINUTES.] NEW WRIT ISSUED.—For Richmond, v. Henry Rich, Esquire.

NEW MEMBER SWORN.—For Wolverhampton, Thomas Matthias Weguelin, Esquire.

PUBLIC BILLS.—1° Lunacy Regulation; Turnpike Acts Continuance; Turnpike Trusts Arrangements; Conjugal Rights (Scotland); Trustees (Scotland).

2° Copyright of Designs; Inland Revenue.

3° Book Unions; Attornies and Solicitors (Ireland).

LAW OF LUNACY.—QUESTION.

MR. TITE said, he rose, pursuant to notice, to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce any Bill this Session for amending the Laws relating to Lunatics in England, as recommended by the Select Committee of last year; and, if not, whether it was their intention to proceed with the Bill of the late Lord Chancellor which has been sent down from the House of Lords, having for its object the Amendment of the Laws relating to the Lunatics under the care of the Court of Chancery?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he intended to proceed with the Bill which had come down from the House of Lords with reference to Chancery Lunatics. The Report of the Select Committee had reference to Lunatics generally, particularly to Criminal Lunatics, and they recommended an alteration and also a consolidation of the existing law. He was afraid that even if he laid on the Table a Bill to carry out their suggestions it would be impossible that it could pass this Session. The measure which had come down from the House of Lords, and with which he would proceed, was simply confined to Chancery Lunatics.

PHENIX PARK, DUBLIN.—QUESTION.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether a Memorial from the Citizens of Dublin, praying that improvements should be made in the Phoenix Park, has been submitted to the authorities; and whether it is intended to devote the sums obtained by the grazing of the Park in embellishing the same, increasing the roads throughout its limits, and rendering the Park more agreeable and accessible to the Public?

MR. CARDWELL said, the Memorial in question had been received by his noble Friend, the Lord Lieutenant, and was by him forwarded to the Treasury, with a request that it might be favourably considered. No answer had yet been received from the Treasury, but he believed he might state that they were in communication with the Board of Works upon the subject.

THE NEW FOREIGN OFFICE.

OBSERVATIONS.

Lord JOHN MANNERS: Sir, the Vote for the new Foreign Office stands for to-night, but I think it would be more convenient if my right hon. Friend the First Commissioner of Works would consent to postpone it till Monday. It was understood that certain plans were to be exhibited in one of the Committee Rooms, and that the House was to have an opportunity of forming its opinions with regard to them. Some of these plans have only been submitted forty-eight hours ago, and, therefore, if the Government were disposed to take Supply on Monday, the question could then be more conveniently settled.

MR. COWPER: Sir, I am anxious to meet the wishes of the noble Lord, and, therefore, I shall willingly postpone the Vote till Monday, on the understanding that it will be then taken.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

QUESTION.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he wished to ask, When he would have an opportunity of putting the question of which he had given notice to the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs?

MR. SPEAKER: On the Motion for going into Committee of Supply.

MR. DISRAELI: I must say I think it would be very convenient if it were thoroughly understood at both sides of the House that public business commences at a quarter-past four o'clock. Hon. Gentlemen are very often put to great inconvenience in consequence of that fact not being remembered.

EDUCATIONAL ESTIMATES.

RESOLUTION.

Order for Committee (Supply) read.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. DILLWYN said, he rose to call the attention of the House to the annually-increasing amount of the Educational Estimates, and to the principle upon which such votes should be given. He should willingly have complied with the appeal made by the noble Lord at the head of the Government to Members with Motions similarly placed to his own, not to press them unless the subject was either one of urgent necessity, or likely to lead to a practical result, were it not for the belief which he entertained that it was really necessary to call attention seriously to the Educational Estimates. According to his view, the country was being over educated. The money voted was administered on a wrong principle, and it was time that the principle itself should be reconsidered. But for the strong feeling in favour of edu-education, which prevented Gentlemen from doing anything even having the appearance of impeding its progress, he believed these Estimates would long since have been reconsidered. The growth of the amounts voted for educational purposes was perfectly astonishing. He held in his hand a return which had been made to the House of Lords in 1856, showing the progressive advance of the educational grant, and he had supplemented it to the present time. From that it appeared that from the year 1838 to 1841 there was an annual charge of £30,000 for public education in Great Britain. In 1842, it was increased to £40,000; in 1843, to £50,000; in 1844 it fell back to £40,000; in 1845 it rose again to £75,000; in 1846, to £100,000; in 1847 it remained at the same figure; in 1848, 1849, and 1850, the Vote was £125,000; in 1851 it rose to £150,000; in 1852 to £160,000; in 1853 to £260,000; in 1854 to £263,000; in 1855 it was £306,921; in 1856 it was £451,213; in 1857, £541,233; in 1858, £663,435; in 1859, £836,920; in 1860 there was a slight diminution, and the Vote fell to £798,000; whilst in this year, 1861, he observed it had again risen to £803,000. The Vote for the science and art department had increased in the same way. In 1841 it commenced with a modest demand for £1,100; in 1845 it had reached £4,911; in 1846, £5,000; in 1847, £6,000; in 1848, £10,000; and so it went on till in 1855 it had reached £79,000, and in the present year they were asked to vote no less a sum than £111,000. The gross amount of the Votes pertaining to education which they were asked to vote that year was thus £915,278; and that, as he was reminded by his right hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir James Graham), was entirely independent of any Vote for Ireland, while in 1840 the gross amount was only £31,300. That was such a rapid rise, and the Votes had now attained such a very large figure, that it was the imperative duty of the House to see that the money was properly expended, and that the principle upon which the money was applied did advance the education of the poor which he took to be the object of the State grants. The history of the educational movement was this:—About the time from 1838 to 1841, when the Votes were only £30,000 a year, the country and the House became alarmed at the ignorance which prevailed throughout the country, and very properly thought it a discredit and a disgrace to the country that education should be so neglected as it was. It was found that not only was the amount of education given very limited, that the supply of schools were uncertain, being dependent on the charity of individuals, and that in some of the most populous districts there existed no school whatever; but, also, that those who professed to teach were themselves untaught, the schoolmasters being very ill-qualified for the task they had undertaken. The House set their shoulders to the wheel, and in some respects very successfully, to correct this state of things; they saw the necessity of raising the standard of education, especially in regard to schoolmasters, and of providing in the large manufacturing towns and populous districts places of education within reach of the poorer classes. But they did not look into the question how high a standard of education ought to be attained; all they sought was to raise the standard, give better books, better masters, and induce the people to accept the education which was given. There was no niggardly spirit on the part of the House; on the contrary, the House cheerfully granted whatever was asked for so long as they thought the money was well spent. The great difficulty, however was to induce the people to accept of the education offered, and how to provide for its extension to all classes, especially to those not connected with the Church of England—the Church of England not probably representing so much as one-half of the entire population. Many hon. Members thought then, and still retained the opinion, that the system should be purely sectarian; while others, both Churchmen and Dissenters, forming, as he doubted not, a majority, took a contrary view. The difficulties were very fairly grappled with. The question was met on both sides of the House in a very fair and liberal spirit, and the system of education which had been offered had been accepted by all classes, and had been productive of beneficial results throughout the country. But all this time it had never been considered how high the standard was being carried, and he thought it was now time that they should reconsider the principle upon which these Votes were applied. He, for one, did not grudge the amount which they were now asked to vote, were he sure that the mode in which the education was offered was the one best calculated to promote the cause of sound education among the poor;

but he considered that the education which they were giving was not producing that good which they were entitled to expect from the great amount of the Vote. They had raised the standard very much above that which was usually considered to be elementary education. He did not mean to define elementary education as limited to reading, writing, and cyphering, as it might possibly be desirable to give something more; but instruction was now given and prizes awarded in geography, singing, drawing, mechanics, and political economy. He thought the House would agree with him that that was not the kind of knowledge which it was requisite for that House to provide for the poor. There was one thing manifest, which was that if they tried to give this high standard of education to the poor they must have two different departments to administer the Vote, and he might quote in support of that opinion what the Vice-President of the Committee of Council told them in a recent discussion, when the question of supporting ragged schools was raised—namely, that he did not see how the department under his control could properly undertake the education of the very poorest classes, the classes which he (Mr. Dillwyn) thought it their duty most especially to provide education for. He had no doubt, from what he saw, that in many cases the poorer classes felt great jealousy and distrust in sending their children to these schools, because they did not think they got proper attention from the masters, or the attention that they would get if there were schools where the elementary education which was suitable to them was only given. They thought there was no occasion for having their children taught algebra, geometry, mensuration, and other subjects of that kind, and they were right, because the children only got a smattering of knowledge which they forgot immediately after they left school. Finding this to be the case the schoolmasters directed their attention principally to those children whose parents could afford to leave them at the school, and the education of the poor was left in a great measure to the care of pupil teachers. It might be a good suggestion that the schools for the poor should be handed over to the Poor Law Board, and that the others should be left as at present; but in his opinion the wisest course would be to retrace their steps, and not continue to raise but to lower the standard of education given by the State. The Reports of the Committee of Council on Education bore him out in the statement that if they went on raising the standard and continued to educate the poorer classes, some different system to that now in use must be resorted to. In 1860, Mr. Tinley, inspector of Church of England schools in Cornwall, Devon, Dorset, and Somerset, reported that reading was the most defective subject, arising partly from the pronunciation of the peasantry, partly from the difficult character and uninteresting nature of the books employed, and partly from the insufficient time that the children were kept to the study. Mr. Brookfield, in reference to the schools in Kent, Surrey, Sussex, and the Channel Islands, stated that the masters and mistresses employed themselves too exclusively with the upper and easier educated classes, while the poorer and more difficult to educate were left to the care of pupil teachers. Mr. Kennedy, inspector of the Lancashire and Isle of Man schools, spoke of the advance of the pupils in their studies, and showed himself in favour of the system employed; but he also remarked that the children left the school very early, and that he wished them, therefore, to be very carefully grounded in essentials. Mr. Norris, the inspector of Church of England schools in the county of Chester, Salop, and Staffordshire, had during the past year made a memorandum of the proportion of children in each school who could read aloud an easy narrative intelligibly and fluently. He tested the first class by giving the children newspapers, and asking them to read aloud any suitable paragraph. The result had been satisfactory in very few cases, not more than 20 out of the 169 first class pupils he examined last year had he found able to read a newspaper at sight, and not more than one-fourth of the children could read aloud their reading-book intelligibly and fluently. He had no doubt that many hon. Gentlemen had looked over these Reports, and had come to the same conclusion as he had, that the elementary instruction given by the system for which they voted money was insufficient. They were still attempting to rise the standard of education, and the result was that the poorer classes, whom it was their imperative duty to assist, got a superficial kind of knowledge of a great many things, which was of little use to them, and was soon forgotten, while they were left deficient in the essentials of education, which if carefully instilled in early life would stick to them, and enable them thereafter to educate themselves. If they were to continue the present state of things they must separate the system into two, and they must have education for the higher and the poorer classes taught in different establishments, and under a different system of administration. But he denied that it was the proper business of the State, or that it was wise, to attempt to raise the standard of education; and if this was so the sooner they reconsidered the matter the better; every year that they went on the task of retracing their steps would become more difficult. Probably no section of the House, or of the community, wished to see the education of all classes in the country taken in hand by the State, but that must ultimately be the result unless some alteration in the present system was adopted. They had raised the standard already beyond what was adapted to the poorest classes, and they were now educating those whose parents could very well afford to pay for their education. The result of this was that no private schoolmaster could compete with the State schools, and it became more difficult to obtain private and independent education. The system pressed very hard upon clerks and professional men, who had a position to maintain in society, and who were really not so well off as the mechanics of the grade below them, who had no position in society to maintain, for they were too proud and independent in spirit to send their children to be educated at the State schools, and were obliged to go to great expense in their education to enable them to compete with the children of the working men who were educated at the cost of the State from funds to which they themselves contributed. He repeated that the effect of following out the present system would be to separate the education of the poor from that of the class above them, and then they would find all classes of society, one after another, availing themselves of the National Schools. All classes would be gathered into the education net, and before long they would see all the education of the country practically in the hands of the Government—a result which he, for one, was most anxious to avert. He would state what he considered to be the proper duty of the State with regard to education. Elementary education was, in his opinion, a necessary of life. No child in the Kingdom, however poor the parents, ought to be debarred on account of poverty from receiving an education which was necessary to keep it from poverty or crime. He did not, however, think it was the business of the State to force it upon the children any more than it was their duty to force upon them food or anything else. That was the duty of the parents. But it was the duty of the State to educate the criminal and pauper classes, to whom the State stood in loco parentis. With regard to all other classes he did not think it was their duty to do so, but only to provide the means of elementary education, and this he did not think it was their duty to do. Let them define elementary education how they liked. Some might think cyphering too much; others might think cyphering too little. He did not attempt to decide such a question; but whatever might be regarded as elementary education that he thought every child should be able to get. In drawing up the Resolution which he had the honour of submitting to the House he had been actuated by no party or sectarian motives; but with a desire, on the one hand, to relieve the public purse, and on the other, to provide a better education and a sounder education for the poorer classes than they at present possessed. He was not afraid of the middle classes letting their children grow up in ignorance, or being contented with elementary education. There was a growing conviction among all classes that an advanced education was the key-stone to an advance in life, and he was convinced that this was so deeply impressed upon the middle classes that they would not forego its advantages for their children on account of the withdrawal of the State aid of which they now avail themselves. He did not think it the duty of the Legislature to attempt to force children out of their station; but he did think they ought to give them the means, which few of them only would be able to use, of raising themselves. It was not his object to discourage education in any way, but to confine the duty of the State within its proper limits, and to ensure that what education was given by the State should be adopted and given to the poorest classes. He believed the result of adopting the principle of his Resolution would be to give a better education to the children of the poor, and to reduce the amount of the Vote to half its present amount in a few years. The hon. Member concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given notice.

Mr. Dillwyn

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words—

"In the opinion of this House, Votes in aid of Educational Establishments should, so far as may be consistent with existing arrangements, be limited to those in which elementary instruction alone is given, and to those for the training of schoolmasters,"

—instead thereof.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH seconded the Motion.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: Sir, I have collected from the debates which have taken place in this House from day to day that it is the general opinion of the House that Motions made on going into Committee of Supply should be confined, as far as may be, to questions of urgency. I admit that it is the privilege of any hon. Member to bring any subject before the House on the question that the Speaker leave the chair in order that the House go into Committee of Supply. I do not contest this abstract right; but it is desirable, looking at the present period of the Session and the quantity of business remaining to be transacted in Committee of Supply, and also at the inconvenience to which hon. Gentlemen are put who come to the House in expectation of Supply coming on, that, as far as possible, the business of Supply should commence at a tolerably early hour of the evening. The question now before the House not only cannot be considered as urgent, but it is only by a straining of the rules of the House that it can be brought forward at all, for upon the Motion to-night that the House go into Committee of Supply to consider the Vote No. 1 on the paper, the hon. Gentleman asks us to anticipate the discussion of the Educational Vote No. 4, which may probably not come on for ten days or a fortnight. The Motion amounts, in fact, to a proposal for the reduction of that Vote. The hon. Member expresses himself in general terms, and it is difficult to understand what is the precise meaning of his proposition. I think the present Vote is limited to elementary instruction and to training schools. I do not believe that it is the intention of those who framed the Education Vote to go beyond elementary instruction. But if we wait till that Vote comes on till the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education shall have made his statement and fully explained the different items, then, if hon. Gentlemen propose to reduce or omit any of those items, we should know what it is we are discussing. As it is the hon. Gentleman has given us a general dissertation on the subject of education, which is less called for, inasmuch as there has been lately published a Report of the Commissioners on Education, in which the whole of this great subject is treated, and very little advantage appears to me to be likely to be gained by those preliminary discussions. I trust, therefore, that the House will see that this is an inconvenient anticipation of the Vote which stands in a subsequent part of the Miscellaneous Estimates, and that the question will be better discussed when the Committee is asked to vote the large sum of money which will be asked for educational purposes.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, he did not think the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department was quite fair with his Friend; for no one could tell exactly what Votes were were coming to-night.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE said, he did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary would consider the few words he wished to utter on an important question a matter of urgency. But there was a practice which might degenerate into a serious nuisance—he meant the inspection of Volunteers in Hyde Park of an evening.

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Gentleman was out of order.

VOLUNTEER INSPECTIONS.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE said, he wished to draw attention to a system which had just commenced of inspecting the Volunteers in Hyde Park between the hours of five and six in the evening, when there was a great concourse of equestrians and of carriages. Yesterday he saw a regiment of Volunteers inspected. The firing began at half-past five and went on until half-past seven, to the inconvenience of many stout gentlemen on horseback and of ladies in carriages. He himself saw three people run away with. There was a general order at the Horse Guards, signed by the Duke of Wellington, that the Guards were never to fire except in the centre of the park. He feared that to some extent the Volunteers were becoming more inimical to their own countrymen than they were ever likely to be to the enemy. Yesterday they were first fire firing and then firing in volleys quite close to the road opposite the barracks in Hyde Park. It was only necessary to draw the right hon. Gentleman's attention to what threatened to be a considerable nuisance, and if the right hon. Gentleman could prevent the Volunteers playing so frequently through the streets he would confer a boon on society.

Mr. COWPER said, he had previously heard complaints, that persons could not manage their horses in consequence of the firing of the Volunteers. He thought it desirable that the Volunteers should exercise in a way which would not interfere with the enjoyment or security of persons who were either riding or driving. It had been pressed on the attention of the officers commanding the Volunteers that they should conduct their drill in a manner that would not expose them to complaints similar to those which had just been made by the hon. and gallant Member. Instructions would be given that while the Volunteers had the full enjoyment of the park for their drill it should not be conducted so as to alarm or disturb other persons.

SPAIN AND MOROCCO.

QUESTION.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he can give the House any information with reference to a statement which appeared in the Official Journal of Madrid on the 29th day of June, stating that the Spanish Government had resolved to abandon its Claim against Morocco, and to declare Tetuan the property of Spain? He could hardly believe that statement to be true. He recollected perfectly well a year and a half ago the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire being misled by a telegraphic dispatch, and being taunted by right hon. Members on the Treasury bench with believing it. He (Sir Robert Peel) did not know whether the present statement was true or not; but it was so contrary to the assurances of the Spanish Government with regard to Morocco that he thought it of great importance that the noble Lord should reply in a satisfactory manner to the statement. The noble Lord had distinctly declared that "the occupation of that portion of the territory of Morocco imperilled the fortress of Gibraltar." Those were his very words. The words he made use of

in writing to Mr. Buchanan at Madrid were—

"You will, therefore, be instructed to obtain a declaration in writing that if the Spanish troops, in the course of hostilities against Algiers or Morocco, make any occupation of territory it will not be for longer than the ratification of the treaty of peace, since an occupation till an indemnity should be paid may become dangerous, and Her Majesty's Government would consider it inconsistent with the safety of our occupation of Gibraltar."

He trusted the noble Lord would assure the House that the statement to which he referred was not founded on fact?

AFFAIRS OF CHINA.

QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES said, as the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office would be unable to speak a second time he would at once ask the question of which he had given notice:—Whether there is any foundation for the statements in the newspapers by the last China Mail, that the departure of the British Troops from China, consisting of 8,403 men of all arms, has been postponed for an indefinite period: whether the report in the China Mail newspaper be true that, on the 30th day of April, a body of 200 armed men from the villages of Swa, Boey, and Outenz, in the neighbourhood of Swatow, marched through the streets of Swatow, at three o'clock in the day, into the hong of Messrs. Bradley and Co., and plundered the same, the Tartar authorities not interfering, and refusing a guard to protect Messrs. Bradley from further outrage: whether information has been received that deserters from Her Majesty's Navy, and Europeans of different nations, to the amount of 200, were known to have enlisted in the Tartar service, twenty-four of whom were seized in Imperialist boats in a creak of the Yang-tze-kiang while carrying, eleven of whom, not being English or Americans, were liberated, and the rest handed over to their respective Consuls: and, whether the Secretary of State proposes to direct steps being taken to prevent British subjects enlisting in the Tartar service or that of the Taepings?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I am sorry I was unable to be here at a quarter to four. As I was coming down to the House a foreign Minister called upon me, and I was, therefore, somewhat delayed. But the hon. Member is quite in order in asking his question. The hon. Baronet will recollect that on a former occasion I stated the Spanish Government had been informed that the Moorish Government absolutely refused to carry into effect the treaty that had been signed between the Emperor of Morocco and the Queen of Spain—that hereupon the Spanish Government made reparations to enforce the provisions of the treaty. Upon inquiries being made at Tangier we were informed that the Moorish Government wished to comply with the stipulations of the treaty, but were unable to perform their promise at the exact period named in the treaty. Upon that the good offices of Her Majesty's Government were offered to and accepted by the Spanish Government. Since that time we have been told by the Spanish Government that they had received official communications to the effect that it is not the intention of the Moorish Government to comply with the stipulations of the treaty; and the head of the Spanish Cabinet, Marshal O'Donnell, said that in that case there were but two courses to pursue—one was to renew the war, and the other was to declare Tetuan to be perpetually annexed to the Spanish Crown, and that they had taken the latter course. It seems, however, that the Spanish Government are ready to receive any overtures, and, therefore, I do not think that the statement referred to by the hon. Baronet could be considered as representing the definitive determination of the Spanish Government. With respect to the quotation made by the hon. Member from my speech, I have to remind the hon. Member that that has no reference to Tetuan. Tangiers is opposite to Gibraltar, but not Tetuan. [SIR ROBERT PEEL: It is only a few miles from Tangiers.] But it is not upon the coast. However, we are not without hopes that affairs between the countries may yet be amicably arranged.

With regard to the questions of the hon. Member for Aberdeen (Colonel Sykes), I can only answer for the Foreign Office, and the Foreign Office has not received any information respecting the circumstances to which the hon. Member has alluded. I am sorry to add, what my hon. Friend will perhaps be glad to hear, that the rebel forces have appeared much nearer to Pekin than they have hitherto approached.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH remarked that the noble Lord had stated that Tangiers was opposite Gibraltar, and Tetuan not so. Now, Tetuan was immediately south of Gibraltar, and opposite to it.

Tetuan was much nearer Gibraltar than Tangiers was. Tangiers was further up the Straits.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, the hon. Member must be mistaken about the position of Tetuan. He (Lord John Russell) had spent several days shooting in the neighbourhood, and was, therefore, well acquainted with the locality.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he also had spent some days in the same position himself.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he wished to know if Mr. Drummond Hay had returned from Mogador.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL stated that Mr. Drummond Hay, who was to go to the Court of the Sultan of Morocco, had not yet gone, his departure being delayed for two days.

REPORTING THE DEBATES.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he rose to move, pursuant to notice, for a Select Committee to inquire into the best mode of securing authorized or accurate reports of the debates in that House. He had been frequently asked when he intended to bring forward that Motion, but his impression was that it would be better to move it next Session than at so late a period in the present. However, for the sake of calling attention to the subject at once, he would move the Resolution of which he had given notice.

MR. SPEAKER said, that the hon. Member was not in order in moving, as the House had decided that the proposition that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair should stand part of the question; and no more Amendments could be moved upon it.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, that he would then merely speak on the subject, and he would do so for the purpose of removing the notice off the paper. He might also take that opportunity of announcing—what some Members of the House would perhaps be happy to hear—that private affairs required him to absent himself for a time from the debates of that House. Perhaps his absence might expedite the progress of business, though he was sure it would not be got through in a better manner because he was not present. He said this because his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland had taken advantage of his absence to pass a most important measure—the County Surveyors (Ireland) Bill—through the House at the unreasonable hour of two o'clock in the morning. As he did not intend to bring forward the Motion again that Session, he thought he was entitled to avail himself of that opportunity to state his reasons for having placed it on the paper. Those reasons were based principally upon the past debates in that House, but as it would be out of order to refer to any of those debates which had taken place during the present Session, and within the immediate recollection of hon. Members—the Member who did so subjecting himself to be called to order—he would not be able to illustrate his meaning by examples of recent occurrence. He totally disapproved of that sort of Draconic law which had been repeatedly enforced upon hon. Members who were not Ministers or ex-Ministers; but, as he was an advocate for impartiality, he should take the liberty of enforcing it himself whenever a Minister of the Crown transgressed it. He might, however, observe that he had been induced to give notice on the subject on the day immediately succeeding the debate with respect to the conduct of the Irish Members, who felt much dissatisfied with the reports of the speeches made on that occasion. To what cause the imperfection of those reports was to be attributed he could not exactly say; but the fact was that a number of gentlemen were permitted to be present at the discussions of the House, whose aim, of course, it was to report in that manner which they thought would best suit the interests of the newspapers which they represented. They accordingly acted upon the principle of reporting the debates precisely and exactly in the way which answered their own objects, and not in the way which suited hon. Members of the House. Now, nobody could be a more strenuous upholder than he was of publicity and freedom of discussion, and he was quite ready to admit that very excellent reports were given of all those hon. and right hon. Gentlemen who happened to be Ministers or ex-Ministers, or expectant Ministers. They, therefore, had no reason to complain, but independent Members had, he believed, every reason to be dissatisfied with the way in which their observations were given—or not given, as it might be—to the world. [Mr. WHITE: No, no!] The hon. Member for Brighton might cry “No, no!” and would probably rise in his place, and by fulsome adulation of the press seek to make political capital at his (Mr. Scully's) expense. The hon. Gentleman, indeed, might go so far as to say that he was wonderfully well reported; but nobody, he believed, would endorse that statement except a Minister or ex-Minister, or somebody who had interest with the newspapers. For his own part, he believed he had as little grounds for complaint in the matter as other independent Members; and so far as he personally was concerned, he had never found any fault with not being reported. Newspapers were private speculations, and the gentlemen who reported for them discharged their duties in such a way as it was thought would enable the proprietors to sell their property to the best advantage. But, be that as it might, he, at all events, was perfectly satisfied not to be reported. It was, in short, a matter for the conductors of the public journals, individually or collectively, to say whether they would publish what fell from him in that House or not, or whether his speeches would or would not be likely to tell and sell. He had, he might add, no objection to any amount of comment being made on his public conduct, whether that comment assumed the shape of a libel or not; but he must, nevertheless, complain of what had occurred to himself—he would not say that Session, because it would be out of order to refer to recent debates—but in former Sessions, although he was by no means prepared to admit that the same thing did not take place in the present Session also. He did not mind, as he had before observed, not being reported, or being libelled in the columns of the newspapers all over the United Kingdom. It was matter of indifference to him whether he were reported or not: but what he must object to was being misrepresented, and having his own mouth made the vehicle for turning him into ridicule. Now, he had been a reporter himself, and he would undertake to go into the gallery with a pencil in his hand and report the speeches of hon. Members in such a way that they would not be in the least degree satisfied with the version which he would give of them, while yet they could not complain of them in the House without making fools of themselves. A speech occupying twenty minutes in delivery would, if reported fully, occupy a column in a newspaper, and, if the reporter condensed it into ten or twelve lines, inserting “laughter” and “ironical cheers” here and there, it would be easy to make it so appear that the House was laughing rather at than with the speaker.

Indeed, any gentleman accustomed to reporting well knew how to polish up a speech for the occasion. Now, he had little doubt that when his speech of that night was reported—if it were reported at all—it would be made to appear that in speaking as he did he was making merely an individual complaint; but, to repeat something like what he had said before, although he did protest against being misrepresented, he did not care one farthing about being not reported, beyond the general consideration that when an hon. Member was sent to that House at great expense and sacrifice to himself, as well as to his constituents, it was important that they should know what he really did say in the course of the discussion in which he happened to take part. This was a grave constitutional question, and it was of importance that, while the utmost freedom with respect to the publication of the debates in Parliament was allowed, the Commons of England should not for a single moment seem to occupy the position of being slaves of the press; that, while the House of Commons was civil to the press, and the press to the House, and while neither the Third nor the Fourth Estate should be the slave nor the master the one of the other, care should be taken that the Members of the former were not misrepresented by the latter. The House owed it to itself to take care that its Debates were not misrepresented, and were recorded in some authentic or accurate form. For his own part, he was bound to admit that he had, in order to obtain a hearing in that House, found it necessary to indulge sometimes in that sort of strain of observation of which the Prime Minister furnished the most favourable specimen, and to intersperse sensible observations with a little Attic salt. When, in short, he had first commenced to speak in the House he was in the habit of giving expression to nothing but unadulterated common sense, but he found it necessary occasionally, upon certain unpalatable subjects, to have recourse to what might appear playful nonsense, with a view of inducing the House to give him a more patient hearing. Having said thus much, he would, with the permission of hon. Members, read to them a letter which he had received within the last half hour, and which would show the effect which his speeches, as reported, produced upon his fellow-countrymen—an effect which he was happy to think they did not produce in that House. He had, he might observe, been just advised by the hon.

Member next him (Mr. Coningham) not to read the letter to which he referred, inasmuch as it was calculated to place him before the House in a somewhat absurd aspect. Well, the gentleman, whoever he was, who had sent him the letter wrote anonymously, and expressed himself to the following effect. [Cries of "Don't read!"] If hon. Members did not wish that he should read the letter, he would not do so; but he thought, nevertheless, that the sacrifice which he was about to make in reading it would be greater than that to which the House would have to submit in listening to it. [Cries of "Go on," and "No, no!"] Those hon. Gentlemen who cried "No, no!" were, no doubt, very tender of his reputation; but, be that as it might, he should, with the permission of the House, give them the contents of the letter. It was dated "Dublin, July 3rd. 1861," and the writer appeared to be familiar enough, for, although he did not sign his name to his communication, he began by addressing him as "My dear Scully." He then went on to say, "Pray do not make such an ass of yourself in the House of Commons. We are all laughing at your absurd speeches over here, and the excuse given for you is that you are not quite right in your head." Now, that document was signed "A True Friend;" but he had yet to learn that the opinion which the writer seemed to have of him was that held by the House of Commons; it most certainly was not the opinion which he entertained of himself. Such, however, was the result of the way in which the press placed hon. Members before the public; and if the view expressed by his correspondent was that which prevailed in Ireland, it could be so only because accurate reports of the discussions in Parliament were not furnished. It had, indeed, been said to him by a gentleman well acquainted with the art of reporting, "that if a stenographic account, word for word, of what is said in the House at night were served up to hon. Members in the morning, it would produce on the speakers a sensation similar to that experienced by the City alderman to whom a counterpart of the various things of which he had partaken at a civic banquet was presented on the following day. He was told that if what they said were to be reported verbatim—word for word—they would all be ashamed of their own speeches. To try the experiment he had taken the trouble to have an exact verbatim report of all he had said on a particular occasion furnished. The result was that, while when he read what was attributed to him in some of the newspapers he was very much disposed to feel ashamed of himself, he found on referring to the stenographic report that he had actually made a better speech even than he imagined. He should, however, say no more on the subject at present, but as it was one which he regarded as being of great importance, he should, if no other hon. Member took it up, deem it to be his duty to bring it forward on some future occasion.

MR. BASS said, he hoped the House would excuse him if he for one moment invited his hon. and learned Friend to consider whether the speech he had just made was calculated either to enhance his own reputation, or to add to the dignity and character of the House of Commons. He did not wish to say of his hon. and learned Friend anything unkind, with whom he had been in habits of the most agreeable intercourse since he had entered Parliament, and who, he could remember, used at one time to confine himself to making speeches remarkable for their good sense. If the hon. Gentleman were to persevere in that course he might hold himself absolved in future from the necessity of reading such a letter as that which he had just received from one of his countrymen in Dublin. That the hon. Gentleman was about to pay a visit to his constituents in Ireland might, perhaps, be regarded as a subject of congratulation to the House and the country, and it was even not improbable that the House might get on quite as well in his absence as it had done in his presence. The hon. and learned Gentleman had complained that he was not properly reported. He was reported to have spoken no fewer than fifteen times within the last week, and many hon. Members could aver from their own observation that he must have spoken at least as many times more. If other hon. Members were to take the same liberties with the time of the House and the country it would be impossible to pass a single Bill in the course of an ordinary Session. They all knew—many of them had tried the experiment upon their constituents—that if they were ill-advised enough they could make quite as long and quite as unnecessary speeches as some hon. Gentlemen were in the habit of delivering, and if they were not restrained by a feeling of respect to the House, and by a feeling of regard for their own position, the whole of every Session would be wasted in idle talk. He recollected that on one occasion the hon. and learned Member for Cork had occupied an entire sitting with the beginning of a speech. Upon that occasion he spoke for six hours, and at the end of the sitting he had got no further than the commencement of his subject. He would not follow the example he deprecated, and, therefore, he would conclude by expressing a hope that the House would, with a view to its own dignity, and for the advantage of its proceedings, curb with a strong hand the great and growing evil of too much speaking.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SPAIN AND MOROCCO.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD: Sir, the few words that dropped from the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Department, in reference to the subject brought forward by the hon. Baronet, the Member for Tamworth, are, in my opinion, of so much importance that I am obliged, however unwillingly, to trespass on the time of the House for a few moments, by addressing to it some observations on that subject. The noble Lord in the early part of last Session showed himself very sensible of the importance of this question, and in this House he took an opportunity of assuring us that he had obtained from the Spanish Government a positive promise that they would not permanently occupy any part of the Morocco coast west of Ceuta. We have had presented to us also the despatches which the noble Lord at that time thought it his duty to address to the Spanish Court. On the 22nd of December, 1859, the noble Lord writes the following despatch to Sir Andrew Buchanan, our Minister at Madrid:—

“ With reference to the preparations making in Spain, with a view to hostilities in Morocco, I wish you to observe to the President of the Council and to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, that the differences between the Governments of Spain and Morocco appear to have arisen from outrages committed by the Moors in the vicinity of Ceuta; but that these outrages appear to have been provoked by the defiance of the Governor of Ceuta. If the Spanish Government only seeks redress for wrongs and vindication of their honour, Her Majesty's Government will not interpose any obstacle to their obtaining such reparation. But if the outrages of the wild Moorish tribes are to be made a ground for conquest, especially on the coast, Her Majesty's Government are bound to look to the security of the fortress of Gibraltar. You are, therefore, instructed to ask for a declaration in writing, that if the Spanish troops in the course of hostilities occupy Tangier, that occupation will be temporary, and not extend beyond the ratification of a treaty of peace between Spain and Morocco. For an occupation till an indemnity is paid might become a permanent occupation, and such permanent occupation Her Majesty's Government considers inconsistent with the safety of Gibraltar."

The noble Lord had now informed the House that the occupation of Tetuan is not, in his opinion, an occupation coming within the views expressed in that despatch. It is impossible, however, for the Spanish Government to occupy Tetuan without having immediate communication between that place and the coast, and no person can doubt for a moment that, so far from being satisfied with the occupation of Tetuan, they will insist upon the occupation of some territory in the immediate neighbourhood of the town. I need not remind the noble Lord, because he is well aware of everything that has passed between this country and Spain, as to the possibility of her occupying any portion of the Moorish territory—I need not remind him of the emphatic language which the Duke of Wellington held upon this subject. He is aware also of the course which the noble Lord at the head of the Government, when he was foreign Minister, took on this question; and I cannot allow this opportunity to pass without expressing my hope that we shall hear from some one of his Colleagues, as the noble Lord is precluded from again addressing the House, that the noble Lord has addressed a vigorous and earnest remonstrance against the permanent occupation of Tetuan, or any other portion of the Moorish territory, and that he has echoed the language of the Duke of Wellington, that the English Government will not see unmoved the occupation of any territory which seriously endangers the security of Gibraltar. I regret the more that the noble Lord has spoken in the terms he has done, because they almost amount to an acknowledgment from the noble Lord that the Government of England does not consider the occupation of Tetuan what I believe it in truth to be—a serious attempt on the part of the Spanish Government to extend their territory on the coast of Morocco. For my part I believe that the permanent occupation on the part of Spain of a single inch of Moorish territory is a proceeding which England ought not to permit, and which she ought to do her utmost to prevent.

the hon. Gentleman has said I may explain that my answer to the hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth had reference exclusively to a matter of fact, and that I do not think it of advantage at the present moment to enter into a discussion as to the importance of Tetuan or any other portion of the Moorish possessions. But this I say, that I do think it would ill-become the British Government to say that when the Moorish Government have signed a treaty they are not to be bound by the obligations of that treaty. I say further, that I think it is the duty of the British Government to endeavour by all means to promote peace between Spain and Morocco, and not by imputations either on the one country or the other bring on a renewal of the war.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

House in Committee.

Mr. MASSEY in the Chair.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) £3,035, Embassy Houses &c., Abroad.

MR. DODSON asked under whose authority the repairs of the embassy house at Constantinople were conducted?

MR. W. WILLIAMS saw no reason why our Ambassador at Constantinople should have two establishments. It was a mere waste of public money.

MR. COWPER said, that at certain seasons of the year the ambassador found it necessary to go to Therapia for sanitary reasons, and he presumed the health of our Minister at Constantinople was of some importance to the country. Besides, there was convenience in it, as the ministers of other countries went to Therapia at the same time, and diplomatic correspondence could, therefore, be more easily carried on. The repairs had been conducted by a clerk of the works, who resided on the spot, and who acted under the orders of the Board of Works at home.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, there was no one who saw the two residences who would not prefer that at Pera to that at Therapia. It was not correct to say that the other ambassadors had residences at Therapia. The Austrian Ambassador had not; he doubted if the Russian Ambassador had. The British Minister never went there till his residence at Constantinople was burnt down some years since. He then took a residence at Therapia, and continued it ever since.

COLONEL SYKES said, that the British Legation at Peking occupied buildings extending over four acres and a half, all of which were in a state of dilapidation. He saw in these Estimates no charge for them.

Vote agreed to, as were also

(2.) £2,982, The British Consulate, Constantinople.

(3.) £53,000, Westminster Bridge Approaches.

(4.) £3,914, New Westminster Bridge.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS asked whether the estates belonging to Westminster Bridge were sold, or whether the revenues from them were brought into the account?

MR. COWPER said, that the Bridge estates were not sold. The revenue from them would be found in the Finance Accounts.

Vote agreed to, as were also

(5.) £8,200, General Register House, Edinburgh.

(6.) £11,200, Industrial Museum, Edinburgh.

(7.) £6,870, Aberdeen University.

COLONEL SYKES stated he should be glad of some further explanation with respect to the Vote.

MR. COWPER stated that the works, the cost of which would be defrayed out of the Vote, were those which were contemplated in the year 1858, when the Vote was first proposed. The title of the Vote included the word "renovations," because the south wing of King's College was in a dilapidated state, and it was proposed to pull it down and build a new wing, which would be appropriated to class rooms. None of the money would be spent upon the erection of a new library or of professors' houses.

Vote agreed to.

(8.) £800, Window in Glasgow Cathedral.

LORD DUNKELLIN said, he wished to ask for some explanation of the Vote. In 1858 a Vote of £400 was taken for the subject; but it was not spent, and was paid back into the Treasury last year, and now the sum of £800 was required. He wanted to know why the public should be called on to pay for stained glass in the east window of Glasgow Cathedral. It appeared that the matter was first taken up by voluntary subscriptions. If that subscription had failed, or if the estimate had been exceeded, which was usually the case, that might be laid on the parties, but it was opening up a new and a large question to say that the public should be called upon to make good the deficiency. He was not anxious to run one country against another, but he should be glad to have the principle settled, because he knew of a cathedral in Ireland the authorities of which would be very glad of a public grant for a stained-glass window, and which he had no doubt would be equally acceptable to the congregation.

MR. COWPER said, that Glasgow Cathedral was public property, and the State derived revenue from the Cathedral lands, and it, therefore, seemed right that Her Majesty, who was the owner, should join with others in the subscription which had been set on foot to pay the expenses of its ornamentation. They had often heard that property had "its duties as well as its rights," and this was one of the duties which arose from the possession of this cathedral. The principle of the Vote had already been affirmed by the House, but the sum voted in 1856 (£400) was found insufficient, and had not been spent. Three years having elapsed since the time when that money was voted, it had been returned to the Exchequer, and it was now necessary to revote the whole sum required. The public faith had been pledged that the nation would act with those who had subscribed for this object, and he was sure that the House would not wish to withdraw from that pledge. Great interest had been excited with respect to this matter in Scotland, and it would be a discredit that the State should decline to join with persons who had gone to great expense for the ornamentation of this cathedral in carrying out a work which would not be merely for local advantage, but would tend to the promotion of the fine arts throughout the United Kingdom.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he thought it most unjust that the public should be called upon to vote money for such a purpose. The right hon. Gentleman was not content with the former Vote of £400, but he now required it to be doubled.

CAPTAIN STACPOOLE asked how much revenue was derived from the lands of Glasgow Cathedral?

MR. HARVEY LEWIS said, that if the property was Her Majesty's and Her Majesty had to subscribe to the fund for the window, he could not see the necessity for coming to the House. He should like to know if it were intended that this should be a precedent? He confessed he could not see, if it were once done, how the House could refuse to do it again.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, the hon.

Member appeared to forget that Her Majesty did not receive the rents of Royal properties in Scotland and elsewhere, but that the net proceeds were paid into the Exchequer, and, consequently, that the only proper way of sanctioning any expenditure was by a vote of the House of Commons, upon which, therefore, rested the obligation of discharging the duties in connection with that property. He could not refrain from expressing his admiration of the signal munificence of the Scotch noblemen and gentlemen who had contributed a sum amounting to £8,000 or £10,000 for the embellishment of the cathedral. In the annals of modern art no circumstance of a more creditable character was mentioned. It would be strange if the Crown, speaking by the voice of the House of Commons, declined to give a sum of £800 to complete so magnificent a work.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, that the Vote showed the inconvenience which arose from the severance of the Commission of Public Works and the Woods and Forests. The receipts from the Glasgow Cathedral went into the accounts of the Woods and Forests, and, considering the strange things done by the Woods and Forests sometimes, he could scarcely understand why they had not contributed to this window. The other windows had been filled up by subscription, and only one remained, and though his right hon. Friend said it was desirable, considering it as a work of art, that this window should be filled up, he (Mr. A. Smith) confessed he had never seen a painted window that was worth looking at. He should, therefore, move that the Vote be cut out.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he remembered very distinctly when the Department of Woods and Forests was also the Department of Works, and a great deal was said annually in that House on the inconvenience of combining a department of revenue with a department of expenditure. The consequence was that a Committee of the House recommended the separation of those departments, and they were separated by Act of Parliament with general approval. The result was that the small revenues attached to the ancient cathedral of Glasgow, which were part of the land revenue of the Crown, appeared in the accounts of that revenue, and were annually laid before the House, and of course if there were any payments to be made for the cathedral they ought to be voted by the House.

MR. BLACKBURN said, he was afraid the House did not quite understand the position of this question. There was no call on the House to complete the subscription, as if the subscription which had been entered into had failed. The question stood thus. A number of noblemen and gentlemen had undertaken to fill the windows of the cathedral with stained glass. His (Mr. Blackburn's) own family had taken one window; Mr. Bond, as they had heard, had also taken one. There was no difficulty in getting families to take all the windows, the east window as well as the rest; but as the cathedral was Crown property it was thought only proper that one window should be reserved for the Crown. But let there be no misunderstanding; if the House thought proper to refuse that call on it to improve its own property, as well as to contribute to the advancement of the fine arts, there were many families in Scotland who would be proud to step into their place.

MR. CONINGHAM said, the amount asked for was small, but the principle was of great importance. If the money came into the hands of the Woods and Forests they should have contributed. The difference between Scotch gentlemen and the House of Commons was that they contributed their own property but Parliament was dealing with the property of the nation.

MR. BUXTON said, he would remind the Committee that there was a distinction between that cathedral and the English cathedrals. They belonged to public bodies in the Church—the cathedral at Glasgow was the property of the Crown.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he wished to know how much rent was received from this property?

MR. COWPER said, that at the Reformation the Church property in Scotland came into the hands of the State, and did not, as in England, remain in other hands. The income from the Church estate in Glasgow was paid into the Consolidated Fund, and it was in respect of a portion of the property of the State that the Vote was proposed. The income from the Church lands did not go to the Sovereign, but was part of the imperial revenue. [Cries of "What is the amount?"] The amount was stated in the reports of the Woods and Forests, but they were not at that moment on the table of the House.

MR. BLACKBURN said, he wished to mention, as one proof of the value of the property, that £1,200 a year, which used to be devoted from the fund to the Glasgow College, had lately been retained by the Government.

MR. H. BAILLIE said, it was not only the Church lands of Glasgow, but all over Scotland, that were now in the hands of the Crown.

MR. CRUM EWING said, if the House would give up the amount of the rents to Glasgow the citizens would be very glad to keep their cathedral in repair without troubling this House.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH observed that the Commissioners of Woods and Forests spent large sums of money without making any application to the House.

MR. MACKIE was understood to say that if the Crown refused to take part in this magnificent work the people of Glasgow would retain all the credit to themselves.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that it was of great importance if there were any outlays that they should be voted by the House, and not expended on the authority of the Woods and Forests. It was very important that every grant of public money should be brought before the House. The right hon. Gentleman alluded to the time when the departments were divided, but unfortunately the Woods and Forests was not represented in that House, and they knew very well that sums were spent by the Woods and Forests without authority from that House, and hon. Gentlemen opposite might consider that the money might have been spent without coming to that House.

MR. DISRAELI said, he would remind the hon. Baronet that at the time the change was made in the departments it was distinctly arranged that the Woods and Forests should be under the immediate control of the Treasury, and should be represented in the House by the Secretary to the Treasury; and that regulation was still in force. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Works, therefore, ought not to be called to account, because he was unable to furnish details of matters which were really not under his control.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That a sum, not exceeding £800, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expense of placing a Stained Glass Window in Glasgow Cathedral, in the year ending the 31st day of March, 1862."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 159; Noes 51: Majority 108.

Vote agreed to.

Mr. Blackburn

(9.) £413, Examination of Plan and Estimate for Main Drainage of London.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS asked for an explanation of the Vote.

MR. COWPER said, that the explanation of the Vote was that it was to defray the expenses in connection with a Report made by two engineers, Mr. Simpson and Captain Dalton. The account had been sent in in 1858, but from various circumstances those gentlemen did not appear to have pressed their claim until lately. The Government declined to pay them the full amount, but considering that they had made the Report in reply to attacks on their previous statements, it was thought but fair that they should be paid the expenses that they were actually out of pocket but they were not to receive anything for the employment of their own time.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he observed that something like £9,000 or £10,000 had been expended in these inquiries about matters in which the Metropolitan Board of Works was concerned. He hoped the Committee would draw this moral from that fact, namely, that the less the Government interfered in future with the management of metropolitan works the better for the public. He said this because a great metropolitan question was now pending—namely, the Thames Embankment. He trusted the Government would be induced to leave that work to the Metropolitan Board of Works, and would not interfere with that body in the way that previous Governments had done, which had drawn down upon the country that expenditure of which they were now asked to vote so large an item.

MR. CHILDERS asked why the right hon. Gentleman had not called the account in in 1859?

MR. COWPER said, the engineers employed were not public officers. They were only engineers employed to do this work. The account was sent in, but could not be placed on the Votes of last year, and so was thrown now upon the Votes of the present year.

Vote agreed to; as was also

(10.) £3,000, National Gallery, Dublin.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £160,000, be granted to Her Majesty, towards defraying the Expense of constructing certain Harbours of Refuge, to the 31st day of March, 1862."

MR. BAXTER remarked that he was glad to observe a greater disposition on the part of the House to reduce the expenditure than had existed for some years past. He wished to call the attention of the Committee to what he considered to be the greatest blot in these Estimates, and he intended, by taking the sense of the Committee upon the question, to endeavour to put an end to the great and ridiculous expenditure that was going on at Alderney. He submitted to the good sense of the Committee whether they ought not to try to stop this expenditure, and thus prevent good money being thrown away after bad, even although it was humiliating to confess in the sight of our neighbours across the Channel, that we had been guilty of great folly? It stirred one with indignation to examine the various plans that had been from time to time submitted in the interest of engineers and contractors, with the view of making a harbour at Alderney. He held in his hand a remarkable document, entitled Alderney; a Sketch, presented to the Select Committee which sat last year on the Miscellaneous Estimates, and which gave particulars with regard to five plans which at various times had been submitted with respect to this harbour. The first plan was devised in 1848, at an estimated cost of £620,000. In 1850, there was another plan, at a cost of £880,000. In 1854, there was a further extension proposed, at an estimated cost of £1,300,000. In 1857, there was a still further extension, at an estimated cost of £1,850,000, and those plans were followed up in 1858 with the greatest plan of all, at an estimated cost of no less than £2,000,000. He desired to call the attention of the Committee to the fact that, of all these various plans, only one had been submitted for the consideration and approval of Parliament—namely, the plan of 1848, which was also the smallest plan. He had the honour of sitting last year on the Committee on the Miscellaneous Expenditure of the Country, and they had rather remarkable evidence given on the subject of Alderney. Sir Richard Bromley stated that the control of the Treasury over the expenditure was nominal, and the Admiralty had no control whatever. The Civil Lord of the Admiralty told the Committee precisely the same thing, and made the remarkable statement that the stones at Alderney were thrown into 120 feet of water without any sort of independent measurement whatever. It was rumoured that the Government were in possession of a Report of an officer of some standing, to the effect that the best thing which could be done with Alderney, in the event of a war breaking out with France and England—which God forbid—would be to blow it up altogether. As a harbour of observation, being out of view of Cherbourg, it was useless; and he had heard military authorities state that it was useless as a harbour of defence, as the country could never supply a sufficient number of soldiers to man the fortifications. He wished to impress upon the House of Commons its duty, as guardian of the public purse, to take the initiative in this matter by withholding the Supplies. The Vote for Alderney was not taken as a military Vote, but they were asked to vote the money for it as a harbour of refuge. He put it to the common sense of every hon. Member of that House if there ever was such a misnomer. Every person must know that Alderney, as a harbour of refuge, was, and would always be, totally useless. He was sure there was not a shipowner in that House who did not know that his vessel would be far safer beating about in the Bay of Biscay, under any circumstances, than if she were to make the harbour of Alderney; and he was sure his hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay) would dismiss any captain who ran one of his ships there for refuge. The noble Duke at the head of the Admiralty had stated that fourteen plans for the Harbour of Alderney had been presented; but he believed that no official would stand up and defend so gross an expenditure as the carrying out of these plans would require. They had already spent on this gigantic folly no less than £860,000; and he thought it was high time for such extravagance to be checked by the House. An intelligent witness, Captain Claxton, in his evidence before the Committee on Harbours of Refuge, stated, that in the event of a gale of wind, and vessels running into Alderney for refuge, there would not be room for seven ships. According to the lowest estimate, they would be asked to spend £363,000 more. He trusted, therefore, that the Committee would cease to be deluded by the answer which they usually received on the subject—namely, that if the House refused to vote this money the harbour would be useless. He did not believe that any money they could spend upon it would render it serviceable to the public, and he should, therefore, move that the sum of £90,000 for the works at Alderney be omitted from the proposed Vote.

Mr. LIDDELL said, that in 1845 the Treasury had handed over the execution of these works to the Admiralty; and Sir Charles Trevelyan had, on that occasion, used these words—"We are of opinion that these important public works should be executed under the responsibility and supervision of the Lords of the Admiralty." The Admiralty, having accepted that responsibility, had undertaken a public trust with respect to the expenditure of £3,000,000 of public money. Now, in what manner had they discharged that trust? He found from the evidence of Sir Richard Bromley, the accountant general, given before the Committee of which the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Baxter) was a member, that no control whatever existed over the expenditure, and that he had no means of checking their accounts. The accounts, it appeared, were never audited. The director general of works for the Admiralty stated that the estimates were not submitted to him; they were prepared by the engineers, and by them handed over to the contractors. He did not wish to disparage either the engineers or the contractors, but the system was defective. If a fixed salary and a marine residence were given to a resident engineer, that was not the best means of securing a rapid completion of the works in hand, and without a proper superintendence of such works it was not likely that they would be executed in an efficient manner. The system pursued, indeed, seemed to give a premium on the prolongation of the works. The director general of the works stated before the Committee that he had on one occasion accompanied the Lords of the Admiralty on a visit to the works, but not one question was asked him about the works; and upon being asked how the estimates were framed, he had said, "I have no knowledge whatever." The noble Viscount opposite (Viscount Palmerston) had always denied that Alderney was a harbour of refuge, and had declared it to be a great public work of defence, which was recommended by the Duke of Wellington. The original estimate was £620,000, and the Duke of Wellington must undoubtedly, therefore, be taken to have sanctioned that expenditure; but that estimate had grown already to £1,300,000, and there was a prospect of its being increased to upwards of £2,000,000. He thought it very likely that if the works had been properly carried out the £620,000 originally estimated would have proved sufficient. Harbours of refuge were a great public want. The loss of £1,500,000 worth of property and several hundred lives, which took place yearly for the want of them ought to be regarded, he thought, as a great national discredit. Deputations had frequently waited upon the First Lord of the Treasury and upon the Lords of the Admiralty for the purpose of urging the necessity for the construction of additional harbours of refuge; but they had always been met with the same stereotyped answer, that they had not got the money, and were not in a position to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer for it. But how could they give that answer with a clear conscience when they asked the House every year for this enormous sum of money to construct what was not a harbour of refuge but a system of defence? For the purpose of ascertaining how other public bodies entrusted with the expenditure of public money conducted their affairs, he had investigated the course pursued by the Tyne Commissioners, who were making large and extensive works of a similar character to those at Alderney by extending their harbour, and he found that there was not a single check that could be named or conceived which was not applied by those commissioners. There were persons employed to weigh every waggon load of material that was thrown into the sea; others who took independent measurements of the work done, as it proceeded, and rendered faithful accounts to their employers. None of these checks, however, existed at Alderney, but the whole superintendence and responsibility were thrown on a single resident engineer. No doubt that gentleman was a man of integrity, and one that could be relied upon, but it was not right that such a responsibility should be cast upon a single person. And, in his opinion, it was the duty of the Admiralty to institute proper checks, and show whether the works for which such large lump sums as were yearly expended were paid had been done. His hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Whitbread), one of the Lords of the Admiralty, had himself felt it necessary that some further check should be provided, and, struck with alarm at the enormous amount of material thrown into the sea in the course of the works at Alderney, had said he considered it his duty to suggest that a system of independent check should be instituted over such a gigantic submarine construction. But these works had been commenced fourteen years ago. How was it that his hon. Friend (Mr. Whitbread) was the first man to suggest, after a lapse of fourteen years, the adoption of a system of independent measurement, which ought to have been established when the works were first commenced? It was not, in his opinion, at all creditable to a public department that they had left undone a work of such importance. He hoped to hear from the Government before the debate closed that they had a definite plan of construction upon which the Admiralty were determined to act, and also that there was some reasonable prospect of the works at Alderney being completed. His vote would depend to some extent upon the reply given to that question, because if it could be shown by the Government that the money already expended had produced an incomplete harbour, and that by a small additional sum the harbour could be made a perfect work, then of course it would be wise to leave the matter in the hands of the Government, trust to their discretion, and vote the money. But on the other hand, if no satisfactory answer could be given by the Government, he should certainly vote for the reduction proposed, and so put a stop to that which he considered an enormous reckless expenditure.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said, that before the Committee heard any official statement with respect either to the present or the course the Government proposed to pursue for the future, he was desirous of giving a short extra-official explanation of the past as far as he was cognizant of the matter. And he would begin by saying, in concert with the noble Lord at the head of the Government (Lord Palmerston), who had made a statement on a previous occasion upon this subject—a statement which he (Sir James Graham) begged in the most precise manner to confirm—he did not regard the work at Alderney as a harbour of refuge. He was sorry, indeed, to find that it had been so designated, because it was not consistent with the fact, and tended therefore to deceive. The work was designed for defence, and he regarded it as being both of a naval and also of a military character. He had had conversations on many occasions with the late Duke of Wellington on the subject, and it was a work to which the Duke attached primary importance, one which he had himself recommended, and one which even up to the close of his life he had always regarded its progress with great satisfaction. It was not to be dissembled that Cherbourg had justly been an object of England's jealousy in connection with the question of the maintenance of our naval supremacy in the British Channel. But, however, any hostile movement in the British Channel from the westward of Cherbourg must take place between Alderney and Portland. He did not think any objection had been taken to the great works which had been successfully carried on at Portland. By a telegraphic cable communication had been established between Portland and Alderney. As to the military works at Alderney, he believed they were complete, and he spoke upon the authority of Sir John Burgoyne, who had conducted that portion of the construction. Sir John Burgoyne considered them so complete that, for his own military reputation, he desired nothing more than to command a small garrison of less than 3,000 men, and he was confident he could hold on against any force that could be brought against him. With respect to the harbour, he (Sir James Graham) admitted at once that it was not a harbour of refuge. It was the opinion of admirals and generals upon whose authority he could rely, but more especially it was the opinion of the Duke of Wellington, the highest of all military authority, and therefore he (Sir James Graham) felt persuaded that Alderney fortified, and with the means of accommodating ships of war, and as the progress of naval science went on, iron-clad steamers of war would, in conjunction with Portland, form a most important means of checking any naval operations in the Channel; and in the event of any large force being congregated at Cherbourg from the westward it would be found a most sure means of defence. With regard to the expenditure, he admitted it had been large, but to say that there had been no check upon the expenditure was erroneous. He had himself, while at the Admiralty, considered it his duty to superintend and watch very narrowly the expenditure. It was not brought under the attention of the Accountant General of the Navy nor of the Director General of Works. The work had been transferred from the Treasury to the Admiralty, as a very special service of a mixed character, partly naval and partly military. The naval part was under the immediate superintendence of Mr. Walker, the engineer, a man of the highest reputation, of the strictest integrity, and in whom, from long experience, he (Sir James Graham) felt entire confidence could be placed. Mr. Walker was responsible to the Admiralty for the whole outlay upon that portion of the works. He appointed an engineer quite apart from the contractor; the engineer was responsible for the measurements; he made a quarterly report to Mr. Walker; Mr. Walker laid the report before the Admiralty, and it was investigated. Such was the mode in which the work was conducted during the two years he was at the Admiralty, and he was quite satisfied that every security was taken with respect both to measurement and superintendence. The executive Government would tell the Committee their view of the progress of the work, and to what further extent it would be carried. With respect to the past he did not regret the work had been commenced. He was not an undue alarmist. He did not believe that at the present moment there existed any hostile intention on the part of France towards this country; but it could not be denied that France had been making a great outlay, and that her naval preparations were far advanced. Without any immediate intention of hostility to England, that nation might naturally look with something like jealousy at the naval means of this country, and might desire, in consideration of some future contingency on the Continent, to be able by naval preparation to balance the power of England on the sea. They could not conceal from themselves that, whatever might be the present policy of France, that was a possibility, and this country, without giving any just cause of offence to France, was justified in adopting measures of precaution for the maintenance of its naval superiority. He repeated that he regarded this outlay as partaking of the prudential character he had glanced at; though the expenditure must be carefully watched by the House. He believed the present discussion to be not inopportune, and being cognizant of the facts, he should not have discharged his duty if he had not frankly stated his opinion with respect to the past, and he was quite sure that the Government would be ready to state their view with respect to the future outlay which they would recommend the House to sanction.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, he was not about to dwell on the merits of Alderney as a harbour, or a naval or military defence, but he wished to correct a statement made by the hon. Member for Northumberland (Mr. Liddell) as to what had been done from time to time in regard to Alderney. The accounts referred to by the hon. Baronet opposite had been regularly laid before the House since 1850.

Sir James Graham

Now, he (Captain Jervis) had visited those works, and he could bear witness to the fact that not a single stone had been used there which had not been carefully measured and valued. He did not think that any papers could be more clear than those which had passed the Admiralty yearly in connection with the harbours of refuge.

MR. PEEL said it was true that the design of the harbour had undergone various alterations, which were principally owing to the increasing size of ships, but still the total estimate for the construction of the works had remained at the same amount for the last five years—namely, £1,300,000. No estimate of £2,000,000 had ever been sanctioned. The view of the question to which the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle had called attention had, he thought, a considerable bearing on the point at issue, because if the Committee were to refuse the Vote under discussion the whole of the past outlay at Alderney would be thrown away, including that which had been granted for the fortifications on the island. Those fortifications were, he might add, of a nature to render the island almost as impregnable as Gibraltar itself; and if the Committee were to vote the necessary sums, we should have a harbour which might, in the opinion of some hon. Gentlemen, be useless as a harbour of refuge, but which, in accordance with the views of many persons competent to form a judgment on the subject, and among them of no less an authority than the Duke of Wellington, was calculated to constitute a most important basis of military operations, and an advantageous place of shelter for vessels of war. The unfinished state, moreover, in which the works at Alderney were at present rendered it highly inexpedient that their progress should be arrested. The breakwater consisted of a base on which a wall was built in masonry, and this submarine base had been extended to the furthest extremity to which it was intended to be carried,—a point which was considerably in advance of that reached by the wall, the consequence of what was that the swell it caused at the entrance of the harbour made it at times dangerous if not impracticable for vessels to enter.

MR. MONSELL said, that as a harbour for military and naval purposes that at Alderney, no doubt, assumed a character of considerable importance at the time when the works there were commenced; but he should like to know from the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty whether the changes which had since that period taken place with respect to armaments had not completely diminished the value of the harbour. Would it, he would ask, with guns such as those now in use, be possible for a fleet attacked by a more powerful enemy to continue in that harbour without running the risk of being destroyed? It by no means, in his opinion, followed that because Alderney was a harbour of great importance several years ago it should be regarded in the same light in the present day.

MR. WHITBREAD said, that with reference to the question of the control exercised by the Admiralty over the expenditure for the construction of the breakwater, he had to state that the payment of the contractor was adjusted on the measurement by passing it over a weigh-bridge in the presence of a Government officer of the actual cubical mass of stone which was used in the breakwater. Before any payment was made by the Admiralty the measurement was certified by Mr. Walker, the superintending engineer in London, and by Mr. May, the engineer on the spot. It was, therefore, impossible that the Admiralty could be imposed upon unless there was collusion between the contractor and those parties. It was not an easy matter for an independent engineer to go down and measure whether more stones had been charged for than had been used in so enormous a work.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he thought the question before them was one of the most important which had been ever submitted to the consideration of the Committee. The evidence of Sir Richard Bromley and Colonel Greene before the Select Committee on the subject disclosed a system of accounts which were unparalleled, and the attention of the Admiralty as well as of the Civil Lords was called to the matter. As to Portland Harbour, the consulting engineer and the acting engineer were one and the same person, so that there could not be much check there. Sir Richard Bromley, in his evidence, stated that the mode in which the money was spent upon these works in such large sums was most unsatisfactory—that hundreds of thousands of pounds were expended without any detailed account being received by him in respect to such expenditure—that the practice was for the Admiralty to issue an order for the advance of a certain sum—that he paid the money so ordered; but that the details of how it was to be expended were never submitted to any public audit. He (Sir Henry Willoughby) asked how it could be said that those were accounts which ought to be passed by the authorities of the Admiralty? Why, it was quite clear that those were no accounts at all. What was still more extraordinary, however, was that the inspector of works (Colonel Greene), when asked on what grounds he signed the certificate with respect to the expenditure in the case of military defences, replied that he knew nothing about that which he was called upon to certify. Now, could anything, he would ask, be more absurd than to make use of the name of an important public officer to guarantee payments with the nature of which he was entirely unacquainted? So strongly did he feel the impropriety of such a course, that he addressed a letter to the Board of Admiralty showing the absurdity of making him responsible for works he knew nothing whatever about. It was quite clear, with such facts before them, that the Committee ought to support the Motion of the hon. Member for Montrose, with the view of giving time for the organization of some better system of accounts. It was monstrous that any public department should sanction an expenditure of tens of thousands of pounds, without anything in the shape of a voucher. There was a conflict in the matter between the Treasury and the Admiralty, and in the confusion between the two departments all control was lost. He believed that the nomination of engineers was with the Treasury, the work being considered rather of a civil than of a naval character. There was no doubt the engineer was an honourable man and one of a high character. So far the interests of the public were secure in his hands. Nevertheless, they were spending an additional £800,000 on the works of Alderney alone, while the advantages to be derived from that large outlay were still somewhat doubtful. He hoped that the Committee would not assent to vote the money until they had a better system of accounts before them. The Chancellor of the Exchequer would, perhaps, consider that an excellent opportunity for putting in practice some of those economical rules on which he had laid so much stress.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of the Treasury had not given the Committee any distinct information as to the extent to which these works were to be carried, and what plan was to be adopted. It was stated before the Committee of last year that the works were only to be continued on the foundations which had already been laid, but it was evident that new foundations had since been laid.

Mr. CONINGHAM said, that unless it could be clearly shown that fixed defences of that sort would be an effectual protection for our naval forces the expenditure of the money would be useless. With the small military force which the country possessed they could not defend their extensive series of fortifications all over the world. He should certainly support the Amendment, and he almost regretted that the sum to be expended on Dover Harbour had not been included in it.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that in the autumn of 1859, when the Government first came into office, he had been associated with his right hon. Friends the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the President of the Board of Trade to consider the matter; and, having had various engineering authorities before them, they came to the conclusion that it was impossible under any circumstances to stop the works until they came to a certain point marked D on the plan before the House. The foundations had been laid up to that point, and it had been an understood thing with the contractor that the breakwater should be constructed up to the point where the foundations were laid. The contract had been one of a very peculiar nature. From the earliest there never had been any fixed plan with regard to the full extent of the work. The difficulties had been so great that probably former Governments felt it would be necessary to carry it out to a certain distance to ascertain whether that would give shelter. The consequence was that the contractors carried out their foundation to that point, and it was impossible to stop the construction of the breakwater until it came to that point on the western arm. It was also necessary that certain rocks within the harbour, which were really all that prevented it being a very fair harbour, should be blasted—[“Hear, hear!”]—and also that on the eastern arm the breakwater should be carried out as far as some islets marked on the plan K. That was necessary, because the tide made so strong across the mouth of the harbour from the race of Alderney, that, unless the breakwater were carried out that far, vessels would not be able at times to get into the harbour at all. He was not defending the original construction of the harbour, for which he was not responsible; but it was the duty of the Government, when they found the work carried to its present point, to complete it to such a point as would make the harbour a decent harbour. With regard to the utility of the harbour in the event of a war, it was perfectly true that circumstances had very much changed since the Duke of Wellington recommended its construction. The utmost limit of the range of guns then was some 3,000 yards; now we had guns which would carry double that distance. By so much, therefore, Alderney harbour was damaged, and he was willing to admit that, in his opinion, it did not possess the same advantages as when its construction was first commenced. The right hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Monsell) had, however, overlooked the fact that, if an enemy came there to throw shells into the harbour we had very fine forts which could throw shells at them. He presupposed, too, that the enemy would have command of the sea—an event which he trusted would never come to pass. Undoubtedly, in the event of a future war, Alderney Harbour would be of considerable value as a defensive work, and as a look-out station for vessels watching the coast of France—though, at the same time, he wished to guard himself from being held to be one of those who would have advised its original construction. As to the control over the expenditure on these works, no doubt, when the evidence to which the hon. Baronet opposite had referred was given, there was a deficiency in that respect, but very efficient checks had since been put into practice. The Admiralty, under the circumstances, had as fair a check as could be devised.

Mr. LINDSAY said, the noble Lord had admitted that Alderney was a very bad harbour, and he would ask, if it were full of rocks and dangerous currents, what was the use of enclosing it? No man in his senses would dream of running for Alderney in a gale of wind, therefore it could not be called a harbour of refuge. Then it was described as a harbour of observation, but was it worth while to spend £1,300,000 for a mere look-out station? If necessary, somebody could be placed on the island with a telegraphic wire to communicate with the Admiralty, and that would be a much cheaper and better arrangement. The noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury used the old stereotyped argument, and said that because £800,000 had been spent upon the place, therefore they must spend £500,000 in finishing it. But what reason had they for supposing £500,000 would finish it. From the experience of Holyhead Harbour, and other great works, it would not be surprising if another half-million or million were required. Then, in answer to the argument derived from the increased range of artillery, his noble Friend had refused to go upon the assumption that we had lost the command of the sea. But, if we retained the command of the sea, what was the use of the fortifications of Alderney at all? He asked whether, if that enormous sum had not been spent there, the French in the event of war would ever have thought of landing at Alderney? The fact was that the erection of fortifications would tempt an enemy there. These fortifications would require 3,000 men, or, according to some estimates, 5,000 or 8,000 men, to hold them, and could we during war spare such a force for the defence of such a place? He trusted that the Committee would look the matter boldly in the face, and would refuse to sanction any further expenditure.

Mr. BUXTON said, he wished to remind the Committee that during the Russian War our gunboats, steaming round and round all the while, laid Sweaborg in ruins with hardly any injury to themselves. Unless, therefore, we had a fleet stationed at Alderney a few gunboats stealing out of Cherbourg might at any time destroy the fortifications.

Mr. KINNAIRD asked, whether it would be greater economy to throw away the £800,000 which had been already expended, or to complete the works at the cost of £500,000? Alderney was only eighteen miles from Cherbourg, and considering the enormous expenditure which had been going on there, he thought it would not be wise to abandon the fortifications on that island. He should support the Government in their proposal.

Mr. BAXTER said, he thought it was evident, after the speech of the noble Lord, that he was himself opposed to the expenditure. From his speech, coupled with that of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury, it appeared that the Government had come to no decision yet, for while, according to the latter, the works would cost only £1,300,000, the noble Lord seemed to think they would cost a good deal more. Granting, however, that the Government knew their own minds upon the subject, they might next year be turned out of office, and their successors might take an entirely different view, and sanction a much larger expenditure.

Mr. PEEL said, his statement respecting the sum required for completing the works had been made on the authority of the superintending engineer.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET explained that the £500,000 included everything necessary to finish the harbour.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, as the chief argument which induces the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Baxter) to persist in his Amendment seems to be based on an apprehension that the Government may be turned out next year, I will remind him that he and his friends will have it very much in their own power to prevent such a misfortune. He has it in his power, therefore, to mitigate the force of his own argument. The other arguments which have been used are not entitled to more weight. My right hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir James Graham) has, in the clearest manner, shown that by the best military and naval authorities, this harbour was considered not as a harbour of refuge, but as a most important naval and military position, with a view to the defence of the country from hostile operations in the Channel. In these days people are not very apt to submit to authority; but I do think that upon a point of this kind, upon a question of naval and military tactics, upon a question as to the value of certain arrangements with a view to the defence of the country, the opinions of the Duke of Wellington and of the various other persons whom my right hon. Friend has quoted are entitled to consideration. I am strongly of opinion that their view is the right one. This is a matter which has been often discussed by the best naval and military authorities, and I think there never was a case more completely made out than the value which the station at Alderney, defended by works on the island, would have in the way of crippling, intercepting, and thwarting hostile operations in the Channel by France. It is said that there have been no plans of Alderney Harbour. What my noble Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty stated was, that there have been no fixed plans of the various extensions which have been proposed from time to time. There always was one and the same plan as to the line along which the breakwater was to be carried. The only question was as to the point where it was to end. That was varied according to the different views which at different times were taken of the matter. But great surprise was manifested, and loud cries of "Hear, hear!" were raised, when my noble Friend said there were rocks in the harbour which required to be blasted. The hon. Gentlemen who expressed their astonishment at that statement must be little conversant with naval matters and the construction of harbours if they think you are never to make a harbour where there are rocks which require to be blasted. Why, blasting rocks is the simplest and easiest of all operations. The construction of a great breakwater in deep water—as at Plymouth, for instance—is a work of difficulty, of time, and of expense; but the blasting of rocks is an easy matter. In Holyhead Harbour there were rocks to be blasted; in fact, you can seldom make a harbour in a spot which is free from rocks, and the blasting of rocks under water is a simple and easy operation. But it is said that the changes which, since the days of the Duke of Wellington, have taken place in naval and military warfare have destroyed the value of the harbour at Alderney. I take leave entirely to differ from that statement. The change which has taken place in the mode of propelling ships has increased rather than diminished the value of the harbour; because, from the rapidity of the current of the tides in those waters, the use of steam gives you a much greater command of the harbour than you had before, both in coming in and in going out. Then we are told that the greater range of guns makes the harbour of no value. I maintain the contrary, because we can have much heavier guns, carrying much further, placed in position on shore, than any ship can carry at sea; and your arm reaching from the shore will be much longer and more powerful than the arm of the ship which is attempting to attack you from the sea. Something has been said about ships not being easily hit, but everybody knows that you can hit a ship under way nearly as well as a ship at anchor. Then we are told that the harbour could be easily destroyed. A harbour is not so easily destroyed as some hon. Gentlemen seem to suppose. It consists of water surrounded by stonework, and you might throw a good number of shells at a breakwater or a harbour before you broke it down. That danger, therefore, is not to be apprehended. Recollect, moreover, that you never would have a large collection of ships at Alderney. It is not intended for that purpose. You would merely have a small number of steamers to watch and intercept convoys. They are not easily hit, and they can fire at the enemy as well as the enemy can fire at them. But it is said that these works on the island would require a garrison which might be more usefully employed in war somewhere else. I differ from that view. We have been told by the best military authorities that something like 3,000 men could hold these works against any force likely to attack them; and I say, that if 3,000 men, by holding these works, could thwart and impede the attempts of a hostile fleet upon our shores, they would be more usefully employed there than in any other place to which they could be sent. I maintain, then, that to leave these works unfinished—and remember they are seaworks, which everybody knows if left unfinished will be destroyed by the action of the winds and waves—instead of completing them and making them useful for the purpose for which they were intended, would be the worst possible economy. I trust, therefore, that the Committee will not allow itself to be led away by the fervid eloquence of the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) and of those who have supported him, but will take a calm and dispassionate view of the matter. The statement of my right hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle has shown the value attached to these works by those who, I take the liberty of saying, are better judges than any of us here; and it would be bad economy if we were to throw away the money which has been already expended at Alderney without obtaining a result, instead of, by a little additional outlay, making the works there of great value and importance with a view to the defence of the country.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the item of £90,000, for Works at Alderney, be omitted from the proposed Vote."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 50; Nocs 65: Majority 15.

Mr. LINDSAY said, that three years ago a pledge was given by the Government that Dover Harbour would be given up, and that only the pier would be constructed. Ever since, however, the Government had taken £50,000 a year for Dover. He wished to know when the pier and harbour would be completed?

MR. PEELE said, that the harbour of refuge at Dover had been given up, and the pier only was being proceeded with. The length of the pier was 1,800 feet, and the estimated cost was £650,000, and the aggregate Votes of the House had been £460,000. If the present Vote were agreed to, there would remain £150,000 still to be voted. The whole work was under contract.

MR. H. A. HERBERT: What is the pier for?

MR. PEELE: For the accommodation of the mail packets and the convenience of coaling ships of war.

MR. H. A. HERBERT said, he wished to call attention to the Note appended to the Estimate. It referred to the £445,000, which was the estimated cost of the eastern breakwater, packet piers, and postal accommodation at Holyhead, as approved by the Admiralty and sanctioned by the Treasury; the Note said, "As stated last year, it is hoped that a great part, if not the whole, of this £445,000 will be saved." Now, that referred to a large sum which appeared in the Estimates of 1857 on the recommendation of Mr. Hawkshaw, and was intended to be laid out for the accommodation of the mail packets plying between Holyhead and Kingstown. The City of Dublin Company, on the faith of the promise of the Government to provide that accommodation at Holyhead, laid out a large sum of money in the construction of new mail steamers that were now admitted to be the finest and fastest vessels of the kind afloat. But the Government had never performed its part of the agreement; it had done nothing whatever towards the construction of the pier. He should, perhaps, be told that the Company was satisfied with the present arrangements. That was not the case; the last report of the Company proved that it was dissatisfied, and did complain. Even if it did not, there was another interest besides that of the Company—the interest of the public. On the strength of the proposed postal improvements the House had granted a large subsidy to the Company. But in consequence of the non-performance by the Government of its part of the contract it had been obliged to give up the fines it was empowered to retain for loss of time by the Company. The money voted by the House was, to a certain extent, made nugatory by the neglect of the Government. The Company deserved every credit for the manner in which it performed the service; but the public ought not to have to give up a right. The Government was to have constructed a proper pier, as at Kingstown; but at Holyhead there was still nothing but a miserable wooden jetty, without any protection whatever; in some weather the steamers could not run alongside of it without difficulty; and there was always some delay. He did not ask that the whole of the money should be laid out; but the Government was bound to construct the pier, as it had promised.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he saw no prospect of a termination to the cost of these works. They were an instance of the delusion practised upon the House by inaccurate estimates. The first estimate for the work was £808,000, but now Mr. Hawkshaw put it at £1,900,000.

MR. LEFROY corroborated the statement of the right hon. Member for Kerry, and hoped that the Government would, at least, take a Vote for a sufficient sum to complete the arrangements for landing and protection from dangerous winds for the magnificent vessels now employed in the public service.

MR. PEELE said, the Estimate, on the face of it, showed that the Government did not desire to conceal the fact that the Packet piers had been approved by the Admiralty and sanctioned by the Treasury in 1857, and he would also admit that those piers were referred to in the postal contract. In 1859 it was arranged that the Government should provide a temporary wooden pier in extension of the old pier, and a sum of £16,000 was voted and expended for that purpose. At the beginning of last year it was suggested that, by a small additional outlay, the temporary wooden pier could be made adequate for the wants of the packet service, and that thus the more costly work that had been contemplated might be dispensed with. Accordingly a Vote of £7,000 was taken, and a note was inserted in the Estimates that the Vote for £445,000 for a permanent pier would probably not be required. It was true that Mr. Hawkshaw had suggested certain reductions in the extent of the proposed works for permanent piers, by which the cost would be reduced to £286,000; but it was thought better, before entering upon that expenditure, to make a further trial of the temporary arrangements. He was informed that, as far as the site was concerned, the commanders of packets preferred the temporary to the permanent pier. There could be no doubt that some covering should be provided on the pier for passengers landing from the packets, but he did not think there could be any difficulty in covering over the temporary wooden pier. With respect to the postal contract, he must say there had been no relaxation of the conditions of the contract on account of any insufficiency of pier accommodation, but, according to a clause in the contract, no fines were to be levied until the accommodation that had been originally contemplated was fully provided. With no power to impose fines on them the packet company had not of course the same inducement to keep time, but notwithstanding that the service had been satisfactorily performed. Under those circumstances, he thought it would be advisable to make further trial of the temporary arrangement, and to abstain for the present from any expenditure upon the more costly scheme.

MR. BENTINCK said, he was not a shareholder either in the North Western Railway or the Packet Company, nor was he in the habit of taking a passage in the steamers between Holyhead and Dublin. He, therefore, could not be supposed to have any interest in the matter. He, however, frequently found himself in the harbour, and the condition of that harbour was so remarkable that he was glad his right hon. Friend had called attention to the subject. He (Mr. Bentinck) had no sympathy whatever with the arrangement for the accommodation of passengers or the conveyance of letters. He had always held that so long as what were called free trade principles were carried out everybody ought to bear their own expenses, whether for letters or as passengers, and that no one had a right to an Imperial contribution. To that point, however, he did not wish to advert. The important point was this. He would undertake to say that there did not exist in Europe such a specimen of public mismanagement and of wasteful expenditure—he should not be using too strong a term if he said of downright absurdity—as the harbour of refuge at Holyhead. The harbour was originally planned to be constructed at a trifling expense for a harbour of refuge and a harbour for the accommodation and convenience of the public. What was the result? After the northern pier was constructed the harbour was found to be perfectly inadequate for the purposes for which it was designed. It was no harbour of refuge; for, in the first place, the northern pier was not sufficiently extended; and, in the next place, it was entirely open to the sea at the entrance, and was completely exposed. They had expended somewhere about £600,000 when it was discovered that they were proceeding on a mistaken principle, as economy was so apt to do in this country. They had thrown away £600,000, whereas, if they had at the first laid out a larger sum, a sufficient harbour of refuge would have been constructed. Holyhead Harbour was a disgrace to the country, and an exemplification of a system which made us the laughing stock of Europe. Having fooled away £1,100,000 in making a bad harbour, when they could have made a good one for much less money, they were now endeavouring to render that harbour perfectly useless. There were rocks which rendered it dangerous to go into the harbour of refuge at night, and yet they would not go to the expense of having a light ship there. They also grudged a trifling outlay for the convenience of the steampackets which conveyed the mails between London and Dublin, and we proposed to spend more money on the old harbour, which had been previously condemned. Some explanations ought to be given of why they were now about to lay out money in improving the old harbour, the inefficiency of which was the ground for the construction of the new.

LORD NAAS said, he quite agreed that, perhaps, a more extraordinary tissue of blunders had never been committed than had been witnessed in the case of the Holyhead Harbour. The original estimates had been immensely exceeded, the original plans widely departed from, and now, after all the outlay, the harbour was found very inadequate for the purposes for which it had been designed. The packet pier was, however, a different thing from the harbour of refuge, and the harbour of refuge was of no use as regarded the packet pier. Before voting any further sums the Committee ought to be informed of what was the intention of the Government in respect to the packet pier. The wooden jetty at present used for the packets could be only a temporary work.

MR. LINDSAY said, he believed that it was generally admitted, on both sides of the House, that Holyhead was worthless as a harbour of refuge. They had already spent upon it £1,188,000, and £732,000 more would be required. They were asked to spend that money, not for the purpose of improving it as a harbour of refuge for the saving of life and property, but for the purpose of building piers for the accommodation of certain passengers travelling between Holyhead and Ireland. In so doing they were laying down a dangerous principle, as persons interested in Southampton, Liverpool, and other ports where there were packet stations, would have much stronger grounds if they choose to come and ask Parliament for money to build piers.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: There are two questions involved in this Vote—one in regard to the harbour of refuge, the other in regard to the packet communication between Dublin and Holyhead. With regard to the harbour of refuge my hon. Friend who has just spoken is entirely mistaken, as indeed other hon. Members have been, in supposing that this harbour of refuge is a failure. It is quite the contrary. That harbour of refuge is a great success. It has afforded shelter to an immense number of vessels frequenting that channel. During some times of storm there have been hundreds of vessels in that harbour at the same moment. Therefore, my hon. Friend must not imagine that the money expended on that harbour has been thrown away, for the object has been accomplished. No doubt it is quite true that the plans for that harbour have been varied from time to time. The Government had originally fallen into the mistake of adopting a work on too small a scale. That is a very favourite system here when we discuss the Estimates, but it very often turns out not so economical, but, in the end, a very expensive plan. When a work is found not really to accomplish the object in view, it must be altered, and every one knows that altering a work commenced on one plan and adding to it on another, is much more expensive than if the original work had been of the requisite dimensions. If the line of pier had been originally made to include a sufficient area the work might have been made much better, and less liable to injury, than on the line which was adopted. But, nevertheless, the harbour is very valuable to the commerce of this country. My hon. Friend, therefore, need not make himself uneasy with the idea that the money expended has been thrown away. Questions are still pending as to the degree to which the existing piers should be carried out; and these matters require consideration. Then we come to the packet question. I do not admit the justice of the argument of my hon. Friend (Mr. Lindsay) that we ought to put this harbour of Holyhead as a packet harbour on the same footing as Southampton or Liverpool, or any other port from which packets start. We must recollect that Great Britain and Ireland are parts of the United Kingdom. There is a union between them, and it is a matter of Imperial policy and advantage to facilitate to the utmost possible extent the means of rapid communication for letters and persons between the two islands. I hold that to be quite distinct from all questions of private enterprise—it is a national object, and one well deserving of any expenditure within reasonable limits that can be deemed useful for accomplishing so important a purpose. I think, therefore, there is great force in what my right hon. Friend (Mr. H. Herbert) stated in regard to the inconvenience now existing in the temporary wooden pier upon which passengers land; but questions are still pending, and decisions have still to be taken, as to what would, with a view to a permanent arrangement, be the best situation in which to make that permanent work. Some, like the noble Lord (Lord Naas), would prefer the old packet station; others, connected with another railway communication, would prefer the spot where the new works lie. Now, I can assure the Committee that it is the wish of the Government to do that which, on the whole, will most facilitate communication with Ireland. The matter will be fully considered with that view. We hope, in the mean time, this temporary pier will sufficiently answer the purpose; but we quite mean to carry out the permanent arrangement. The only question is where the permanent work would be best placed, in prolongation of the old pier or on the spot occupied by the new wooden pier.

MR. MONSELL said, he did not think the question of his noble Friend as to what the Government intended to do had been fairly answered. The contract made with the Dublin Steam Packet Company was no better than waste paper. The company had fulfilled all the conditions imposed on them in the most honourable and satisfactory manner, and the Government ought also to fulfil their part of the contract.

MR. GEORGE said, he must enter his protest against the idea that the temporary accommodation was sufficient for the packets, and he should hold the Government responsible for the damage which might arise to the fine vessels of the Dublin Steam Packet Company at the wooden jetty until their part of the contract was fully carried out. The Steam Packet Company had regularly performed their part of the contract, and during the hard frost last winter, when an additional half hour was granted to the railway companies, the time was almost always made up by the steamers. The original scheme for the construction of the eastern breakwater ought to be carried out.

MR. CARDWELL said, that the plan referred to was prepared by the late Mr. Rendall, and was intended to provide accommodation for both Irish and Transatlantic steamers. The latter class of vessels did not use Holyhead Harbour, and doubts were entertained whether so large an amount of accommodation as was contemplated in that plan would be required by the Dublin steamers; indeed, he believed that the Dublin Company themselves were as willing as the Government, if not more willing, that some different arrangement should be made. The wooden pier was not intended to be permanent. Among other reasons it was not sufficiently durable; and if the stone pier was not soon commenced the existing jetty would not last until it was completed. It was the intention of the Government, as soon as the Admiralty had come to a final decision upon the subject, to construct a stone pier. He hoped that the House would at all times treat the communication between England and Ireland as a matter of national concern which was of the highest interest and importance.

MR. BEAMISH said, he thought there ought to have been some declaration on the part of the Government that the works would be proceeded with at once. If it had not been for the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland, the Committee would have been left without any knowledge that a stone-pier would be erected at Holyhead.

MR. BENTINCK denied that he had implied that the harbour at Holyhead, as a harbour of refuge, was a failure. What he had stated was that it might have been constructed at a much smaller cost. A short-sighted and sordid economy had prevented this harbour being made serviceable at night.

MR. H. A. HERBERT said, he would appeal to the Committee to bear him out whether there was not a strong inducement to complain of the conduct of the Government? The Government said they intended to make a pier, and yet could not make up their minds. All the facts stated by him had been admitted by the Secretary to the Treasury. It was, therefore, hardly fair to quote in reply to him the Vote from the Estimates of last year, because it was then said, as it was now, that the Government was doubting. The indecision of the Government, however, with regard to that harbour, was no reason why hon. Members should remain silent. He had from the first contended for the necessity of the improved postal communication between England and Ireland, and had successfully struggled against the opposition of the present Chancellor of the Exchequer; and as long as doubt subsisted in the minds of the Government he should continue to urge them to determine on some decisive course of action.

MR. SLANEY acknowledged the service which had been rendered by Holyhead as a harbour of refuge, and expressed a desire that a harbour should be constructed in Cardigan Bay for the reception of ships which were driven into that bay by westerly winds.

Vote agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £64,558, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expense of Erecting, Repairing, and Maintaining the several Public Buildings in the Department of the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland, to the 31st day of March, 1862."

MR. GREGORY said, he regretted that the conduct of the Royal Dublin Society compelled him to move that the sum of £882 for additions, repairs, and alterations, and £1,500 for erecting a new palm house at the Glasnevin Botanical Gardens, be struck out of the Estimates. The Royal Dublin Society was of considerable antiquity, having been founded exactly 130 years before. As an institution it had been of great utility in Ireland, and so far from wishing to curtail its resources he would desire that it should receive, under more favourable circumstances, a larger grant of public money. The question at issue was this: There were botanical gardens at Glasnevin, which were the property of the public, supported by public grants. In 1791 the House of Commons granted divers sums for the purpose of establishing those gardens, and the Royal Dublin Society was entrusted with the monies for carrying that purpose into effect. Since that time also various Parliamentary grants had been made to the Royal Dublin Society in connection with the gardens. In answer to his Motion it would probably be urged that these were private grounds managed by a private society, but the fact was that, whereas down to the year 1836 the society had received £300,000 from Parliament, the contributions from its members only reached about £20,000, the greater portion of which amount had been consumed in the purchase and furnishing of Leinster House. Since 1854 Parliament had annually voted £6,000 for the society, and additional sums varying from £1,000 to £1,700 were to be found yearly in the Estimates for incidental expenses. The average subscriptions for the last six years were only £1,300, or less than one-seventh of what they received from Parliament. The Select Committee which sat in 1836 laid down the principle that the grants to the Royal Dublin Society were given to them as trustees, and not as absolute proprietors, and since the establishment of the Council of Education the establishment in Dublin was regarded as one of their branch offices. The citizens of Dublin, seeing what was going on at the other side of the water, how, after Divine service on Sundays, Londoners were enabled to enjoy themselves at Kew and Hampton Court, and having the same love of natural beauties and equal capabilities of appreciating them, felt with regard to public gardens towards the maintenance of which they themselves contributed that they ought to be in an equally advantageous position. A great deal of fuss had been made about a petition signed by 6,000 inhabitants of Dublin against opening these gardens on Sunday; but on Tuesday last he presented one signed by no less than 16,500 of the people of that city, including five of the Judges of the land, 900 professional men, and 2,740 voters, praying that they might have the enjoyment of rights similar to those exercised by the people of London in respect of Kew Gardens. The corporation, the trades assembled in common hall, and the police magistrates of Dublin had pronounced in favour of opening those gardens on Sunday; and in such a case the opinion of men who from their experience knew what was likely to have a beneficial effect on the minds of the working classes, ought to receive great attention. A deputation waited on the Lord Lieutenant, and asked him to use his influence with the Dublin Society. His Excellency communicated with the Department of Science and Art; and the papers containing the correspondence on that subject had been laid upon the table of the House. From those documents the Committee would see that every effort had been exhausted by those who held the views which he now advocated in order to induce the Royal Dublin Society to concede what was asked before they resorted to the step of endeavouring to coerce that body by having a portion of their grant taken away from them. He regretted that, owing to all remonstrances having proved unavailing, it was now necessary to take that course in reference to a society which he very much respected. The Committee of Council on Education, in a communication of the 19th of March, stated that they considered that "admission to the gardens should not be limited to members of the Royal Dublin Society, but that they should be open to the general public after the hours of Divine Service." In reply, the secretary stated that in order to so open them, a large increase in the number of the assistants—which it would be perfectly out of the power of the society, with their limited means, to make—would be necessary. He then went on to say that, after a full discussion on two former occasions, a large majority of the members had negatived the proposition. He next, though very lightly, touched on the private character of the question. It was, indeed, private as regarded the pleasure, the convenience, the sentiments, and the consciences of the members of the Royal Dublin Society, but it was very public as regarded the demands of that society on the taxpayers of the country. Mr. Norman M'Leod, in an able reply, informed the secretary that the argument on the ground of additional expense would not hold good; and in illustration instanced the cases of Hampton Court and Kew. The additional expense caused by opening the latter on Sundays was £150 per annum; and as it appeared that out of the 425,314 persons who visited Kew Gardens during the year 1860, no less than 176,983 were Sunday visitors, that additional expense did not amount to £1 per 1,000 persons. The Royal Dublin Society assumed that the opinion of the majority of their members at two several meetings expressed the feelings of the majority of the people at large. That was exactly the argument used by every close corporation. They were always the intelligent portion of the community, and they were only small minorities who ventured to oppose their exclusive proceedings. The Royal Dublin Society observed that the grants voted to them had been small. He thought that assertion was true; but if they wished to gain favour in that House they must adopt a different system from the exclusive one. He would beg of the Committee to remember that the question had nothing whatever to do with the proper and legitimate observance of the Lord's Day. The Dublin Society, as a body, had not treated it as if it had. He was aware that it had been endeavoured to give it that complexion; but the society itself had hardly encouraged that view of the case. A public meeting had been held in Abbey Street, Dublin. He did not know whether it was opened with the Doxology, but a number of clergymen of extreme views were present; and he had no doubt that the whisky interest was well represented. A speech had been delivered by Dr. Gayer against the opening of the gardens on Sunday, in which he stated that the agitation for opening the gardens on that day did not originate with the people; whereas it was the movement of the artisans on the subject that first induced the other classes to take part in it. Dr. Gayer then told the artisan class that they might on Sunday walk along the "shady banks of the canal," or along the length of the "Circular Road." Now he (Mr. Gregory) believed that of all the cities in the empire Dublin was the only city where the artisan class had not an opportunity of seeing a flower from year's end to year's end. Yet, Dr. Gayer told them to go to the "shady banks of the canal" or the Zoological Gardens, which were open on Sundays, and where they could enjoy the sight of the wild animals. He then talked of the opening of the gardens on the Lord's Day leading to drunkenness, to filling the public-houses in the vicinity, and establishing a sort of Donnybrook. He begged to say that a more shameful slander upon the people of Dublin never was uttered. The real supporters of public-houses and of tippling on Sunday were those who would not allow the people to enjoy innocent and profitable recreations, by shutting against them the doors of gardens and other public grounds on Sunday. The testimonies given as to the excellent conduct of the people in Kew Gardens on Sunday, and also the uniform good behaviour of the people at the Zoological Gardens, Dublin, on that day, proved the groundlessness of that objection. Th returns of the summary convictions in Dublin showed that in 1858, out of 18,500 such convictions, only 9,309 were for drunkenness, and that fact proved how little ground there was for believing that they would be guilty of excesses on Sunday in the vicinity of the Royal Society's Gardens. There was a cemetery at Glasnevin, in the neighbourhood of the gardens, and it was alleged that the people would get drunk at the funerals, then proceed to the gardens and destroy the rare flowers and plants which it contained. Not to speak of the unlikelihood of persons getting drunk when they were committing those dearest to them to the tomb, the answer to the allegation was that the funerals were over by twelve o'clock, and it was not proposed to open the gardens till two. Then the objection drawn from the privacy of the gardens had no force. The subscriptions only amounted to £1,300 annually, the rest of the money necessary being made up of public money. As the subscription was only £2 a year, and included admission to the library, and other advantages, he could not help thinking that the subscription was a very good investment. Although the members of the society wished to keep the poor artisan from viewing the garden and flowers on Sunday, yet they visited the garden themselves on that day with their wives, little ones, and friends. So that the whole thing was a mere exclusive pretext to keep out what the members of the society, doubtless, considered the rabble. Then, it was said that there would be such an influx of visitors on Sundays that the gardens would not hold them. The Glasnevin Gardens were of forty-three acres in extent. Now, he ascertained from Sir William Hooker that in one day upwards of 13,500 persons were present in Kew Gardens, which had an area of seventy-six acres. The members of the Royal Dublin Society need not, therefore, be afraid that there would not be room in the gardens for all those who wished to attend. There had been no mischievous agitation on the subject. The memorial for throwing open the gardens on Sunday had been signed by Conservatives as well as Liberals. The prayer of the memorial had been advocated in "another place" by the Earls of Eglinton and Donoughmore, and also by an Irish prelate whose speech reflected the highest credit upon him. He would make two proposals to the society. Let them either give up the gardens to the Board of Works, or admit the public during the same hours as at Kew, charging one penny per head the first year, a halfpenny the second, and admitting the public free afterwards. He trusted that the Government would meet the society with firmness, and that hon. Gentlemen on the Conservative benches would show to the people of Ireland, where they were gaining confidence, that that confidence was not misplaced. He entreated the Committee not to reject, for the sake of humouring the exclusiveness of an oligarchical society, the prayer of 16,000 artisans of Dublin, who asked to refresh their eyes, gladden their hearts, and elevate their tastes by the admiration and enjoyment of the most beautiful works of Nature.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the item of £2,382, for the Royal Dublin Society, be omitted from the proposed Vote."

MR EDWARD GROGAN said, he could not but express his regret that the hon. Gentleman who had just resumed his seat should have addressed the Committee in the tone which he had adopted towards the members of the society. The hon. Gentleman's speech was in truth nothing more than a recapitulation of the printed papers for which he had moved, which had been circulated amongst hon. Members, and which they were as competent to read as he was to speak them. There was, however, this difference between the two modes of becoming acquainted with their contents, that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gregory) had drawn attention to those parts of the papers only which were favourable to his own view, and had kept in the back-ground entirely all that would make in favour of the Royal Dublin Society's view of the question. It was only right that the Committee should know the real facts of the case before they proceeded to give a vote upon the hon. Gentleman's Motion. The Royal Dublin Society was a very old institution, having been founded in 1731. It obtained a Royal charter, and was endowed for many years by the Irish parliament. It consisted of Irish gentlemen, who assembled together for the purpose of promoting agriculture; and such was the state in which the union of the two kingdoms found the society. It was then in receipt of a grant of £15,000. In 1836 the Society passed a resolution repudiating the right of alienating any portion of their property for the private advantage of their members, and admitting that they held their property subject to a public trust. In the year 1854 a long correspondence took place between the Government and the authorities of the society, the Government having it in contemplation to give a grant to the public for purposes of recreation, and they thought it well that it should pass through the hands of the society. The Government, at the same time, gave it as their opinion that greater facilities should be given to the public for admission to the museum, library, and Botanic Gardens. The gardens (said the minute) ought to be opened on every week day, and a similar rule should be extended to the museum and library. The minute added that their Lordships (Board of Trade Department of Science and Art) did not propose to diminish the responsibility of the society in the management of the funds entrusted to it by Parliament. The Minute proceeded—

"My Lords may from time to time request Returns and instruct competent persons to report on the state of the gardens, the museum, and library, but, beyond aiding the society in giving the fullest publicity to its labours, their Lordships will not interfere in its management."

It was upon that understanding that the society agreed to surrender a number of their privileges to the public. The public had the benefit of the change, in consequence of a distinct bargain, but the society remained perfectly independent, and a more straightforward and high-minded body of men could not be found anywhere. There was no sectarian feeling among them at all; and any man, by paying twenty guineas, or, if he preferred it, two guineas a year, could become a member. It was found necessary that everything should be settled on the clearest basis, in order to avoid misconception, and a deputation empowered to make the necessary arrangements came up to London and conferred with the Board of Trade on the matter. One of those gentlemen was Mr. Hamilton, then Member for the University of Dublin, who had various interviews with the present Chief Secretary for Ireland, who was then at the Board of Trade, which then occupied the position in regard to the institution which the Educational Department did at the time he was speaking, and the result of the negotiations was such as he had described, the society exercising its functions entirely free from the control of or responsibility to the Board of Trade. Every one of the propositions of the Government was assented to by the society, and they had studiously fulfilled their part of the engagement. It was, therefore, most unfair on the part of the Government to depart from a positive engagement and introduce a new and unexpected stipulation. The hon. Member for Galway having once represented the city of Dublin ought to have known better than to speak of the members of the society as he did, for a more independent, intelligent, and respectable body of men could not be found. He believed that many gentlemen had joined the society who would not have done so had they contemplated that such an arrangement as was now proposed could have been forced upon them. The hon. Member for Galway disparaged the subscription of members; but how much did the gentlemen of London subscribe to Kew Gardens, the National Gallery, or the British Museum? He did not object to the grant of public money to those institutions, nor had he the slightest wish to diminish it. In the last six years the sum of £660,370 had been voted for the British Museum, and £97,300 for the National Gallery. He mentioned those two institutions because they were somewhat analogous in their character to the Dublin Royal Society, being alike for the benefit of the people. The library of the Dublin Society was extremely well frequented—often, indeed, inconveniently crowded. In addition, in the last six years, £106,520 had been voted for Kew Gardens and pleasure grounds, while, on the other hand, only £35,415 had been in the same period of time voted for the Dublin Society, with its library, museum, and botanic gardens. With regard to the subscriptions from members, he found that in that time they had contributed £21,811, considerably more than half the expense of maintaining the society. As the grant to the society was required for repairs and new works, its withdrawal would be an injury to the public no less than to the society. He could state from his own knowledge that very few of the members visited the gardens on the Sunday. These gardens were a quarter of a mile from the city bounds, and adjoined a large Roman Catholic cemetery. There were also a number of whiskey shops in the neighbourhood, and those who knew how mourning and drinking were sometimes combined in Ireland could judge whether it was desirable that the grounds should be unreservedly thrown open on the Sunday to visitors from such quarters. He had presented a petition from a large body of people in Dublin, to whose religious feelings violence would be done by opening these gardens on the Sunday; and why, he asked, should a different rule be adopted in reference to Ireland than that which had been followed in this country in regard to the British Museum? When it was proposed to open that institution on the Sunday the noble Lord at the head of the Government said that it would have a bad effect on the moral sense of the country if Parliament should appear less careful of the religious feelings of the country than the people themselves. As to the Dublin Society being an exclusive or oligarchical society, he ventured to say that the hon. Member for Galway, notwithstanding his speech that night, would be admitted a member if he offered himself a candidate for that distinction. Some of the first men of the country were at the head of the society, and the question had been deliberately submitted to them, and as deliberately rejected by them. In June, 1858, the question was decided by the society against the opening of the gardens on Sunday, by a majority of 140 against 37. In the subsequent year the question was again brought forward, when the majority against the opening was 129 against 18. In the present year another division was taken on the question, when there were 207 against the opening and 40 in favour of it. He wanted to get a distinct opinion of the House upon the question, because it was better that the country should know at once, if the fact were really so, that the House of Commons no longer thought the observance of the Sabbath desirable. It was better that the country should know at once that the Parliament of this Protestant country did not hesitate to punish the Royal Dublin Society, because they expressed their unwillingness on the grounds stated to open the gardens to the public on Sunday.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, that the observations which had just been addressed to the Committee could not be passed unnoticed by those who felt, as he did, the necessity of opening gardens and places of innocent recreation on the Sunday. He must enter his protest against the assumption of the hon. Member (Sir Edward Grogan) that the Vote they were about to discuss involved in even the remotest degree what was properly called the "Sunday question." Neither could he concur with the hon. Member in thinking that the opening on the Sunday of these grounds near Dublin had any analogy to the opening of the British Museum. The Motion for opening the latter place on the Sunday created great interest in his mind, and for several weeks before it came on he occupied himself in going about on Sundays and endeavouring to obtain some idea as to how many of the humbler classes passed their leisure hours on that holy day; and the Committee would scarcely credit if he were to tell them how extremely small were the places in the shape of gardens which were thronged by artisans, who seemed to be grateful for anything bearing the name of a garden in which they could pass their Sunday. He was connected with a country where more, perhaps, than in any other part of the United Kingdom what was termed Sabbatarianism had taken a deep root, and where the well known story had become a sort of proverb that "You mauna whistle on a Sunday." In that country both the great cities had entered the lists to vie with one another. At Edinburgh all sects joined in this crusade against Sunday recreation; and because gingerbread nuts, or some other slight refreshments, were sold on the Castle Hill, it was proposed that the inhabitants should on a Sunday be prohibited from climbing up the romantic slopes of that hill and gazing from its summit on their beautiful city. At Glasgow the clergymen of all denominations, he regretted to say, banded themselves together to anathematize those who went by the steamboats to view the picturesque scenery as the vessels glided down the broad stream of the Clyde. Now, he asked, what class in this kingdom most needed an opportunity for recreation on the Sunday? The Zoological Society's grounds in Regent's Park was a fashionable promenade on a Sunday; it was crowded by the "Upper Ten Thousand." Was it a sin, then, for poor people who were toiling all the week, and rarely saw the light of Heaven, to seek rest and innocent recreation on the Sunday? He could not think so, while it was not denied to those who had the most of the week to themselves to do so? So with regard to the Crystal Palace, there the last move that had been made was one by which the middle and upper classes, who could afford a yearly subscription of two guineas, were enabled to enjoy the gardens on a Sunday, and even to dine in the Palace itself. As for Richmond and Greenwich, the House needed not to be reminded how they were crowded with the carriages of the aristocracy on the Sunday. But it was said that the case of Glasnevin Gardens was altogether an exceptional case, that these gardens being in the neighbourhood of a Roman Catholic cemetery, and the convivial habits of the Irish people considered the opening might probably lead to riots; but then the petition to which allusion had been made, and which was signed by the present Lord Lieutenant, by the late Lord Lieutenant, and by many magistrates, proved that those to whom the duty of keeping the peace was entrusted feared no such result. He should certainly support the Motion of the hon. Member for Galway, although he regretted the form in which it was presented to the Committee; because, from the high character of the members of the Dublin Society, he should be sorry to give his voice in favour of any Motion which could have the effect of depriving them of their usefulness. He must, however, take the word of the hon. Member for Galway for this, that every other means to effect the desired object had been tried without success, and that the present Motion was the only alternative left him.

MR. BUXTON said, he would suggest that the Motion should be postponed until next year in order to see whether the society would take warning from what had passed. The hon. Baronet who opposed the Motion had no right to say that in voting for it the House of Commons would be declaring against the observance of the Lord's Day. In voting for it he should feel that he was promoting the proper observance of Sunday. He could not conceive that any one could have investigated the Sunday question without coming to the conclusion that the day should be spent, not in worship alone, but in refreshment. [Cries of "Oh!"] Well, he would say, then, in recreation. One of its main purposes was left unfulfilled, unless part of it was so employed. He believed that most thinking persons held that view, but that the temptation was very strong not to utter a sentiment which was sure to call forth violent hostility. It was, however, right not to hush up such opinions, for it would do much for the physical, moral, and even for the religious health of the people, if the heavy bondage regarding the Lord's Day were in due measure relaxed. Moreover, there was something to him almost shocking in the idea of affecting to think the opening of public gardens a desecration of the Sabbath, when they all knew the easy, luxurious, delightful manner in which they never scrupled to spend the day in their own country homes. They all derived infinite enjoyment from their own parks and pleasure grounds; and how, then, when asked to afford pleasures the same in kind, though, unhappily, less in degree, to their hard-worked brethren, could they cast up their eyes and talk about the desecration of the Sabbath? The opposition to such measures of relaxation arose, in many cases, from the purest principle; it arose too often from sheer cowardice. But he was confident that, of whatever faults that House might be guilty, of this fault it would not be guilty—namely, of shamming a superstition which it did not feel.

MR. GEORGE said, it was not his intention to follow at any length hon. Gentlemen on the religious topic which had been so much dwelt upon, believing it to be beyond the real question that was to be decided that night. The Royal Dublin Society had not, he believed, grounded their refusal upon points connected with religion. Neither was it his intention to comment at any length upon the tone or temper of the hon. Gentleman who had raised the question. He (Mr. George), however, could not avoid observing that the Motion came with a very bad grace from the hon. Member for Galway, and that the tone in which he spoke of a great number of gentlemen who were connected with Dr. Gayer in the Dublin Society was scarcely worthy of him. He did not think the Motion was brought forward with candour. The hon. Mover said the Royal Dublin Society had asserted the right of private property as against the Government of the country, when he must have known that they utterly and entirely repudiated any such claim. They admitted that they held the property in trust for the public, and subject to the decision of Parliament. But there was another point. In 1854 a deliberate compact was entered into between the Government and the society that, in consequence of the society handing over to another body certain lectureships, the Government undertook that the gardens should be opened for six days in the week; that they would not interfere in the general management of the gardens by the society; and that they would give up all control of the school of art as soon as it became self-supporting. The Government ought not, therefore, to suspend the operations of the society by putting a stop to the Vote.

MR. CLAY said, he wished to protest against the question before the Committee being treated as a Sunday question. He had been in these gardens, and he had found them three parts full on Sunday with well-dressed people. The question was whether the poorer part of the community should be admitted to the same privilege. The society had been described as extremely harmonious and well regulated. Nothing was so comfortable as to do as one liked, but he trusted the Committee would not allow the society any longer to debar the poorer classes from innocent amusement and recreation. He did not think it desirable that they should wait until next year, unless there was some intimation from the Government that the general wish of the Committee would then be satisfied.

MR. LOWE: Sir, I hope the Committee will be of opinion that the Government have acted in this matter with fairness and moderation. The Committee of Science and Art were asked by the Lord Lieutenant as to what should be done in the matter, and guided by the analogy presented in other cases, they without hesitation expressed the opinion—the view may be right or wrong—that these gardens ought to be opened on Sundays, and that opinion we communicated to the Lord Lieutenant. We received in reply a letter from the Royal Society alleging reasons why the gardens should not be opened, and which appeared to place the question on the ground that the society claimed to itself the privilege of negating such an opinion coming from the Government, taking up, in fact, towards us the position of a private society. Like Hotspur “Yet they did deny their prisoners;” still maintaining that they had a right to receive the public money, and that it would be a breach of faith on the part of the Government to interfere with them in any way. It was under these circumstances that we were waited on by a large deputation of Irish Members, and asked to withdraw the Vote from the consideration of the House. That step we refused to take, because we desired that the society should be afforded a full opportunity of deliberating on the matter calmly. Since then a debate, in which the subject was very ably treated, and in which it was clearly shown, I think, that the society ought to reconsider the course which they appeared to have decided upon adopting, came on in “another place.” I am sorry to say, however, that no impression seems to be made upon them by that discussion, and that it looks as if they were disposed to push matters to the last extremity. The question whether the gardens ought or ought not to be opened on a Sunday is, no doubt, one on which hon. Members generally will be found to entertain different opinions. It is, however, a question on which I have no doubt myself, but I do not, nevertheless, presume to judge for anybody else on the subject. But, be that as it may, there can be no doubt that this society has received £400,000 of the public money, and is in the receipt of money now from two departments of the State to the amount of something like £8,000 a year. [Mr. WHITE-SIDE: £2,000 of that is a casual Vote.] But it is a casual Vote which comes every year. Now, that being so, I cannot help thinking that the society must be held to enjoy the advantages which it possesses cum onere—that is to say, upon the condition that in exchange for so large an amount of public money it should consent to make itself responsible to the Government for the uses to which that money is applied, and that if it can itself conscientiously make use of those gardens on Sunday it might conscientiously permit them to be made use of for the public good. I hope, at all events, that whatever decision the Committee may arrive at with respect to the opening of the gardens—which is after all a minor question—they will be of opinion that it is absolutely necessary that a society of this description should not be allowed to arrogate to itself the right of rendering itself irresponsible to any department of the Government. I may add that as we have hitherto proceeded in the matter with as much of moderation as we could do consistently with the views which we entertained on the subject, it would be well if the Committee would consent to carry that policy one step further. The Vote to which we are now asked to assent is one for hot-houses and other buildings, for which the contract has been no doubt already entered into on the strength of this money being granted by Parliament, and I would therefore suggest that we could not, consistently with good faith, refuse to give a sum of which if we decline to vote it we should not really be depriving the society so much as the contractors to whom I have referred. There will still remain a sum of £6,000 to be granted, and in dealing with that amount the Government will no doubt be willing to pay due regard to the views and wishes of the House. The adoption of this course will afford the society time to consider the question still more fully, and I hope those hon. Gentlemen who may have influence with its members will make use of that time in endeavouring to win them to moderation.

MR. VANCE said, the position of the society rested on the opinion expressed by the Government to the deputation as to the independence of the society and documentary evidence which showed that the society had the power of using the money for any purpose they might think proper, and also on account of the peculiar position of the gardens, which were not of a size to be opened to the public, as were the gardens at Kew. The Royal Dublin Society had been entirely misrepresented. It was not a small society in Dublin, but a society composed of 1,500 of the first and leading gentlemen of Ireland, comprising in their number as many as forty Peers; and when the society had considered the question they had carried their views by majorities of seven to one. He rejoiced to hear that the moderation of the Government would not advise the House to refuse the grant. By the compulsion of a refusal of the grant the gardens would not be opened to the public on Sunday. It would not; for the society would refuse it. He really did not think it necessary to trouble the Committee further.

COLONEL DICKSON said, he thought the hon. Member for Galway had brought the question forward in a very fair and temperate manner, and that the argument raised by his hon. Friends on his side of the House had no grounds at all. He rose for the purpose of impressing upon the Government that they ought for once to come forward and state in a straightforward manner the course they intended to pursue. The hon. Member for Brighton had made a proposition which relieved him (Colonel Dickson) from a difficulty in which he was placed. He was extremely unwilling to oppose the Vote, for this reason among others—that if the Vote were once got rid of they might find some difficulty in getting it back again. He hoped, therefore, that the proposition of the hon. Member for Maidstone (Mr. Buxton) would be acceded to; and that if they got an assurance from the Government that they would not allow the Lord Lieutenant to be made a mere King Log in the matter, his hon. Friend would not press his Motion.

MR. CARDWELL:—I think nothing could be more straightforward and temperate than the statement just made by my right hon. Friend (Mr. Lowe), in whose department this Vote lies. I have, I may add, the greatest respect for the members of the Royal Dublin Society, with whom in 1854 I had the privilege of communicating, when President of the Board of Trade, with respect to the extension of their grant. That extension was accorded to them, and the record of what passed on the occasion is contained in a paper which I now hold in my hand. The arrangement then entered into was that with regard to certain departments the Board of Trade should possess a direct superintendence, but that with respect to those matters of high art and general agricultural improvement to which this excellent society devoted its useful labours the intervention of the Government should not be exercised. Now, nothing in that arrangement, so far as my memory serves me, touches at all upon the question of the opening of the gardens on Sunday. And, at all events, acting as the representative of the Government at the time, I did not presume even to imply that the House of Commons should not retain a perfect control over the distribution of the money which it granted, while the members of the society themselves, in a letter which they wrote on the subject, admitted the authority of Parliament to deal with their affairs so far as certain modifications of the rules of the several departments of their institution were concerned. I have no hesitation in saying, in answer to the appeal of the hon. and gallant Officer (Colonel Dickson), that, as at present advised, I hold it to be the desire of the House that the sum annually voted to the Royal Dublin Society shall be voted on the condition that in its application to useful purposes the opinion of this House, as expressed through the department which is responsible to Parliament for the Vote, shall be treated with respect and obedience. I believe, too, that what is generally called the Sunday question is not involved in this proposition. It is not possible for us who go to the Zoological Society's Gardens, and who avail ourselves of the new privileges of the Horticultural Society on Sundays, to say that the Sunday question is involved, nor do I think it is wise of the fellows of the Royal Dublin Society to maintain that it is involved, seeing that they avail themselves of the privilege of the gardens on that day. I earnestly hope that excellent society will see the propriety of conforming to the wish of Parliament. I think the hon. Member for Galway has exercised a wise discretion in raising the question on this first Vote, because it gives time to the society for further consideration; but I hope he will not object to the particular items of this Vote, for the expenditure has been sanctioned by former Estimates, and it would be wrong to withhold from contractors and workmen payments for which the faith of Parliament was believed to be pledged. On the Educational Estimate the Vote for the Royal Dublin Society will be brought forward, and it is not the intention of the Government to sanction the distribution of the Vote through the Royal Dublin Society, except on the clear understanding that they will submit to the will of the House of Commons in its distribution, which will the Government believe to be that the gardens shall be opened on Sundays, under such reasonable arrangements as may be made by the society.

MR. WHITESIDE: I wish the House to understand clearly what the Royal Dublin Society is. Long before the Union it received a much larger grant from the Irish Parliament than is now given to it. Every scientific man in Ireland is a member of it, and since I was a child I remember that no good thing in science, art, or agriculture was promoted in Ireland except through the instrumentality of this society. I have received a letter from a gentleman who is a member of that society, and who holds the same views on this question as the right hon. Gentleman opposite. He tells me that he was anxious that the gardens should be opened, but that when he looked round him at the meeting he found opposed to him every man who for the last half century had advocated in the city of Dublin every question which was of the slightest utility to the people. ["No, no!"] Crying "No" is not an argument; the hon. Member had much better stand up and speak like a rational man. There is just this difference between him and me—I represent the University of Dublin, and I know who are the members of this society. I know that men of all persuasions and all politics belong to this society, which it is in your power to break up by agreeing to the proposition to which the Motion of the hon. Member for Galway may lean; for I tell you plainly that these gentlemen will not yield their convictions to yours, and if you command them to open their museums and the whole of their establishments on Sunday they will refuse. I do not deny that you have the right to take the grant away from this society and intrust its distribution to other hands—to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, for instance; but he will not find three men of the same class in Dublin to carry out his views. You must remember that you are dealing with a body of educated and intelligent men, who for the last sixty years have done more for the cause of agriculture and science than any other body of men in Ireland. Until the last six months you had not an art gallery in Dublin, but the gentlemen of this society subscribed their money and got one up. When the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford was President of the Board of Trade he was very far from saying what he has said to-night. This is what he wrote then—

“Their Lordships observe with satisfaction that, in contemplation of the supplementary grant for the gardens which will be included in this year's Vote, the Committee of Botany have recommended that the gardens should be open every week day, and my Lords consider that a similar rule should be extended to the museums and library.”

That has been done, and every suggestion made by the Board of Trade has been carried out literally, and now you call on them to open their gardens on the Sabbath, to which they object. You may make that demand on pain of withholding the grant. You have the power to break up the society by your votes, but I tell you that the manner in which you propose to treat the society will add considerably to the unpopularity of Her Majesty's present Administration in Ireland. That society embraces all the scientific men in Dublin. Does the hon. Member for Galway, who as former Member for Dublin, knows something of the feeling there suppose that he would be able to get up another society in Dublin against the opinion of the large body of gentlemen who now constitute this society? He could not do it if he were to call a public meeting to-morrow. These botanical gardens are very small, and they are filled with plants for the instruction and information of those who study botany. They are not places into which a great body of people could be admitted with convenience, and if you open them on Sundays you entail great additional expense on the society, for they must employ another set of attendants for Sundays, as those who are at present employed are entitled to their holyday on that day. It has been open from morning to night on every week day since the Board of Trade called upon the society to open it. I can only say that in withdrawing this grant you will withdraw it from the most useful body which exists in the sister kingdom.

Mr. MONSELL said, that after the declaration of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland, he would recommend his hon. Friend not to divide the Committee on that occasion. He did not imagine that the Dublin Society, for the sake of preventing the poor artizans of Dublin from enjoying that which the artizans of London could enjoy every Sunday at Kew, and for the sake, perhaps, of securing the exclusive enjoyment of the Glasnevin Gardens on that day for themselves and their families, would persist in their intention to close the gardens on the Sunday when they knew the feeling of the Government and the House on the subject. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Whiteside) had spoken very contemptuously of those who had advocated the opening of the gardens. Amongst them were five judges, twelve assistant barristers, and 900 professional men. He (Mr. Monsell) repeated he had no doubt that very shortly Glasnevin would be open on the Sunday the same as Kew was.

Mr. LEFROY deeply regretted that the hon. Member for Galway should have approached this subject in the tone he had adopted, and could not but think that the course he had pursued was most ungracious towards many of his old constituents. He would not enter into the Sabbath question further than to say that it was a great mistake to say that because these gardens were closed on Sunday the people were deprived of recreation, for the fact was these gardens covered but a very small portion of ground and were close to a large park more suited for public walks. The real question was, if a large number of the members of the Dublin Society had a conscientious objection to opening these gardens on the Sunday, were those objections to be disregarded and overruled by mere official authority, although supported by those who might agree in opinion with the hon. Member for Galway. For himself (Mr. Lefroy) he must protest against such a course.

Mr. GREGORY denied that he had spoken in any harsh manner of the Dublin Society. He admired their usefulness, while he deplored their exclusiveness, and firmly believed that the society was composed of men more prudent and less hot-headed than seemed to be supposed. He would accede to the request of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, because he felt satisfied that the society would be guided by the opinion expressed in Parliament, so that it would be unnecessary for him to take the invidious course of striking off any portion of their grant. Relying, therefore, on the distinct understanding that the Government would not bring forward the annual grant for the Dublin Society until they were satisfied that the society would open the gardens to the public on Sundays, he would not press his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he wished to call the attention of the Committee to the fact that there were Votes amounting to £60,000 for building schools in Ireland. There was no such Vote for England.

Vote agreed to, as were also,

(14.) £2,628, Kingstown Harbour.

(15.) £5,000, Sheriff Court Houses, Scotland.

(16.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £32,600, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expense of erecting and maintaining certain Lighthouses Abroad, to the 31st day of March, 1862.”

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH complained that the country was called upon to defray the expense of lighthouses at the Ionian Islands, Western Australia, Ceylon, and other places, and moved the reduction of the Vote by £22,400.

MR. CHILDERS said, he wished to ask how it came that the Committee were asked to vote £8,000 for a light to the Bass Rocks at Ceylon? Those rocks did not lie in the course of trading or colonial vessels, but in that of the steamers of the Peninsular and Oriental Company. He did not dispute the propriety of placing a light there, but he thought the revenues of India should bear one half of the cost. It was proposed to substitute floating for fixed lights. Now, floating lights would be far more expensive than fixed lights, and on that ground alone the latter ought to be preferred. The lighthouse at Western Australia was required solely for the mail service, but the lighthouse at British Columbia was purely for colonial purposes, and no good reason could be shown for the Imperial revenues being charged with its maintenance. He also wished to know what had become of the £20,000 which had already been voted by Parliament for lights on Bass's Rocks?

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that no country in the world had so great an interest as England in having the coasts of its colonies well lighted. It was, no doubt, desirable that the colonies should contribute towards lighthouses which were, to a certain extent, beneficial to themselves; but it did not follow that because a lighthouse was erected on an island it was erected for the local interests of that island. Generally, indeed, it was erected upon some point with a view to guide passing ships, and, therefore, for the interest of the empire at large. England was interested in the commerce of the world, and she ought not to grudge the expense of erecting proper lighthouses in every part of her dominions. Half the cost of the lighthouses at British Columbia was paid by the colonists, and it might be a question whether other colonists should not be asked to contribute to similar objects. He could state, upon the most competent authority, that floating lights would be more serviceable at Bass's Rocks, and would not be so expensive as a fixed lighthouse. Orders had been sent to Bombay for the construction of a lightship for Bass's Rocks, and another would be built as soon as it was ascertained that the first had been successful.

MR. CHILDERS said, the right hon. Gentleman had not stated what had become of the £20,000 already voted for a lighthouse on Bass's Rocks.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he was afraid that a great deal of the money had not been well expended. [MR. CHILDERS: Has it been expended at all?] He believed so; but to give an account of former unsuccessful efforts to light Bass's Rocks would be to tell a very long and a very painful story, and he was afraid the Committee would not be much edified by the narrative.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he thought the explanation a very lame one. Why should not the charge in reference to Ceylon be paid for out of the colonial revenue, which exceeded the expenditure? He did not see why the House should pay the charge also in reference to the Ionian Islands.

MR. ADDERLEY said, he was also of opinion that the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman, the President of the Board of Trade was unsatisfactory. It suggested a very important question, which must sooner or later be pressed upon the attention of Parliament, namely, whether the colonies should be exonerated from the payment of any part of the expenditure incurred for the general interests of the empire. It was all very well to say that England was interested in the commerce of the world, but that general proposition could not be accepted as a defence of an Estimate which called upon the mother country to pay the whole expenses of lighthouses erected in the colonial possessions of the Crown. It was time to consider what would be the consequence of England taking such an expenditure on itself.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, the Estimates for the lighthouses in the Bahamas, the Ionian Islands, and Western Australia were the usual Votes passed in each Session. There were two lights at the Bahamas for which this country must pay, as there was no other means for raising the funds. Whether it was a general proposition or not, it was the duty of England to vote this expenditure.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, the Votes specified might not be a novelty but they had nearly doubled in amount. British Columbia, a poor colony, was to repay half the cost of its lighthouses, while Ceylon, a rich settlement, was to pay nothing. What had been done with this £20,000, and why all the expense was to come out of Imperial funds had been very imperfectly explained.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he could give further explanation if the Committee wished; but it would be difficult to go into all the details.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he thought Ceylon should pay for lighting its own coasts, as also should the Ionian Islands. Colonial expenditure should, in those cases where it was sufficient, be applied to these purposes.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, if all the expenditure were for the benefit of the colony itself, the colony, no doubt, should pay; but the expense for lighthouses was for the benefit of our own commerce frequenting those seas. It was an Imperial purpose. The same rule applied to Ceylon.

MR. WHITE insisted that in the case of the colony of Victoria local interests were almost exclusively benefitted by the lighthouses.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that the lighthouses on the coast of Ceylon were erected for the purposes of British trade generally, and not for the benefit of that colony, which was not a maritime country.

MR. CHILDERS thought the local charges ought to be borne by the colony.

MR. G. W. HOPE maintained that the interests involved were general interests. Colonies would not consent to light the great highways of the ocean.

MR. ADDERLEY could not recognize the justice of the principle of taxing British taxpayers for purposes of mixed Imperial and colonial utility.

Motion made, and Question,

“That a sum, not exceeding £10,200, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expense of erecting and maintaining certain Lighthouses Abroad, to the 31st day of March, 1862,”

—put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

MR. W. WILLIAMS moved that the Chairman report Progress.

Motion made, and Question, “That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,” put, and negatived.

(17.) £5,000, Highland Roads and Bridges.

MR. WHITE said, he objected to the Vote as one that was quite uncalled for in the present time. The grant had existed since the Rebellion in 1745; but, as that part of the country for which this money was asked had enormously increased in wealth, he thought it was time to discontinue the grant, and he should, therefore, move its omission.

MR. PEEL said, he was obliged to propose the Vote because the Highland Commissioners were appointed under an Act of Parliament passed at the beginning of the present century. The duty was cast upon those commissioners of keeping the roads in repair, upon the understanding that they were to receive an annual Parliamentary grant. This was only a grant in aid, as the commissioners had power to assess the owners of property to meet the expense.

MR. COLLINS said, he hoped the Committee would negative the Vote unless the Government gave a promise that next year they would bring in a Bill to repeal the Act on which it was founded.

Motion made, and Question put,

“That a sum, not exceeding £5,000, be granted to Her Majesty, on account of the Commissioners of Highland Roads and Bridges, to the 31st day of March, 1862.”

The Committee divided:—Ayes 72; Noes 59: Majority 13.

Vote agreed to.

(18.) £35,000, Rates for Government Property.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH asked, why the parish of Aldershot, which had as good a claim as the other places that now shared in the grant, was not allowed to participate in it?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the principle adopted was to confine the allowance to places in which there were naval and military establishments bearing a considerable proportion to the whole rateable property of the parish, and if it could be shown that the property at Aldershot in the occupation of the War Department came within that principle, the Government would not refuse to consider the case in a future year.

EAST INDIA (CIVIL SERVICE) BILL.

CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that since the Bill was last under discussion, he had carefully considered the great number of statements and suggestions which had been made, and he had come to the conclusion that it was possible to put the Bill, with no great alteration, in a shape which would be much more satisfactory to the Civil Service of India. The principle of the Bill they were all agreed upon. They were agreed that all appointments which had been made should be legalized, that similar appointments might from time to time be made, and that to situations hitherto exclusively held by covenanted servants, other persons under special circumstances might be appointed ; the only question arose as to whether certain restrictions should be placed in the Act. He had thought it better to leave them out of the Act in consequence of the effect of the legal opinion given by the law officers of the Crown. But he now thought, upon the whole, it might be better to put these in the Bill, confining them to certain offices he proposed to specify. He had had the honour of receiving yesterday morning a considerable number of Members of Parliament who took part in the discussion, and also a select deputation from the Civil Service, and after a full discussion he had agreed on certain alterations in the Bill which met their entire concurrence. He could not help expressing the satisfaction he had in the interview to which he referred with the gentlemen who thought their interests might be affected by the Bill. He was bound to say they had come forward in the most handsome and gallant manner, and the alterations which would be made would at once meet their views and secure the real objects of the Bill. He had now, therefore, to propose that the Bill should be recommitted, with the view of introducing the Amendments.

MR. VANSITTART said, he felt that in justice to the right hon. Baronet he was bound to state that the Committee sitting in London on behalf of their brother civilians had waited upon him, accompanied by several hon. Members of that House, and that the right hon. Gentleman received them with the greatest consideration and courtesy, and consented to introduce such alterations and concessions in his amended Bill as met with their full approbation, and, he might add, merited their gratitude. That being the case, he, in common with those hon. Members who were present at the meeting, deemed it a duty not only to withdraw all opposition to the Bill; but to use such influence as he might possess with other hon. Members to afford the right hon. Baronet every facility for passing it rapidly, and without further debate, through the House. He begged also on his own part to tender his heartfelt thanks to the right hon. Baronet for the very kind attention he had paid to the representations of the covenanted Civil Service.

INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS BILL.

CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill, as amended, be now taken into Consideration."

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he could only characterize the Bill as worthy of the meridian of Paris and Berlin, and stated that it conferred upon the police an entirely new power. The 9th Clause gave a power to a single justice to send a child to an industrial school, and imprisoning him there for eight years. One of the offences for which such a sentence could be passed was that of begging, which at present was punished by an imprisonment of three months only. Another was that of frequenting the company of reputed thieves, and the proof of that offence having been committed was to depend upon the information of "any" person. He considered that an arbitrary power of inflicting extremely severe punishment without the offence having been proved. He would, therefore, move that the consideration of the Bill should be deferred until that day three months.

Amendment proposed,

"To leave out from the words 'That the' to the end of the Question, in order to add the words 'further Consideration of the Bill, as amended, be adjourned till this day three months,'"—instead thereof.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that all the arguments used by the noble Lord had been repeated half a dozen times before. There was no new principle in the Bill. It was only a development of the existing law, was promoted by persons of the most philanthropic views, and was intended, not for the punishment but for the advantage of the children who were made subject to it. He hoped that after the full examination which the Bill had undergone it would be allowed to pass this stage.

MR. PEASE said, he thought that the Bill was unnecessarily harsh in some of its provisions, but that, upon the whole, it would be received with satisfaction by the country.

MR. WHALLEY said, that the money advanced to Reformatory Schools by the Government was being diverted to the promotion of Roman Catholic objects. There was, in his opinion, no necessity for this Bill.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

MR. HENNESSY said, he would move the omission of the words in Clause 9, which subjected to the provisions of the Act children frequenting the company of reputed thieves.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that the point had been fully discussed in Committee, and he hoped that the words would be retained.

Amendment negatived.

Bill to be read 3^o To-morrow.

APPROPRIATION OF SEATS BILL. COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Bill passed through Committee.

MR. COLLINS gave notice that on the third reading of the Bill he should move that it be recommitted, in order to decide between the merits of Pontefract and Sheffield as a polling place.

MR. HADFIELD hoped the next stage of the Bill would be fixed for Thursday to give him time to communicate with his constituents.

MR. COLLINS said, if the Bill did not pass through the House of Lords before the 31st of July its operation would be a nullity as regarded Birkenhead, where the revision would shortly commence. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would fix the next stage for Monday next.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS intimated his intention of proceeding with the Bill on Monday.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered on Monday next.

THE CRIMINAL LAW CONSOLIDATION BILLS.—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD BROUGHAM, on the presentation (by command) of the "Judicial Statistics, 1860," took occasion to refer to the Criminal Law Consolidation Bills, and said, that the conduct of the House of Commons on this subject was highly to be approved. There was but one mode of making a digest of the law and that was to repose confidence in the learned and skilful persons who were employed by the Government or the Parliament to prepare it, and to adopt their work, after due consideration in Select Committees, with as little discussion as possible in the two Houses. That was the wise course pursued by the House of Commons with regard to the important Bills for the consolidation of the Criminal Law. The last time his lamented Friend the late Lord Chancellor addressed the House was in moving that these Bills be read a first time, when he congratulated the House and the country on the judicious conduct of the Commons, and expressed a hope that it would be imitated by their Lordships.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the Bills for the consolidation of the Criminal Law to which his noble and learned Friend referred received very careful consideration from their Lordships in a former Session, and that the country was greatly indebted to their Lordships for the care and skill with which the Bills were framed. They were introduced into the House of Commons during the present Session, and were referred to a Select Committee. He was very happy to say that the Bills as amended by their Lordships had been passed by the Select Committee with very trifling, if any, alteration. Four of them had been read a third time and passed by the House of Commons, and were now on their Lordship's table. In regard to the fifth Bill—that on Offences against the Person, a question had been raised whether conspiracy to murder should be held to be a felony, a capital felony, or a misdemeanour. In consequence of the change of the law officers that question had not yet been decided. His hon. and learned Friend the present Attorney General had promised him that, on his return to the House, he would bring forward that Bill on an early day. He hoped it would pass speedily through the House of Commons, and as soon as it came to their Lordships' House he would lose no time in calling their attention to it.

LORD BROUGHAM said, he hoped their Lordships would follow the example of the House of Commons, and pass these important Bills as speedily as possible.

INDIA—IRRIGATION AND INTERNAL NAVIGATION.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY:* My Lords, it will be necessary for me to bespeak the indulgence of your Lordships, and to request your consideration of the subject which I have now the honour to bring before you. It is a subject which has been discussed a good deal lately in writing and at public meetings; and I should not have ventured to direct your Lordships' attention to it had it not been for two recent events of supreme importance. I refer to the famine which has desolated so large a part of India, and the Revolution which has broken out in the United States of America. The famine proves unmistakably the defect of irrigation, and the Revolution shows the great hazard to which we are exposed in depending almost entirely on a single source for the supply of cotton. It is not my intention here to put India in the place of America, and to say that we might safely be dependent on India alone for our cotton supply; I indicate it only as one great source. The subject, confessedly, is worthy of serious reflection, inasmuch as from four to five million mouths (workpeople and their families) throughout the country look for their daily bread to a constant supply of that article; and, therefore, while recognizing West African and Australian sources for a portion of our supply, we may for present purposes confine our consideration to what may be produced by the territory of India. Neither is it my wish to enter upon the inquiry whether the famine might have been prevented, or the short supply of cotton foreseen. The fact is the evils are before us, and we have to deliberate what can be done to avert the recurrence of such formidable mischiefs.

The two great requisites of India are irrigation and inland navigation—irrigation for the purpose of fertilizing the soil, and inland navigation for the purpose of carrying away the produce. In India we want canals for traffic as well as fertility; for unless the ryot has a pretty good assurance that he can easily transport the crop to a place of sale, he will not cultivate the soil; and it has often happened that, lacking the means of transport, a great abundance has been to him a burden rather than a benefit. Here let me remark that in any proposition we may make for the purpose of extending inland navigation we are not, directly or indirectly, acting in antagonism to the railways. Railways must subsist in India; and it is certain that the more you improve the country and increase the wealth of the people the better will be the prospect of the railways. But, whether the railways be remunerative or not, we may fairly say of them that the great development of Indian resources has been coincident with the expenditure on the works, and the partial opening of those undertakings.

Now, India is particularly adapted to the purposes of irrigation. Not only is there a vast quantity of water both for flow and for store, but the conformation of the country offers but few engineering obstacles. An irrigation system has prevailed for many centuries in India. It was undertaken upon a large scale by the Native Princes. They have set an example which we ought to follow. They have laid down the true principles upon which to provide for the necessities of the country; and it is for us, with our greater scientific knowledge, to carry those principles into effect. No one can doubt the extent of the irrigation system who has read an extract from Reports on Public Works at Madras in 1853—

“The mere mention of the number of works (i.e. works executed under Native Princes) would give no just idea respecting them, as they vary so greatly in size and value, but we may notice tanks and channels in fourteen of the chief Ryotwar irrigated districts. They number 43,000 in repair and 10,000 out of repair. The estimated amount of capital invested in their construction is fifteen millions sterling.”

The reporters go on to make this strong and just observation—

“An examination of this list of works suggests humiliating reflections. The ancient rulers of the country, with resources of science and skill immeasurably inferior to what we can command, raised those numberless magnificent and valuable works. . . . They are due to the enlightened intelligence of Princes whom we are accustomed to style barbarians.”

Surely it is our duty—in possession, as we are, of far greater scientific knowledge and far greater means of executing such works than the Native Princes—surely it is our duty to the vast country over which we have assumed dominion, to do everything in our power to carry into effect whatever will conduce to the general welfare of the population. Does any one now doubt the value of irrigation? All objections to it were admirably disposed of in the Report of the Commissioners. Let any gainsayer consider the great deficiency of water at times, the character of the soil, and the words of Dr. Watson, asserting that not only water, but river-water is indispensable; and the value of irrigation in India cannot be questioned. In his admirable lecture on cotton in India, Dr. Watson says—

“Irrigation is essential, not merely as bringing water, but also organic matter, and certain, though small, quantities of salts, such as gypsum and common salt.”

A new but unanswerable argument in favour of such works. My Lords, they suffer in India as much from excess as from deficiency of water—as much from deluges as from droughts; and, therefore, a great part of the irrigation must be by constructing, according to the system of the Native Princes, large tanks in which the excess of water during a period of fall is stored, and is dealt out by distributing-channels in periods of drought; and, moreover, dealt out in sufficient quantities to render rivers and large canals navigable which in time of drought would otherwise be pretty nearly, if not altogether, dried up. In this way, I am told, water may be so distributed as to keep, not only the surface of India in a constant state of irrigation, but the canals also, and rivers, navigable by boats. It is by the use of their internal waters that the Americans have made those rapid strides which are the wonder of the present generation; but we have advantages in India which the Americans do not possess. By the distribution to which I have alluded—by storing the water in tanks, and by pouring it out at proper times—we may render the rivers of India navigable during twelve months in the year, whereas in America the rivers, being exposed to hard frosts, are, generally speaking, not navigable for more than nine months out of the twelve. Inland navigation, moreover, is peculiarly necessary and peculiarly adapted to India. The water-courses are most easy to arrange or construct. The canals may be easily and cheaply kept in repair. They are best adapted to carry heavy burdens at a low cost, and yet insure a return of the largest possible revenue upon the cost of their construction.

Now, having all these advantages, what is the use which has been made of them by various successive Governments? This Report on Public Works states—

“In general it may be affirmed that the greater part of the flood waters of our rivers are turned to no account, and vast bodies of water flow annually to the sea which might be made use of to fertilize hundreds of thousands of acres, to feed a vast population, and to add enormously both to the wealth of the people and the revenue of the Government.”

In speaking of the canals, the reporters say—and the remark, though made in reference to the Native Princes, is equally applicable to the British Government—

“Still less use was made of the canals of irrigation, though many of them were well adapted for water-carriage during six or eight months of the year.”

We will say nothing just now on the almost equal neglect, for many years at least, of roads and highways. But ought we not to direct our attention more especially to these important matters of irrigation and canals, when we know that it is from the deficiency or excess of water in one way or other that has arisen the greater part of the evils which have afflicted India—its famines, its pestilences, its fevers, and all the consequent sufferings? It is impossible to have a stronger proof of this than in what has taken place in respect to the great Ganges Canal, which runs through a country particularly in need of the agency of water. When it was constructed it was left unfinished; the distributing channels were not connected with it, and it did not, therefore, perform all the purposes for which it was intended. There is no man living who has more to complain of than that great engineer, Sir Proby Cautley. He was the engineer of that work, and he achieved a considerable part of it, but a material part was left uncompleted; and the consequence was that the Ganges Canal for a considerable time was always quoted as a proof of failure and a strong argument against the introduction into India of the canal system. But what is the present state of things? Let us see what its effect has been even in its incomplete state, and while deficient in distributing channels. P. Moss, Esq., the Assistant Secretary to the Government of the North-West Provinces, says—

What then, my Lords, would have been its results had the full design been wrought out?

And Captain Turnbull, the Superintendent General of Irrigation, states—

“Had there been no canal there would have been no crop on broad lands which are now covered with wheat and other cereals in large abundance.”

Observe, too, this remarkable calculation made by Captain Turnbull—

“According to a rough calculation 339,243,840 lb. of grain have thus been supplied to the market during the recent calamitous season, and, as each pound is an ample quantity for one man daily, or, perhaps, one woman and one child daily, this would be equal to the maintenance of 644,718 men, 464,718 women and children for a whole year; while it will also have produced fodder sufficient to keep from starvation the cattle of the districts through which the canal has passed, and has probably saved the Government from making remissions of land revenue to the amount of £180,000 or £200,000.”

He adds, as well he may—

“It cannot fail to produce a very great impression on the minds of the people who will thus have been saved from starvation and misery, and to make them happy and contented.”

How, then, after this, can we wonder that the Secretary should close with—

“His honour feels sure that it will be both policy and good economy to push on this magnificent work to completion with the utmost vigour, even though at the risk of some present financial inconvenience.”

Now consider what an extent of country needing a supply of water has been saved by this work, and you may see what would have been its position without it, by looking to what is the state of those lands which are beyond the reach of the system. Look on the other hand to districts afflicted, in times past, by the other extreme. Take the delta of the Godavery. This formerly was deluged by floods, but now, by the works carried on there, it has become a habitable, profitable, and safe country. But the greatest triumph of all that may be achieved by irrigation, and by opening canals, is to be found in the district of Rajamundry, the wonderful work of Sir A. Cotton. I beg your Lordships to listen to these results, and see how a small expenditure will produce mighty benefits, and in a short space of time too, and how it is that the most remunerative economy at the present moment is to lay out—I will not say a large sum, but even a small sum, to realise these enormous profits. The revenue of this district of Rajamundry has increased within the last year £45,000; the exports in 1860 were £500,000, being an increase of £180,000 over the previous year. The bullion imported by the people, now becoming quite a commercial people, but who were formerly among the most abject and impoverished of India, amounted to £190,000. The total increase of the revenue is £175,000, being an increase since the works began of no less than 90 per cent, and the profit on the expenditure has been 40 per cent, which is mainly attributable to the works. Pray, give particular attention to the benefits which have been derived from the works on the canal, and you will see that, while in 1852-3 the number of boats passing down to the seaports was no more than 752, in 1860, a period of eight years only, it had risen to 15,000; and the tonnage of the boats has on an average been fully double. Not having any personal experience of India, it is not possible for me to describe adequately the benefits which this canal has conferred on that district; but I have heard from persons who lived there that it has been tantamount to its regeneration. But your Lordships may, to some extent, judge of them when you consider that it was formerly a district traversed by muddy streams and narrow channels altogether impassable, and that it is now traversed by this great canal, over which pass no less than 15,000 boats in the course of the year. A letter which has just been received contains a most remarkable statement as to the advantages which these works have conferred on Rajamundry. The writer says, speaking, in the first place, of another district—

"Nothing is more probable than that this tract of country may this very year be visited with famine for want of those works. As it is, even at this moment a great part of the Madras Presidency is on the very verge of famine; rice is selling at 1d. a pound—from two to three times its ordinary price, indicating most terrible sufferings among the poor. In Rajamundry, on the other hand—now observe this—where irrigation works are in operation, the price is just half what it is in other districts, and, while the people are entirely free from all such pressure, they are exporting probably more than 80,000 tons this year to relieve the suffering provinces."

So that your Lordships will see that under the operation of these irrigation works Rajamundry, which was formerly one of the most desolate and miserable districts, has not only become as wealthy as I have described, but is actually exporting produce to other provinces. What a proof is here of the value of easy communication! See the important advantage of this canal, that it brings food tolerably within the reach of the people. Formerly, in some cases they would have to travel from 300 to 400 miles in search of food, where now it is brought almost to their own doors.

There are not wanting other strong proofs of the value of these works, and of the necessity imposed on the Government of India of doing all that in them lies to promote undertakings which so materially advance the welfare of the people of India. In the Appendix Z to the papers of 1853 there is a very striking and suggestive statement of the result of expenditure on irrigation works in the fourteen years from 1836 to 1849. Within those years the works were carried on in thirty-nine places; on one point the profit was 77 per cent, on another 91 per cent, on another 197 per cent, on another 259 per cent; but the average profit on the whole, taking bad and good together, was 69½ per cent; and I am told that if the results were brought down to the present time they would give a still larger return. On the other hand, let us see what has been the effect of neglect and omission; and first let me call your attention to the famine which took place some years ago in Guntoor, which lies on the south bank of the Kistnah river, and has an area of 4,700 square miles. In the report on the state of that district we read—

"The large number of ruined tanks in all parts of the country indicate that formerly the extent of irrigated land was considerable; at present it is only 4 per cent of the total cultivation."

Here is a country, which had formerly enjoyed the advantages of a system of irrigation. It has suffered fearfully, the tanks having been allowed to fall into disrepair, probably under the Native Princes, but which were not restored when the British Government obtained possession of the territory. The number of ruined tanks, however, shows what the Native Princes had done, and what they, after the experience of centuries, considered necessary for the welfare of the country. The famine broke out, and vast numbers of persons migrated in search of food. No fewer than 200,000 perished by starvation and fever; and the total loss to the Zemindars, Ryots, and the Government, was estimated at above £2,250,000; all of which might have been prevented by a little providence and the expenditure, at the right time, of not a fourth part of this sum. But what is the condition of Guntoor at this moment? Mr. Bourdillon—whom everybody acquainted with India must know as a gentleman most capable of giving information on this matter—was asked as to the present state of Guntoor. He replies—

"The works on the Kistnah were suspended by the mutiny, and works of distribution very partially executed."

Nevertheless, see what his reply is as to the present state of Guntoor—

"You ask whether Guntoor is more safe from famine than it used to be. No doubt it is, and why? My Lords, because two talooks—that is villages or districts—are partially watered from the Kistnah. The dams are complete," he says, "but the channels for them are wanting, though the cost would be small, and the addition to the revenue immediate."

The cost small, the return large and immediate! Are such truths to pass unheeded by the governing Powers? This work is not completed; nevertheless Mr. Bourdillon says that by the irrigation of these districts the production has been so raised as to be not only sufficient for the people themselves, but enabling them in some measure to supply their neighbours. Instances to show the necessity of attending to the distribution of water for the prevention of floods are equally numerous and striking. In Cuttack alone, by neglect in this matter, there were, during a period of twenty-three years, seven years of inundation, and two of very severe inundation; and in 1855, in the Muddea district alone, forming but a small part of the Delta of the Ganges, a single flood destroyed no less than 22,000 houses, 8,000 persons, 40,000 cattle, and 20,000 acres of crops, worth at the very least £320,000—all preventible!

I come now to the Godavery, to which it is right that your Lordships should give more than ordinary attention. The full navigation of the Godavery would open, perhaps, the finest cotton district in the whole world. "The valley of the Godavery"—this is the report of Captain Haigh—"has an area of 130,000 square miles, or about four times as large as Ireland." The population of the valley is estimated at eight millions, and this valley alone contains a cotton field larger than that of America: America having but four million acres under cultivation—an area not much larger than that of Yorkshire. The products of this district are various and abundant. There is wheat unsurpassed by any in India in quantity and quality; Indian corn, millet, peas, beans, rice, sugar, hemp, oil, seeds, chilies, safflower. But there are two products of especial value at the present time—I mean flax and cotton—to which I will return by and by. Yet this mighty country, capable of such immense products, and of meeting almost every demand which could be made by Great Britain, is pretty nearly locked up by defective means of transit, and through the want of canals, of railways, and of every means for the easy conveyance of goods. What a discouragement this is to production may be conjectured from the fact that the time occupied in the conveyance to Bombay or Calcutta of goods on the backs of bullocks—which is the only mode of conveying the products of the country to different ports—is two months. I need hardly say that when goods are conveyed on the backs of bullocks, they are exposed to great hazards, being subject to the influences of weather, to bad roads, and, perhaps, to be plunged into the rivers which it is necessary to cross; and thus the quality of the article is much deteriorated, while the cost per ton upon the cotton or the flax would be about 160s. How splendid an opening would be secured by the improvement in the navigation of the Godavery may be judged of from the description given by an engineer who has surveyed the district—

"The river (says Captain Haigh) runs for 100 miles through the finest cotton-fields of India, and may be said to direct its course in a very direct line from the chief cotton centre to Coringa, the best and safest port on the eastern coast."

Another authority, speaking of the Godavery, says

"The river, with its numberless tributaries, may one day become the Mississippi of the Indo-British empire."

Now the estimated cost of rendering this river navigable for 473 miles, so that goods might be conveyed down to the port, from the port into the interior, is £292,000, being at the rate of £618 per mile; and if the works were rendered more complete, so as to make the transit still cheaper, the estimated cost would be £360,000. And what would be the result? Why, that the cotton, instead of spending two months on the backs of bullocks, and exposed to every hazard, would go down in boats to Coringa in eight days, and that the cost per ton, instead of being 160s., would be only 24s. This great result would be obtained with the small outlay of public money I have mentioned; and when you consider the great interests which are at stake both in India and in England, there can surely be little hesitation as to the course to be pursued so as to open the finest fields which can be found for the cultivation of flax and cotton, for the export of Indian products, and the import of British manufactures.

But I cannot altogether omit another point, the consideration of which will show how many services would be performed and how many interests consulted by rendering the Godavery navigable. In the first place it must be regarded as a military work. Colonel Balfour, the Inspector-General of Ordnance, observes on "The large pecuniary saving which will ensue not only in the conveyance of stores, but in the preservation of human life by reducing the risk that now attend our soldiery during long marches."

He adds most truly,

"European lives in India are more valuable than ever."

Colonel Balfour gives details to show the saving which might be effected by opening up the Godavery—

"The march from Masulipatam to Nagpore is very circuitous, and traverses one of the most notoriously deadly jungles in India. The march occupies, I believe, a month and a half. It might be reduced to seven days by the river."

Thus, instead of sending the troops, whether European or Native, from one place to another by a tedious and fatiguing march of six weeks through a most unhealthy country, they might be sent in a week by the river. Dispatch, health, humanity, and policy, would be alike consulted. Then, a saving would be effected in the transport of stores. "On that line," says Colonel Balfour, "the transport of stores and cart hire alone amounts to £18,000 per annum;" which £18,000, let me observe in passing, would more than cover the interest of the £360,000 to be expended in opening the communication.

Again, there is another point materially affecting the welfare of the Natives and the revenue of the Government. The Indian Government derives a large revenue from the salt tax. Whatever may be the objection to such a monopoly existing in such an article, the fact is that the price exacted by the Government under its monopoly at the place of manufacture does not by any means constitute in itself an onerous tax. The great pressure upon the Natives arises from the difficulty of transporting the salt from the place of manufacture into the interior. The Indian Government clears, by its monopoly, on every ton of salt two pounds sterling. Now, wherever salt is cheap—that is, wherever it can be bought at a small advance on the cost at the pans, it is estimated that every Native of India consumes annually about 20lbs. But the price of salt—and this shows how severe must be the pressure upon the people of the interior—the price of salt in Nagpore, Berar, and generally throughout the Deccan, is £6, £7, £10, and even £16 per ton. Here then, in consequence of the high price, it is estimated that the Natives do not consume more than 8lb. per head. The cost at the pans is raised to the consumer, by the difficulty of transport, from three to six fold; but the opening of the navigation of the Godavary would reduce the cost to one-fourth of its present amount. Now, my Lords, if salt is a necessary in this country, how much more is it necessary in the sultry climate of India; and how important then it is to reduce the cost of so essential an article! In effecting this, by reducing the cost of transport, you benefit yourselves and the Natives alike; for the result would be that, at a very moderate computation, in this one district alone, the Government revenue would be increased by £64,000 a year. Calculate, hence, the financial results of similar facilities in all the salt factories, and we shall see that the Indian Exchequer would be replenished; and great advantage would be simultaneously conferred upon the entire people.

Now, it has been doubted whether India possesses great capability of production. I will show you what are those capabilities of producing; and first, as to cotton and to quantity of it. A high authority states that as much cotton is wasted in India as the whole quantity grown in America. At the present moment there are, according to the calculation of Dr. Royle, under cotton cultivation in India about 24,000,000 acres. The number of the population that is clothed in cotton, from the Himalayas to Cape Comorin, must be estimated at probably 200,000,000. Then see the many purposes to which cotton is turned by them; it is used for almost every purpose to which textile fabrics can be applied—for ropes, tents, saddles, stuffing, carpets—for almost everything. Guzerat, Broach, and adjoining districts, forming hardly one-hundredth part of the surface of India, will this year give us one-third of the ordinary supply we receive from America; but why? Because Guzerat has the ports of Gogo and Surat, and other small ports. Dharwar will probably do as much, so soon as the port of Sedashevagur shall have been completed, and the ninety miles of railway to connect it with the producing territory.

I have stated what is the producing power of India as to quantity; now look at its capability as to quality. I have spoken with many gentlemen on this subject—among others to Mr. Bazley, himself a cotton spinner, and on this subject one of the highest authorities; he states that, with all the imperfections, Indian cotton is at present equal in quality to 75 per cent of what is now required for the fabrics we manufacture. But it may be asked what guarantee have we that India will produce the finest sorts to compete with the American supply? Hear Dr. Forbes Watson on this head. He states, in his valuable writings, that in Dharwar the cultivation of American cotton is increasing at the rate of from 30,000 to 40,000 acres a year; that the acreage last year under this kind of cotton was 180,000; and the quality of the crop is quite equal to the New Orleans, or the American cotton. Then take the article of flax, which is becoming one of great demand and necessity in this country; one sample of Indian flax imported last year was valued at £64 per ton, and the Punjab and other districts exceed, we are told, Russia in the capability of producing it. And I wish your Lordships to weigh this important consideration—that when we talk of cotton in India we are not talking of a new cultivation which we are going to introduce for the first time; we have not to clear the land, or send the seed, or teach the people what they have to do; they have cultivated cotton for many centuries; all that they require are roads, canals, the means of transport and communication, markets, easy access to ports, and vigilant purchasers. Give India these; and her productiveness, both as to quantity and quality, will far exceed all our expectations. But until we do give those facilities of transport, some of the most rich and fertile regions of the world will remain altogether impoverished and useless.

Again, it has been asked whether India is capable of producing speedily, and according to our wants. Just look, my Lords, at such a statement as this—first, of jute, an article of great importance, and particularly so now in Dundee, there were imported from India in 1841, 3,000 tons; but in 1859 the quantity imported was 53,000 tons. Take, then, the article of wool—in 1852 there were imported from India about 5,000,000 lbs.; in 1860 the quantity imported was upwards of 20,000,000 lbs. And observe, as a proof of the energy of the people, that the greater portion of this wool was brought on camels' backs from distances varying from 200 to 600 miles. Down to 1851 the largest quantity of linseed imported from India in any one year was 6,000 tons; in 1854 it had increased to 35,988 tons; in 1855, owing to the Russian war, it rose to 66,687 tons, and in 1859 it was 96,000 tons, or nearly equal to the supply from Russia and all other countries combined. I cannot but direct attention particularly to this point. If the Russian war did so much to stimulate the production of linseed, what may not the revolution in America be expected to do for the production of cotton? That event is likely to deliver us from our perilous habit of depending on a single country for our supply, to relieve us from much hazard and annoyance, and, above all, from that incubus on the hearts of hundreds of thousands—the necessity of purchasing the produce of slave labour. The cotton grown in India will be grown by free labour; and this issue, I believe, will go further to abolish slavery in America than all our writings, speeches, and combinations.

Having thus shown the capability of India to produce, I now wish to show its capability to consume. In 1851 the value of the cotton manufactures, including twist and yarn, imported into India from Great Britain was £5,220,194; the value of other articles was about £2,022,000, making a total of £7,242,194. The proportion, therefore, in reference to the rest of the world, of British cotton manufactures taken by India at that time was 18 per cent. In 1859 the value of the cotton manufactures taken by India from Great Britain was £14,713,812; the value of other articles taken by India was £5,131,108, making a total of £19,844,920. The proportion of British goods, therefore, taken by India, relatively to the rest of the world, was in 1859 more than 30 per cent. But 1859 may be considered a year of forced export; look, then, at 1860, and it appears that India took British cotton goods to the value of £12,000,000, and other goods to the value of £5,000,000, showing a total value of £17,000,000. Now, all this shows a wonderful progress; and we must bear in mind that it has been made in spite of all kinds of difficulties—of war, of the mutiny, of the difficulty of transport, of deluge, of drought, of famine, and pestilence. Yet, so great are the resources, so strong the elasticity of India, that, notwithstanding all her obstacles and all her dangers, India has nearly reached the point of being our best and safest customer.

Another doubt has been expressed as to the character of the people, and whether they will respond to the efforts we may make in their favour; it is said they are generally listless and idle, requiring another people to think and act for them. But let us see how the stimulus of gain and self-interest acts on this population. In Dharwar, where the American cotton is grown, it has been found necessary to introduce the saw-gin, it being an instrument particularly adapted to cleansing purposes. The Government set up a factory for these machines; and so great became the demand for them by the ryots, that the manufacture was, for the sake of despatch, transferred to this country. These machines cost from £11 to £16 each, and yet the Natives have already purchased them to a considerable amount—about £12,000; and they expend on an average in this manner about £2,500 yearly. And this has been done by the ryots themselves, of whom it has been said that no stimulus can induce them to look beyond the day. The fact is, my Lords, I believe we have been governing India for nearly a century, and have never yet arrived at a proper estimate of the character of the people. They are, I believe, a people eminently commercial, active, and intelligent. It may not be a very amiable consideration, but it is, I believe, a true one, that, if you only make it clear to the ryot that a thing will pay, as the phrase is, there is nothing on earth, or below it, that the ryot will not at least attempt in the hope of money. I have been told that persons will travel hundreds of miles, carrying on their heads the articles they have to sell; and should they succeed in obtaining the profit of a few rupees, they believe themselves amply rewarded for their trouble. Now with respect to the cultivation of cotton in Dharwar, there can be no doubt that, if you open to the people a certainty that they shall obtain a speedy and fair payment for their productions, no effort will be spared on their part to supply the demand. In that way we can, I am assured, open a great field without having recourse to the objectionable system of advances. Nothing, it is clear, can be worse than such a system. It is most injurious to the man who makes the advance, inasmuch as it produces a despotic and domineering habit, while it leaves the ryot in a state of dependence, and wholly deprives him of any character of manliness and self-respect.

I cannot conclude the instances which I have ventured to bring before your Lordships' notice, without adducing one which, more strongly than any preceding, proves the immense advantage resulting to the country from works of irrigation and internal communication. I will take two districts, Cuttack and Tanjore, which are of about equal size, both situated in deltas of great rivers, and both of equal fertility. The revenue from Cuttack is £85,000, while that from Tanjore is £470,000. The land in Cuttack is worth 30s. per acre, but in Tanjore it produces £5. Cuttack has by far the best natural supply of water; and yet in twenty-three years there have been three years of famine, four years of drought, seven of inundation, two of severe inundation, and only seven of moderate seasons. During that period there was expended yearly in Cuttack upon water-works £2,400, and in Tanjore £11,600; and yet, in these two countries of equal natural advantages, the aggregate excess of revenue from Tanjore over Cuttack during the twenty-three years was no less than £6,970,000. To what, I pray you, is this to be ascribed? Is there no argument here for public works? Here is a very important paper, a report of the Madras Board of Revenue to the Madras Government in 1859. The reporters, although just and true, are not over partial to Sir Arthur Cotton's plans; and thus this paper, dispelling as it does all doubts of accuracy, shows unquestionably the character of what has been done. They say—

“The Board now approach the third branch of the subject, the cost of the two Coleroon anicuts, and the net amount of revenue which they have yielded to the State. The sums expended on these works, and the percentage which the net profit yielded by them bears to the original outlay, underwent careful scrutiny by the Department of Public Works and the Mahramut Commissioners, and the result at which they arrived after examining the bills and revenue statements was that for an outlay of £21,738 the Government have received a clear gain of £412,052 in sixteen years, or a profit of 118 per cent per annum.”

My Lords, here is the deliberate opinion of those gentlemen, arrived at after most careful consideration. What more could be desired? I have heard it said of Sir Arthur Cotton's works that his estimates were always exceeded by the actual cost. That may be so; but then it is also true that, in all instances, the expenditure has been followed by enormous and almost fabulous profit; and that, with such results, he may have sometimes made insufficient estimates, can hardly be regarded as much of a reproach. It has also been said that most of his works have been carried out in the deltas of great rivers. That is, no doubt, true; but if all the deltas of India were brought into the same condition as that of Tanjore, the revenue of the empire would be now nearly double what it is, and the people proportionately flourishing and secure. When Sir Arthur Cotton first set his schemes on foot, he was told they were impracticable; but now that he has carried them to completion, he is told, with equal assurance, that the results are incredible!

Now, after what I have stated as to the success of such works, can your Lordships wonder at the favourable opinion which has been expressed by those authorities who are most acquainted with the facts? Lord Dalhousie, in a despatch to the Court of Directors, wrote—

“Everywhere I found evidence of the wonderful effect produced by irrigation, wherever the means could be obtained; everywhere I found lands of vast extent, fertile properties, now lying comparatively waste, but wanting only water to convert them into plains of the richest cultivation; and everywhere I found among the people the keenest anxiety to be supplied with that by which alone they could be enabled to turn their labour to good account."

I find in a speech delivered by Lord Stanley in 1859, himself at one time Secretary of State for India, the following statement:—

"With regard to the public works in India, I have seen some doubt expressed whether the returns from these works were accurately given. I have since gone through the figures and verified them from official documents, and I find they are strictly accurate."

The noble Lord was speaking of these very works in Tanjore. The Hon. W. Elliot, a member of the Council of Madras, says—

"In irrigation-works the physical impediments are generally few and easily met, the returns are sure, always considerable, often immense; they have increased the wealth of the inhabitants in a remarkable degree; and with property the people have acquired habits of independence, a desire for knowledge, and for the extension of useful schemes of every description."

Sir Charles Trevelyan, in a report upon the state of Madras in 1859, states that—

"Works of irrigation create new value by an immediate and positive process, with a profusion of which there is no other example. They add from three to six fold to the annual productivity of the land. This is better than the annexation of new territory. . . . The Natives are encouraged to a life of peaceful industry."

It is, indeed, far better than annexation; for if only one-tenth part of the Presidency of Madras were cultivated after the fashion of the districts I have mentioned, it would more than double the revenue and quadruple the comforts of the people. The words of Dr. Johnson might be realized; there would be "the potentiality of growing rich beyond the dreams of avarice." A large addition would be made to the exchequer; and that, not only without pressing hardly upon those who contribute to the revenue, but with an increase of their resources. We should improve the condition of the people in all senses. We should enable them not only to meet the demands of the Government, but also to become large consumers of British manufactures, thus benefitting our own countrymen and adding to the well being of our own people. In whatever light we consider this question we cannot fail to be convinced of its deep and lasting interest. If we regard it financially, we see the means of largely increasing the revenue, and at the same time extending the means of those who furnish that revenue. If we regard it commercially, we see benefits on both sides; we perceive the means of stirring the industry of Great Britain to the greatest extent, and, at the same time, of enabling India to return to us by her produce what we require in exchange for our manufactured goods. Politically it is of manifest importance that we should adopt all measures that may add to the contentment and happiness of the people, and thereby give honour and security to our rule. If we regard it morally, is it not, I would ask, a great matter that the Natives of India will be induced to look with favour upon the laws, the language, the civilization, and the religion, of a race of men who exhibit such powers of science, and turn them to such high and beneficent purposes? I have heard that, in one of the improved districts, it was said to a missionary, "Until you Christians came among us we never had anything of this kind." By elevating socially the condition of the people we create feelings of independence and self-respect. Instead of a servile, down-trodden race, they will become able to assert their rights, to exercise their privileges, and to stand erect in the dignity of free men.

My Lords, when the late famine broke out in India, the people of this country properly and liberally subscribed to relieve the distress. It was right and humane to do so; but I venture to say that if a sum, equal to that contributed for the relief of the famine, had been expended in earlier days, upon the construction of works, it would have prevented that calamity, and have rendered those districts fertile and productive for many generations to come. My Lords, what do we not owe, in the position we occupy, to ourselves and to British India? By the seizure of the territory we have assumed the many and various responsibilities of empire. By the conquest—no doubt the beneficial conquest—of the country, we have torn from the Natives all means of improving their own financial condition, of regulating their own internal concerns, or of advancing, unaided, their own interests. Our duty, then, is clear. But, above all, we owe these efforts, in gratitude and obedience, to Almighty God, who has been pleased to place under the rule and protection of Queen Victoria the most magnificent empire that ever yet figured in the annals of mankind.

Moved,

has regarded with great Satisfaction the Progress of Public Works in various parts of India; and to beseech Her Majesty that, with a view to confer further Benefits on that Country, She will be pleased to take into Her immediate and serious Consideration the Means of extending throughout it, as widely as possible, the best Systems of Irrigation and internal Navigation."

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, he was confident their Lordships had all listened with the greatest interest to the able, eloquent, and forcible speech of the noble Earl who had just sat down, and he could assure the House that if he rose to follow his noble Friend, it was with no intention of contesting in the main the principles which the noble Earl had endeavoured to impress on their Lordships. He entirely agreed with his noble Friend in regarding the extension of works of irrigation and of internal communication as of the first importance to the welfare of the people of India. He was glad to find that the noble Earl had not been led, by the great attention he had paid to the subject, to enter upon any hostile criticism of the acts of the Indian Government, either of an earlier or later period. For himself, while not unwilling to confess that a great deal still remained to be done in that country in the direction just pointed out, he had yet the satisfaction of being able to say that at no previous epoch in the history of India was its Government more fully alive to the vast importance of this subject than at this moment. It was well known that the works of irrigation which had been begun and were in progress at the outbreak of the late mutiny were of necessity, from financial and other reasons, suspended during the continuance of that revolt. But since its suppression the Indian Government had set itself heartily and in the right spirit to the prosecution of this great task. That Government was as fully convinced as the noble Earl could be that it owed it to the people of India to devote itself as far as possible, within the limits of its resources, to the development of public works of the description under discussion. He could not better convey to their Lordships the spirit in which the Government of India was now acting, or in fewer words place before them the course which it was intended to pursue in this matter during the coming year, than by quoting a few sentences from the speech recently delivered by Mr. Laing when bringing forward his Budget in the Legislative Council. Speaking of the expenditure of India, Mr. Laing said—

"The next head of expenditure in my Budget shows an increase, not a reduction; but I think you will pardon this when I say that it is for civil public works. The Imperial assignment for civil public works is £3,121,129 in 1861-2 against £2,897,671 in 1860-1, or £223,458 increase; in addition to which £230,000 more will be spent next year than this from local funds, and the amount required for repairs is smaller, so that on the whole the expenditure on new works of improvement will be about £500,000 more in 1861-2 than 1860-1. Of this a large portion will go in making roads, which I believe to be, as a general rule, the most advantageous way of spending money in most parts of India. In addition to roads, we shall spend more money on canals, and especially in developing those works of irrigation in connection with our great canals which have proved of such infinite value in averting the consequences of the famine."

Such being the spirit in which Mr. Laing stated that it was the intention of the Indian Government to proceed in this matter, since the speech of which that was an extract came to this country it had been his duty carefully to go over the Budget-orders, as they were called, of the Indian Government in regard to public works in the different provinces, and he had risen from their perusal with the strongest conviction that the endeavour of the central Government of India had been to stimulate all the local and provincial Governments to devote their energies to the carrying out of works of this character. He might add an important statement—that the sum to be devoted to public works this year would be appropriated almost exclusively to civil and industrial works. The principle on which the Budgets of this year had gone was to reduce, where it was possible, the items for public works relating to barracks and other military requirements, and to increase—and in many instances largely increase—the sums allowed for works of irrigation and communication—the very kind of works advocated by the noble Earl. The amount taken this year in the general budget of India for internal improvements was £1,500,000, of which no less than £1,400,000 was to be applied exclusively to works of irrigation, and the communications by land and water; and he believed that even that sum did not entirely represent the money that would be expended by the Indian Government this year in that manner. His noble Friend had called their Lordships' attention to the great results derived during the present famine from the works already executed in connection with the Ganges Canal. However much England might have fallen short of its duty to India in various respects, he was persuaded that that great undertaking, the Ganges Canal, would always form a most creditable monument of the liberal spirit of our Government as well as of the skill of the engineer who had constructed it, Sir Proby Caultey. No doubt the full benefit of that work could not be derived by the people of that country until the smaller distributive canals to be fed from it in every direction were completed; the Indian Government were quite aware of that fact, and accordingly in the Budget of the North Western Provinces for the present year a sum had been allotted, which was the largest, in the opinion of the Lieutenant Governor of that district, that could be expended during one year in the construction of distributing canals in connection with the great Ganges Canal. And it should be borne in mind that the making of these distributive canals involved a very large proportion of scientific labour as compared with the unskilled labour required in the mere excavation of the larger channels, because each of the smaller canals must be laid out with care and skill by officers of engineering experience. The result was that the amount of this description of work which could be executed in a given time was, of course, limited by the supply of skilled labour that could be obtained. But the central Government of India, while it had approved the Budget of the Government of the North Western Provinces, and had consequently agreed to the sum intended to be devoted to the distributive canals, had also recommended that other canals, in connection with the Grand Canal, which were not precisely in the position of distributing canals, but were large channels although of a secondary character, should be proceeded with to a greater extent than was originally proposed, so as to give the whole surrounding country a participation in the benefits and advantages of the canal. The result was that a larger expenditure than was at first intended would be sanctioned, and that a canal would be executed in the Bolundshuhur district, with which the noble Earl was, no doubt, well acquainted. That work had been ordered to be completed to the extent of three lacs; and it had been possible to combine during the present famine the employment of the people with the prosecution of the works which were designed to prevent the recurrence of the very evils from which they were now suffering. The noble Earl had referred to the famine as a proof of the necessity for such works; and he (Earl de Grey) fully concurred in the observation. Great as, no doubt, had been the distress of the population of various parts of India, he was happy to be able to state that the information which reached him from different sources tended to show that, comparing the present famine with the similar calamity in 1837, the people were found in a much better condition by those who came in contact with them than during the previous severe visitation. It was also to be observed that a vast amount of emigration from the famine districts had taken place into those where the famine did not prevail. Of this emigration a great portion was spontaneous on the part of the people, although to some extent it had been encouraged by the Government. This showed that the intelligence of the people had been developed, and that they were more able, as their condition was raised, to meet the difficulties of the time. The noble Earl had touched on another large subject, which, no doubt, was of very great importance—he meant the opening up of the navigation of the Godavery. That subject had occupied the attention of the Indian Government. Unfortunately, the mutiny had interrupted the works; but at the end of the last year a sum was voted for proceeding with them, which was as much as could be spent up to the termination of the last financial year. The Government of India, in the Budget of the present year, had also allotted a considerable sum for that purpose. With regard to the views expressed by the noble Earl on this subject, he (Earl de Grey) should be the last person to under-rate the importance of opening up this district by means of these works. When the navigation of the Godavery was opened up—when they provided water communication for a district of that description—they would greatly cheapen all the products of that district. And similar advantages would, no doubt, result from the Indian railways. Before leaving the subject of the Budget for public works in India, he could not help referring to the great assistance which the Government had received from the present Secretary in that department, Colonel Yule. The Government of India were strongly impressed with the merits of that officer. He had discharged his duties with eminent ability, and the public would derive great advantage from his services. The noble Earl, in his speech, did not make any specific recommendation as to the mode in which these works of irrigation and internal communication should be carried out. For these purposes, he (Earl de Grey) had already stated that the Government of India had allotted in the present year for this purpose the largest sum they could consistently with the present condition of their finances. They had reduced other branches of expenditure, and ordered increased expenditure in this, and they were determined, within the necessary financial limits, to carry out these works as rapidly and as fully as possible. But if his noble Friend intended to imply that it was the duty of the Government of this country to raise funds in the money-market for the purpose of carrying on works of irrigation and water communication throughout India at once and immediately, he must say he differed from him in that respect. As all their Lordships were aware constant calls were being made upon Government for expenditure on public works in India, not, indeed, of the description referred to by the noble Earl, but for the construction of railways; and during the present year no less a sum than £8,000,000 was required under that one head. Those sums were raised either by the railways themselves or under the guarantee of Government in the money-market of this country; and he believed, from the best information he had been enabled to procure, that there was very great doubt whether the money-market in this country would be able to raise a much larger sum than that very considerable amount for that particular purpose. The market might get sick of securities of that description. Until the railways were completed the Government had no means of reimbursing themselves the large sums they were paying for guaranteed interest, and it was, therefore, their first duty, in order to relieve the Indian Exchequer from this burden, to complete the railways as fast as possible. It was, therefore, necessary to raise these loans for railway purposes, but he did not believe that the money-market would be able to raise a much larger sum than he had stated, or that the finances of India would be able to meet any increased charge for interest. As regarded the importance of the question which his noble Friend had so ably brought before their Lordships, there was no difference of opinion between his noble Friend and the Government, or, indeed, any Member of their Lordships' House. Her Majesty's Government and the Government of India were firmly determined, and never were more determined, to proceed with works of this description as fast and as fully as they could consistently with the financial condition of that country; but until the finances of that country were restored to their natural equilibrium—which he hoped soon to see—their condition imposed a necessary limit which they could not overpass. But while the Government entirely concurred in the principles laid down, he must put it to his noble Friend whether, as the Government of India were acting in the very spirit he recommended, it would be convenient to ask the House to agree to a Resolution such as that with which he concluded his address? He understood that his noble Friend did not mean to imply any blame on those charged with the duty of carrying out and superintending works of this description; and there was always a danger, in passing a Resolution like this, of raising hopes which might not be realized both in India and elsewhere. He, therefore, ventured to hope that his noble Friend would content himself with the discussion he had raised by his able, complete, and thorough exposition of this important question.

LORD LYVEDEN said, he entirely agreed with all that had been said as to the importance of this subject and the value of ample details which had been submitted to their Lordships by his noble Friend; but he complained that, while the noble Earl who had just sat down had replied out of the Budget speech of Mr. Laing, that Budget speech their Lordships had not yet seen, although Mr. Wilson's had been presented at once. He regretted the absence of all documentary information upon Indian subjects. The noble Earl (Earl de Grey) informed them that £1,500,000 was to be expended on the public works of India; but he believed that a much larger sum used to be annually devoted to that object previous to the mutiny. If the Government were going to spend merely what they could spare from the surplus income of India they might as well say at once that they had resolved not to proceed with works of irrigation—for with such dribbling sums no great or useful effort could be made. He was not quite, perhaps, prepared to urge that a loan should be raised for the purpose, but it was due to the House that they should be informed of the exact position in which the Government at present stood. They could not have a better opportunity of establishing a good system in India and of rendering the British Government popular among the inhabitants than that which was now presented to them. He would not enter on a discussion of the merits or demerits of previous Governments in India; but he might say that it was generally believed by the Natives of India that the East India Directors did not carry on the public works, and especially those for irrigation, with sufficient zeal. If the Natives found that greater attention was paid to these matters under the new rule they would be disposed to regard it as a blessing; but the popularity of Her Majesty's Government would be much diminished if they showed any unwillingness to promote those improvements which the Natives deemed essential to their welfare, and knew to be so considered by their Mahomedan rulers. Without resorting to a loan, there was another mode in which these works might be carried out, and that was by means of private companies, who would undertake them in the hope of deriving a profit from them. He had never looked with favour on the system of giving large subsidies to companies; he understood, however, that an unguaranteed company had been set on foot, and he thought that such companies were entitled to the utmost encouragement from the Government. Some check should be imposed on them to prevent fraud on the public; and a system of supervision should be established which would meet Sir Arthur Cotton's recommendation—"inspection, but not interference." He believed that any company which embarked in a speculation of that kind would not only reap reasonable remuneration for themselves, but confer a great benefit on the country. Their Lordships were much indebted to the noble Earl opposite for bringing forward the subject; but, in the present state of the House, he might think it advisable not to press his Motion against the opposition of the Government. He hoped, however, that it would serve as a stimulus to the Government to exert themselves more zealously in the promotion of public works in India, either by the encouragement of private companies or by raising annual loans of considerable amount, and devoting them to that object.

LORD OVERSTONE said, that this was

unquestionably a subject involving most important considerations both with regard to India and Great Britain, and the House was under obligation to the noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury) for the manner in which he had brought it under their notice. At the same time, however, he must say that it appeared to him that the noble Earl on the Government bench (Earl de Grey) had given the noble Lord a complete answer. While acknowledging the justice of the principles and the accuracy of the statements of the noble Earl, the noble Earl (the Under Secretary for India) objected to the adoption of the proposition which he had submitted to the House, as being altogether unnecessary. The object of that proposition was to give expression to the feeling that the Government had not applied themselves with sufficient zeal and energy to the development of the resources of India, and to imply that the Government wanted stimulating. In that opinion he (Lord Overstone) did not agree. It was a very grave question, under what circumstances, and to what extent was it safe, wise, and, therefore, beneficial to the country itself, for the Government to undertake the development of Indian resources, instead of leaving it to the energy and enterprise of private individuals and companies. Further there seemed to him to be a great omission in the speech of the noble Earl who introduced the subject. The noble Earl described in strong terms the importance of the measures he advocated, and the benefits to be derived from them, but he unfortunately neglected to inform them whence the funds were to be drawn for defraying the expense of the various works he wished to be undertaken. His noble Friend the former Secretary for India (Lord Lyveden) followed in the track of the noble Earl who opened the discussion, in omitting to state where the money was to come from. If it was intended that a loan should be raised by the Indian Government on Indian credit then he shared the view that had been expressed on behalf of the Government, that Indian credit was taxed to a sufficient extent already, and that nothing could be more essential to the effectual development of the resources of India itself than that Indian credit should be maintained intact. It would be a most suicidal policy to overburden Indian credit for the purpose of pushing on public works in that country. Perhaps, however, it might be proposed to provide funds by means of loans in this country, and under British guarantee? In that case, he would direct the attention of their Lordships to the consideration that such a measure would go far to precipitate that danger which he had always apprehended from recent legislation in regard to the Government of India. Having once undertaken to govern India under the direct authority of the British Crown, and through Ministers holding office under the approval of the British public, he could not see how they could long keep the Indian revenue separate and distinct from that of Great Britain. If that danger was necessarily inherent in the political relations which had recently been established between this country and India it would be rendered far more imminent if they proceeded to raise money under the Imperial guarantee to carry on these works in India. Then, again, the noble Baron (Lord Lyveden) had referred, in somewhat ambiguous terms, to the agency of private companies in carrying out public works in India. As he understood the noble Lord these companies were to rely entirely on their own resources and responsibility in carrying on their own operations; but while they were not to receive a subvention from, they were to be under the inspection of the Government. He had had some experience in matters of that kind, and he was utterly unable to comprehend what could induce any company to submit to the supervision of the Government unless they received some direct pecuniary assistance from them. The whole proposition, therefore, resolved itself into the question—In what manner and from what resources the works were to be carried on? He held that the view taken by the noble Earl who spoke for the Government was sound and practical; and he trusted that by persisting in that course which they had already pursued, they would succeed in developing those resources which were of such vital consequence to the interest both of Great Britain and India. There was another point raised by the noble Earl who commenced the debate, which deserved notice. In his enthusiastic estimate of the resources of India, the noble Earl pointed out their extraordinary development from the moment when the breaking out of the Russian war caused a demand for produce which we had hitherto received from Russia. It seemed to him that that part of the noble Earl's speech answered the other part of his argument. If the pressure of a war with Russia, checking the supplies from that part of the world, produced at once such a vast development of the resources of India, upon the same principle, and through the same process, why might they not look for a large increase in the supplies from India of those products which were now subject to similar influences owing to the American war? It certainly appeared to him that the whole of the arguments of the noble Earl on that point tended directly against his own recommendation; and were inconsistent with the great principle of political economy, that the extent of the supply will in the final result be determined by the extent and intensity of the demand. Under these circumstances, and especially directing attention to the great question of how means were to be found for carrying out these great works, he had no hesitation in expressing his satisfaction with the view expressed on behalf of the Government and his confidence in their policy. He thought that the most proper and courteous course which the noble Earl could follow would be to withdraw his Motion, and thus to avoid expressing, by an indirect vote, any want of confidence in the sound policy or the discreet energy of the Government in this matter. In case the noble Earl did not consent to do so, he must move the Previous Question.

Motion objected to, and a Question being thereupon stated—

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, he thought the management of the resources of India under the late Company was extremely bad, but he had never taken so gloomy a view of Indian finance as seemed to be entertained by the noble Lord who had just spoken; because, if he rightly understood the noble Lord, he was of opinion that the credit of India was so low that, no matter what inducements were held out, it was impossible to raise money for profitable investment in that country at the present moment. In the able, lucid, and powerful speech of the noble Earl who opened the debate they were told, and he believed no one disputed it, that money laid out on works of irrigation in India had returned a profit of 69½ per cent. He, therefore, very much doubted the assertion that no money could be raised, either in England or India, for investment in works which immediately returned that large interest. The real question was whether those works were rapidly and undoubtedly profitable to the Government and to the country? Without attempting to raise the vexed question respecting Government by the Indian Council here, he ventured to say that at the present moment India was governed more in England and less in India than it had been for years. The noble Earl the Under Secretary of State, in referring to Mr. Laing and his Budget, clearly showed that it was the opinion of Her Majesty's Ministers that no money should be laid out on public works in India, except money from the annual income. He submitted that that was not a sound principle, or the principle upon which they acted at home. When money was wanted for profitable works in England or even for fortifications the Government did not hesitate to ask for a loan; and the cost of these reproductive works in India might be easily defrayed by loans, as the outlay would be gradual, and the return very rapid. He thought that extraordinary means might be found, without rashness, to enable companies or the Government to finish some of these works, and that their completion would be a great advantage to the country as well as an addition to the resources of the State. A letter from the Secretary of State to the Madras Irrigation Company, dated June 2, 1860, showed that he did not consider it impossible for the Government to connect themselves in some way with private companies, and to afford them facilities for carrying out these works, for Sir Charles Wood proposed to allow them to take land in the first instance free and ultimately to pay a rent to the Government. As to the works on the Godavery, he condemned the postponement of their completion for fourteen years, if, as he believed, they could be finished in three or four, and he reminded the Government that they might occasion the deaths of half a million of people by famine, should a famine occur in the interval, to save the difference of cost in raising the money at once. He did not underrate the benefit of railways, but in such a country as India the benefit of canals for traffic was nearly equal, and when irrigation was added very far superior to them. Indeed, the immense value of such works had not been in the slightest degree exaggerated by the noble Earl who had so ably opened the debate. In Italy, especially in Lombardy, there were noblemen whose chief incomes were derived from streams of water used for irrigation purposes: how much more easy would it be for the Government to make works of irrigation in India a source of revenue? He agreed that there was little use in coming to a vote upon the Motion; but if the noble Earl divided he should certainly support it.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, that the noble Marquess had misinterpreted the meaning of the noble Lord who moved the previous Question. He did not understand the noble Lord to lay down the doctrine that such works ought never to be undertaken by means of loans, but merely to say that there was already a sufficiently heavy charge for public works on the revenues of India, without undertaking new responsibilities till the schemes already guaranteed had become reproductive. The noble Marquess and other noble Lords seemed not to be aware of the enormous extent to which the credit of the Indian Government was pledged. Before the mutiny the debt was between £40,000,000 and £50,000,000. It was now closely verging on £100,000,000, besides £56,000,000 which was the amount to be expended on railways. Of the latter amount about £30,000,000 had been actually raised and expended, and as £8,000,000 more would be expended this year, at the end of the year the Indian Government would be paying 5 per cent interest on £38,000,000, to be increased in a very few years to £56,000,000. The Indian Government was receiving only about £500,000 in relief of the full amount of interest, and the charge on that account would be £3,000,000 or £4,000,000 annually for several years. With this prospect he thought it unwise and impolitic to pledge Parliament or the Government to raise any very large additional sum even for such important works as those to which the noble Earl had referred. Railway communication was the first essential; and after that was completed they could proceed with works of inland navigation and irrigation. The progress, however, in works of irrigation and inland navigation had not been so slow as was represented. Up to 1815 hardly a farthing was spent on those works; but since 1815, and particularly during the last twenty-five years, their progress had been even rapid. The amount of canal communication actually opened in India was, he believed, 1,840 miles; and that was a very large amount of public works of that kind to have been effected within twenty-five years. As to the question whether these public works should be carried out by private companies or by Government, there could be no doubt that where works of any kind could be effected by private enterprise it was better that they should be so carried out. In this country that would undoubtedly be the case; and in any country peopled by the Anglo-Saxon race these great works were far better left to the enterprise of individuals or companies; but it was almost certain that in India they would not be undertaken by Native enterprise, and it was doubtful whether they would be undertaken by English enterprise without some assistance from the Government. When Lord Hastings began these public works he distinctly intimated that offers had been made to him from private companies, and he gave a curious reason for declining them—that they were works of such dignity, of such benefit to the people, and of such magnitude, that they ought to be carried out by the Government only. This was a principle of very doubtful expediency; but it had been carried out from that time. He could not agree that the proposed expenditure for this year was so unsatisfactory as the noble Marquess seemed to think. The sum proposed to be spent on public works was £3,270,000, in addition to certain works which it was intended should be supported from local funds under the new powers of local taxation which it was proposed to give the Presidencies. Of this only half a million was applicable to military works. Certainly, in the present state of the Indian finances, it would not have been safe to devote a larger sum to that purpose. He quite concurred in all that had been said of the extreme interest and ability of the speech of the noble Earl. He deserved the thanks not only of the public, but of the Indian Government, for having brought the subject forward; but as the Government did not dispute a single principle which he had laid down, but simply contended that the adoption of such an abstract Resolution would be inconvenient, he hoped the noble Earl would agree to the previous Question.

LORD HARRIS, referring to the sum which it was proposed to spend on public works this year, said, that when the new Public Works Department was established it was desired, of course, to commence as many large works as possible, and for three or four years the Budget for the Presidency of Madras amounted to between one and two millions, but he found that the staff at the command of the Government was so weak that it was utterly impossible to get the expenditure up beyond £500,000, so that really if the Government of India attempted to spend more than the sum they proposed—from £3,000,000 to £4,000,000—they would be utterly unable to do it, except they threw their money away, because they could not get a sufficient number of officers of experience to superintend the works. Having seen the works which the noble Earl had so well described, he fully concurred in all he had said as to their success, and he had no doubt that when money could be found to continue them their further progress would be equally successful.

The EARL OF SHAFTESBURY, in reply, said, that as he should probably have to go into the lobby by himself, if he divided in the present state of the benches behind him, the best thing for him to do would be to accept the proposition of the noble Baron below (Lord Overstone). He had, however, the satisfaction of knowing that he had in favour of his Resolution the concurrent opinion of the Government, of their Lordships' House, and, he believed, of the public out of doors.

IRREMOVABLE POOR BILL. COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.
House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Three years shall be substituted for Five in 9 and 10 Vic. c. 66, s. 1, and Residence in a Union shall be equivalent to Residence in a Parish).

MR. LOCKE moved at the end to add "and for this purpose the area subject to the provisions of the Metropolis Local Management Acts shall be a union." This subject had been brought before the consideration of the House so long ago year 1857 by his hon. Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets, who, like himself, represented a large class whose interests had materially suffered by the changes that had taken place in the Poor Law, in his Equalization of Rates Bill. The present Bill, however, made no attempt to grapple with the subject. His proposition, therefore, was that the area of rating should be extended so as to include the whole Metropolis, and that the Metropolis for the purposes of this Act should form one union. The present state of things was this—that the poor had been removed from the richer to the poorer parishes; so that it had come to pass that in these parishes the poor were supporting the poorer. In the City of London, for example, where the great merchants carried on their business the parishes were charged with the support of comparatively few poor, though the labour of the working classes living in other districts was of the greatest advantage to them. In the same way the great employers of labour in other parts of the Metropolis were freed in great measure from the support of the poor. If it could be shown that this discrepancy arose from the effects of legislation, he thought it was not too much to ask that legislation should be called in to alter it. Now, so long ago as the passing of the Poor Law Amendment Bill, an alteration was made in the law of settlement; and a large amount of extra taxation was created. Part of the law of settlement was that of hired servants. Where a person bound himself for twelve months as a servant to another, by the performance of that service for a year and by forty days' residence in that parish he obtained a settlement. This state of the law was altered, mainly, he believed, from the reluctance of agricultural employers to hire labourers for a twelvemonth and thus enable them to obtain a settlement in the parish. It was altered for the purpose of enabling the working man to go from one parish to another without gaining a settlement. His opinion was that the law of settlement ought to be abolished. But, if so, the present parochial system could not be maintained. What was the present state of things? Take the parish of St. George's, Hanover Square; a man might hire himself, and pass the best years of his life in that parish, but he could gain no settlement there; he must look for his settlement in one of the poorer parishes. The dwellings of the poor were swept away in the richer parishes, where improvements were constantly made in the beauty, health, and convenience of the dwellings. Thus the servants of the richer classes were driven to settle in the poorer parishes, and the burthen of the rates was greatly increased upon them. And what happened then; Parliament again stepped in and said that where a person had an industrial residence in a parish for five years, and fell into want, he should be irremovable from that parish; and the present Bill proposed to substitute three years for five. He thought this would act well in the rural districts; but it was not applicable to the Metropolis. It would act with peculiar hardship upon the parishes of the district which he represented, particularly those of Bermondsey and St. George the Martyr, Southwark. The latter was a union of itself, and by this Bill they were imposing a new liability on the parish, without giving them any corresponding advantage whatever. This was a gross injustice. The poor of the Metropolis were as much entitled to consideration as those of any other part of the country, and, therefore, he proposed that the Metropolis should be dealt with as other parts of the country were, and that it should be formed into a union by itself. He proposed that "the charge of all the persons who might become chargeable under the Act within the limits of the Metropolis as defined by the Act for the better government of the Metropolis should be defrayed by all the parishes in the Metropolis as if the same were a union, and that the Poor Law Board should issue such orders as might be required for apportioning such charge and levying the contributions required for the payment thereof." This latter proposition, however, which he might call the machinery for carrying out his object, he would not move for the present, but would content himself with moving that the whole area of the Metropolis should be formed into a union.

MR. AYRTON suggested that the additional Amendment should be moved as a separate substantive clause.

MR. LOCKE said, he would move his original Amendment, and in case of its being carried, would then move the additional Amendment.

MR. WARNER said, he wished to see the operation of the law of settlement re-adjusted, and referred to its unfair operation on the city of Norwich. The first clause of the Bill would increase the evil in such towns as Norwich, inasmuch as the poor would be forced into those towns while they worked in the parishes in the neighbourhood. He did not think the Amendment of the hon. Member for Southwark would meet the case of London, much less the case of country towns. He was in favour of the Bill generally, but was opposed to the first clause.

MR. KNIGHT said, he thought the city of Norwich had no reason to complain. It appeared that the rateable property in Norwich had increased within a short period from £70,000 to £290,000. What Norwich was suffering from was the circumstance of so large an area being included in one rating. Norwich, in fact, was calling upon the county to pay the wages of its workpeople. There was no ground why Norwich should seek to extend its area of rating.

MR. DODSON contended that though a poor man worked in one parish and lived in another, the latter parish had the benefit derived from the expenditure of his wages, and when he needed relief it was but fair that that parish should give it. He admitted that while the area of rating might be made too large, it might also be confined within too small bounds. The best arrangement was that by which localities having a community of interest were united for the support of the poor. He could not assent to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Southwark, which he believed would prove injurious to the poor themselves and to the poorer parishes by taking away all inducements to economy.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he should despair of getting through with this Bill if they were to enter upon the discussion of all the points raised. The Bill was a very simple one, the result of investigations before Committees, and founded upon the recommendations of a Committee. The Bill was one that related to the whole country; but the hon. Member for Southwark proposed to introduce a totally new and distinct question—namely the equalization of rates in the Metropolis. If his object were carried out a new administrative machinery would be necessary for the Metropolis. Indeed, it would require a new Bill altogether, and one of considerable complication and difficulty. He hoped the House would not agree to his Amendment, therefore, but would proceed with the real objects of the Bill, which would be highly beneficial to the landed interest.

MR. BENTINCK thought the right hon. Gentleman was too sanguine if he expected that discussion on a question of this sort would be limited within a very small compass, for it was impossible that a Bill like this should not lead to long and desultory discussion. He was opposed to this Bill, because it would relieve the pressure upon the urban parishes at the expense of the rural districts, and because the extension of area for rating purposes would lead to waste and extravagance. He trusted that at any rate the Bill would not be allowed to pass in its present state.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, what had fallen from the hon. Gentleman reminded him of the contest as to whether a shield was made of gold or silver, the fact being that the shield was looked at from two different sides by different persons. The hon. Member looked to one side of the Bill and he (Sir George Lewis) was looking at another, when he said it would be favourable to the landed interest. The part of the Bill he referred to as favourable to the agricultural interest was that which changed the period of irremovability from five to three years, and that which extended the area of irremovability from the parish to the union. [“No, no!”] He said “Yes,” and it was to relieve the agricultural interest that the principle of irremovability after five years’ residence was introduced by Sir Robert Peel. The part of the Bill to which the hon. Gentleman referred was, no doubt, the 9th Clause, which changed the mode by which the payment to the common fund was to be calculated. He was ready to admit that that change would be to some extent unfavourable to the rural parishes as compared with the urban; but it would only be unfavourable to the extent of the change made by the calculation being based on the rateable value instead of according to pauperism.

MR. HENLEY said, the right hon. Gentleman forgot that the whole amount of the rate would in many cases be doubled. The right hon. Gentleman asked them not to discuss the Bill, but to go on agreeing to its provisions. No doubt it would be easy enough to get through the Bill by reading its enactments, but it was much more important for the constituents that they should carefully consider the results, and he contended that they had not sufficient information to enable them to judge how the Bill would work. It was certain that it would work with great capriciousness, and if they proceeded with the Bill they would be taking a step in the dark. The present system of dealing with the poor was not a good one; but he did not think the Bill raised the question in a large spirit. He would recommend that the Bill should be put off till another Session, and that in the meantime the Government should prepare tables that would show them clearly what the probable consequences would be. It would be a great boon conferred upon the country if they could get rid of the question of settlement altogether by the adoption of some satisfactory rule of action. If they could be relieved, for example, from the risk of persons coming back upon them from distant countries there would be a greater likelihood of coming to an agreement as to the mode of adjusting the burden. He would give no opinion as to the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Southwark, though he thought that that hon. Member was pursuing a very reasonable course when he did what was in his power to relieve his constituents of the heavy charge which would be thrown upon them.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS considered that the principle of the Bill had been sufficiently discussed on a former occasion, and hoped the Committee would confine itself to a consideration of the clause now before them. He objected to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Southwark, because he believed it would be impossible to carry out the principle of union rating on so large a scale as the Metropolis. A board of guardians for the whole of the Metropolis would be necessary, and he asked how such a board, having to deal with nearly 3,000,000, people was likely to work? He by no means thought that the injury to the poorer parishes which the hon. Member apprehended would follow from the operation of the Bill, and trusted that the clause as it stood would be agreed to.

MR. BARROW entirely approved of the Bill. He thought the proposal of the hon. and learned Member for Southwark disposed of itself, when it was remembered that he proposed that the 3,000,000 of inhabitants should be included in a single union. He thought it quite right that irremovability should depend upon a reasonable period of industrial residence, and was inclined to think that the reduction from five to three years would have a very limited operation.

Mr. Henley

MR. AYRTON said, that the hon. and learned Member for Southwark had proposed the addition, with the view of raising the question whether, if Parliament unduly increased the burden on certain parishes, it should not also provide a remedy? The Government had undertaken to consider the whole question during the recess and to do justice to the whole community; but, instead of that they had brought in a Bill which they thought did great injustice to the parishes which he and his hon. and learned Friend represented. Poor people entering the Metropolis from the west were not allowed even to rest in one of the richer parishes; but were obliged to "move on" till they came to some district like Southwark, and there they remained and became chargeable. It was no answer on the part of the Government to say that they had not considered this subject. If they had not they ought—what was expected from them was a Bill which should meet the wants of the whole population of the country, and if they had not so sufficiently considered the question, that was a good reason either for withdrawing the Bill or adopting Amendments proposed for others. All that his hon. Friend desired was that, inasmuch as the working man laboured in one parish while he resided in another, the two parishes ought to be rated for his support when he became chargeable.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT regarded the proposal of the hon. and learned Member for Southwark as impracticable and unjust. He would suggest that the hon. and learned Gentleman should withdraw his Amendment and bring up a clause on the Report embracing the machinery by which he proposed to work out the object of his proposition. When at the Poor Law Board he had made an effort to carry out a scheme for the better relief of the casual poor of the Metropolis by dividing it into five or six districts, but he found that not above three or four of the parishes had the slightest desire to comply with the object he had in view. This showed the difficulty of dealing with so vast a field as the Metropolis, and he believed that in endeavouring to carry out the object of the hon. Member the difficulties would be insuperable. With regard to the clause, he agreed in the principle which it set forth. He was in favour of removing every impediment to the free action of the poor man, and would not object to two years instead of three, for he thought the smaller the number of years that were fixed the better. He did not agree with his right hon. Friend the Member for Oxfordshire in the views he took of the Bill. He thought it required some amendment, but, on the whole, he believed it would be a great boon to the poor man. He thought it was based on a great principle of justice, and should give it his hearty support.

MR. WALTER merely rose to express the hope that his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Southwark (Mr. Locke) would be satisfied with the discussion of this question that had taken place, and not press his Amendment to a division. His hon. and learned Friend was perfectly justified in bringing the question forward. There was great force in the arguments he had used to show that the change proposed by this Bill would aggravate the burden now borne by his constituents. But, whatever justice there might be in the abstract in the principle he advocated, it was clearly impossible that it could be tacked on to a clause in a Bill of this kind. Even if the Amendment were to be adopted, there was no adequate machinery by which it could be carried out. He was not prepared to go all the length the hon. and learned Member proposed in regard to an adjustment of the Metropolitan districts; but it certainly appeared to him that there was great room for improvement, and that the subject would be a fair one for a Committee of that House to consider, or for a separate Bill introduced by the Government. With regard to the particular clause before them, the tendency of that clause was to effect a movement in the direction which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) thought most desirable—the gradual abolition of the law of settlement. He (Mr. Walter) believed that was a consummation to which they were gradually tending. In proportion as they extended the principle of irremovability they weakened the law of settlement. The principle of the law of settlement was more a ratepayer's than a poor man's question. The question was not so much what particular parish a poor man was to have relief from, as it was certain that he must have relief either in one parish or another, as on what parish the burden of his relief was to fall, and that was an object of interest to the ratepayers. But the question of irremovability was a poor man's question; and the more it was carried out the more it must tend to that abolition of the law of settlement to which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire had called their attention. The incidence of taxation had always been one of the most difficult questions in social science, but, however much people might differ as to the shoulders on which taxation fell, one thing they all agreed upon was, that it was desirable to throw the burden on other shoulders than their own. As he thought the Bill would diminish this selfish tendency of our nature he cordially gave it his support.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, that the object which the hon. and learned Member for Southwark and the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets had in view was to equalize the poor rates. Now, there was a great difference of opinion upon that subject, and he believed a majority of the ratepayers of the Metropolis would be proved to be against the hon. Members upon that point. But it was most unfair that a question of such vital importance should have been brought forward thus suddenly.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK concurred in the general principle of the Bill, but he thought its details demanded the most ample discussion when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire, with all his vast experience, declared himself quite in the dark as to the operation of the measure. With regard to the law of settlement, he thought it was a step in the right direction. The changes, however, which the Bill proposed to make in the apportionment of the charges would seriously affect many of the agricultural parishes, and would materially add to the rates. This question would require careful consideration when they came to the 9th Clause of the Bill. He thought the principle of the Bill a good one, and though he could not give his consent to the whole of the details he should be very unwilling to offer any opposition to the Bill passing.

MR. KNIGHT thought this Bill placed a greater burden upon the rural parishes than existed at present. He considered that the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman was very much to the purpose, and he thought it had hardly obtained the reception which it deserved.

MR. LOCKE said, he was satisfied, from the tone of the discussion, with the admission that the principle of his Amendment was a just one. He was prepared to bring forward a machinery for working out the proposal, but as it seemed to be the wish of the Committee, and inasmuch as legislation on the subject was expected to emanate from the Poor Law Board, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Mr. HENLEY should be glad to have more information before coming to a decision whether or not this Bill was founded upon the principles of justice.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. WARNER repeated his objection to the first clause, that these unions in the neighbourhood of close parishes would be seriously affected by it, and he expressed his intention to divide the Committee upon the clause.

Mr. KNIGHT proposed to introduce after the word parish in line 12, the following words:—

“That five years’ continuous residence in any parish shall confer a settlement therein, and four year’s continuous non-residence in any parish shall forfeit and extinguish all claim to a settlement therein.”

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 2 to 7, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 8 (The Chargeability of Union Paupers upon the Common Fund made perpetual),

Mr. THOMPSON objected to this clause, because by it the charges were made perpetual.

Mr. C. P. VILLIERS supported the clause, and asked what the hon. Member proposed to substitute?

Mr. AYRTON objected to the passing of the Act in perpetuity. He moved the omission of the words making it perpetual.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 9 (Contributions to the Common Fund to be calculated according to the annual Value of rateable Property),

Mr. SOTHERON ESTCOURT proposed to insert the words—

“Upon an assessment calculated by adding to the annual value of the lands and hereditaments in each of the parishes, as hereinafter described, a sum equal in pounds sterling to the amount in numbers of the population of such parish, according to the last census.”

At present the common fund of each union rested upon what was commonly called averages. Those averages were directed to be altered from time to time by the Poor Law Board. They represented the amount of pauperism in each parish. Now it was manifestly unjust to take the state of a parish twenty-five years ago as the standard of what it was to contribute to the common fund. According to his proposal, not only the value of property but the amount of population would enter into the calculation. He was quite aware that when the unions were in good circumstances his Amendment would make no difference. But where a combination of parishes was to be found in indifferent circumstances, it would take effect. He trusted the alteration would lead to the adoption of the parochial instead of union rating. He considered that the system of parochial rating was the cardinal point on which the question of economy turned.

Mr. C. P. VILLIERS said, he had had calculations made as to what the result would be with regard to payment if the element of population was added to the rateable value, and he found that there would be very little difference indeed. Seeing, then, that his right hon. Friend and himself agreed in principle as to having the contributions on the rateable value of the property assessed, he would leave it to the Committee to decide the questions that remained between them. If the Committee were willing to accept the Amendment he was not prepared to offer any objection, though he thought it was calculated to produce complications and difficulty.

Sir MATTHEW RIDLEY thought that the effect of this mode of legislation would be to cast upon the rural districts those charges which should be borne by others.

Sir BROOK BRIDGES contended that this clause was so important that it needed more discussion than could be given to it at that late period of their deliberations.

THE IRISH CONVICT SYSTEM.

QUESTION.

Sir JOHN ARNOTT said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he has any objection to lay upon the Table of the House a Copy of the Correspondence between Captain Crofton and the Irish Government, complaining of the difficulties placed in his way in carrying out the Irish Convict System in consequence of the reduction in the number of Directors, and whether it is the intention of the Government to fill up the vacancy in the Direction?

Mr. CARDWELL said, he had no objection to the production of the correspondence referred to, but it was not yet closed. With regard to the intentions of the Government as to the vacancy, the hon. Baronet might rest assured that they would first consult the efficiency of the service. The Government would intimate their intention as to whether it would be necessary to fill up the vacancy before doing so.

OCCUPATION OF TETUAN BY SPAIN. QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he is aware that there are no natural or geographical obstacles to prevent or retard the march of Troops from Tetuan to Tangier, a distance of one day's journey, by any Power having permanent possession of Tetuan? And, whether the acquisition of the coast district, continuing down to Tetuan from Ceuta, by any Power in possession of that fortress, would not render Ceuta, situated directly opposite to Gibraltar, and very much nearer to it than is Tangier, a place of great strategical importance, supported by a large acquired territory, and able to endanger the security of Gibraltar by threatening the independence of Tangier?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, the Government were quite aware of the position of Tetuan. With regard, however, to the consequences of the possession of that place by Spain in reference to our possession of Gibraltar he must decline to enter into that question.

THE PARTRY EVICTIONS—SELECT COMMITTEE MOVED FOR.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made and Question proposed.

"That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. M'MAHON rose to move that a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the causes and circumstances of the recent evictions at Partry, and into the expediency of devising some means to prevent the recurrence of such scenes. The hon. and learned Gentleman said he was aware that the subject of these evictions had been recently much considered by the House, and he apprehended that the feeling which generally prevailed was that it was not desirable for the House to inquire into the way in which a landlord exercised the rights conferred upon him by the common law. But he should remind the House that there were special Acts passed in favour of the landlords in Ireland. Those

Acts, however, were passed upon an implied understanding that the landlords would not abuse the powers which were thereby conferred on them. There was no necessity for such Acts in this country, inasmuch as English landlords never committed such outrages upon their tenantry as had been recently perpetrated in Ireland. If Parliament thought it necessary at one time to grant these extraordinary powers, he apprehended that, upon its being shown they had been abused, it was competent for Parliament to modify or withdraw them. It was also understood, when those statutes were passed, that they were such as would be carried into effect by the civil power; while, in fact, to such an extent had those powers been put in force, that the ordinary civil power was found unequal to the execution of them; and, consequently, the aid of an armed police and a military force was required to protect those engaged in them. He submitted that it was a fit subject of inquiry whether it was the duty of the Government to lend the assistance of the armed force to support such cruel and extraordinary proceedings. He admitted the right of the landlord to evict his tenants under certain circumstances; but he denied the right of those armed authorities, after they had seen the landlord placed in possession, to assist in the levelling and destruction of the tenants' houses. With the exception of the Church question no great practical grievance was left in Ireland, except the state of the law which permitted such wholesale evictions being carried out as those of which the House had heard so much of late years. To such an extent had these wholesale evictions been carried, superadded to the effect of bad government, that coercive Acts were the order of the day, and the Volunteer movement was not allowed to operate in Ireland. The county of Galway was, comparatively speaking, in a very quiet state until the Bishop of Tuam, Lord Plunket, a Member of the House of Lords, about five years ago purchased property in a portion of that county. He (Mr. M'Mahon) regretted being obliged to make a complaint against the son of a man to whom every Roman Catholic must ever feel grateful. The Lord Bishop of Tuam, soon after obtaining possession of his Partry estate, established proselytizing schools for the purpose of educating the children of his tenants in the Protestant religion. The rector of the parish, the Rev. Mr. Townsend, a missionary connected with the Church Missionary Society, gave every assistance to the Bishop of Tuam to carry out his views. This rev. gentleman was examined as a witness in Galway about two years ago in the case of a trial for libel on the Rev. Mr. Lavelle, the priest of the parish; and he swore upon his oath that he believed a Catholic priest to be the minister of Antichrist, and that he sent a challenge to the Rev. Mr. Lavelle to meet him in a controversial discussion. Dr. Townsend, with the Scripture readers and the bailiffs and agents of his Lordship's estates, went among the tenants and requested that the children might be sent to the school. There were printed rules with regard to the management of the estates; and the sixth stated that it was Lord Plunket's earnest desire that all the tenants should send their children to the school; but, it was added, his Lordship would not compel the observance of this rule by any person entertaining conscientious objections to doing so [derisive cheers]. He hoped that cheer would reach Lord Plunket. But, whatever might be Lord Plunket's intention, his conduct had led his tenants to the opinion that the "earnest desire" was to be enforced on pain of eviction. All the tenants who sent their children to the school were left on their farms; with only three exceptions, every tenant who did not send them was evicted. But there was a seventh rule, which stated that previous to the 1st of May in each year a notice to quit would be served on the tenants throughout the estate, the reason urged being to prevent a recurrence of the delay which had attended a refusal of the tenants to give up possession on demand by the agent when it was desirable to "strike the land." Now, was ever such a thing heard of in the world? Another rule required the tenants to adopt a proper course of husbandry in the cultivation of the land. If the proceedings of Lord Plunket had been in conformity with human principles, the noble Lord might have enforced his rights by means of the ordinary civil power, without the aid of a body of troops and armed police; but on that occasion a body of troops and 150 of the police were sent down to Partry to give the sheriff possession, and they stood by while the houses of twelve families were levelled to the ground, and the old, young, and helpless were left without shelter. Every one who had been so unfortunate as not to send his children to the proselytizing school was turned out.

Mr. M'Mahon

Since November there had been evictions on a smaller scale. Two families only had been turned out, and one of the persons evicted was a man who had sent his children to the proselytizing school, but who subsequently withdrew them. The result was that he and they were turned out, but not for refusing to "strike" the land. Lord Plunket, not choosing to justify himself by declaring that every man had a right to do what he liked with his own, had given reasons for his conduct, and one reason was that some of these tenants had burnt their land contrary to the rules of the estate. This burning of the land was one of the best things to produce fertility, and it had always been done before, but it so happened that those persons, or some of them at least, who had not sent their children to the proselytizing school had burnt their land. Other reasons were given for the evictions, but it was a curious fact that all who had not sent their children to the school were turned out; and that several who had refused to "strike," but who had sent their children to the school, were never evicted. He supposed that it would be alleged by some hon. Member that the Ribbon conspiracy had something to do with this matter, but it appeared to him that this Ribbon conspiracy was a sort of myth, which was always brought forward whenever it was desired to justify some oppressive proceeding on the part of a landlord. He trusted that the House would be of opinion that he had laid a basis for his proposal for a Select Committee to inquire into the circumstances of these evictions, and also into the expediency of devising means to prevent the recurrence of such scenes as had been witnessed at Partry. He thought that he had now laid a basis for such an inquiry as he desired. As he should not have an opportunity of again addressing the House he must announce that it was his intention to go to a division. The hon. and learned Member then moved—

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the causes and circumstances of the recent evictions at Partry and into the expediency of devising some means to prevent the recurrence of such scenes."

MR. MAGUIRE seconded the Motion.

Amendment proposed,

"To leave out from the word 'That' to the end of the Question, in order to add the words 'a Select Committee be appointed, to inquire into the causes and circumstances of the recent evictions at Partry, and into the expediency of devising some means to prevent the recurrence of such scenes.'"

—instead thereof.

Mr. LEFROY said, it was the earnest desire of the right rev. Prelate (Lord Plunket) to have the case fully investigated, and he (Mr. Lefroy) would himself have seconded the Motion but for the objectionable practice which appeared to be springing up of demanding Committees of that House to investigate the management of private estates, the effect of which could only be to create ill will between landlord and tenant. He was, nevertheless, rejoiced that the matter had been brought before the House, because they would now have the opportunity of judging on what utterly groundless charges an excellent Irish landlord had been held up to reprobation. He regretted that the hon. and learned Member for Wexford should have joined with those whom he must call clerical agitators in bringing such a charge forward; he should have remembered that the right rev. Prelate was the son of a great and distinguished man who had devoted the whole of a long life to advancing the cause of his Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen, and not thus ungratefully avail himself of the position he held in that House, partly through the efforts of that noble and learned Lord—to calumniate his son. One would have supposed from the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman that the evictions from this estate had been numerous and indiscriminate, that fifty or sixty families at the least had been evicted. The hon. and learned Gentleman said, moreover—

"That the notions to quit had been sorted to an enormous extent; and that the persons who had been evicted had been turned out because they refused to send their children to a Protestant school."

The hon. and learned Member, however, forgot to state that the notices were served upon tenants who were many years in arrears; that all the notices had been withdrawn except twelve, and that the twelve persons against whom they had been put in force had all been directly or indirectly concerned in violations of the law. He (Mr. Lefroy) was prepared to detail the particular crimes for which every one of the evicted persons had been convicted; they had acted in persevering and litigious opposition to the rules of the estate; and others were not tenants, but had located themselves upon the property without permission. He would read to the House a list of the individual offences of the evicted persons—

"Martin Lally—The father 'burned' his land,

contrary to law and the rules of the estate; one son returned by coroner's jury as necessary to the murder of Lord Plunket's ploughman, a second convicted of 'brutal assault.' Edward Joyce—Tried for perjury; eleven jurors for his conviction. James Henaghan—charged with 'assault,' and pleaded guilty. Patrick Murray—The son convicted and imprisoned for 'brutal assault.' Michael Cavanagh—His son-in-law, engaged in 'riotous assault;' the father-in-law offered holding elsewhere. John Boyle—'Burned' his land, took defence, and vexatiously summoned Lord Plunket to appear as witness. Patrick Lally—Ditto. Mary Lally—Ditto. Thomas Lally—Ditto. Michael Henaghan—Ditto. Sally Lally—Squatter. Margaret Duffy—Ditto."

Such was the character of the persons turned out of possession of their land because it was said by the hon. Gentleman "they did not send their children to Lord Plunket's school." The House could see what was the general state of insubordination in the district from the proceedings at a meeting of the Mayo magistrates in February, 1859, and presided over by the High Sheriff of the county. At that meeting the following Resolution was unanimously agreed to:—

"That we consider it our duty as magistrates, and resident proprietors in this district, to represent to his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant the disturbed state of the district comprising the parish of Ballyovey, situate in the Barony of Carra, and county Mayo, and the townlands of Churchfield Lower and Churchfield Upper, situate in the barony of Ross, and county of Galway. We are of opinion that sufficient protection is not given at present by the Government to the peaceable and unoffending inhabitants of that district. For some time back there have been many outrages perpetrated therein. One man brutally beaten, inoffensive women assaulted, a house burned, large mobs collected to intimidate some of the people, witnesses attending sessions at Ballinrobe and Claremorris have not been able to do so except under the protection of the police. These offences have been followed by the murder of an inoffensive man. We, therefore, urgently recommend that the above-mentioned district should be proclaimed, in accordance with the provisions of the Crime and Outrage Act, and that his Excellency will be pleased to take such other steps as he may think desirable for the protection of the peaceable and well-disposed inhabitants of that district."

It had been urged that the conduct of the priests on these occasions had been meek and mild; but he (Mr. Lefroy) would quote a specimen of the language employed by the priest of the district, Father Lavolle. That individual concluded a letter of denunciation in these words—

"You may draw the sword in aggression against the 'poor,' but the 'poor' are determined to a man to meet you. Let the 'notice to quit,' and the 'ejectment process,' and the 'sheriff,' and the 'crowbar'—let all come—there shall we remain to meet them, with the same stern courage as did the Ghebers their Moslem foe in a less holy cause; and when all this is done the beginning has not yet arrived."

The right rev. Prelate having heard that it was the intention of the Bishop of Orleans to preach a sermon, in the course of which he was to charge him with having evicted from his estate a number of Roman Catholic tenants, in consequence of an alleged refusal on their parts to send their children to a Protestant school, wrote a letter to Lord Cowley, our Ambassador at Paris, to this effect—

"The facts of the case are simply these:—During the past year I have been compelled to evict from my estate twelve persons with their families; some of these were tenants who had been directly or indirectly concerned in serious violations of the law of the land. Some were tenants who had acted in persevering and litigious opposition to the rules of the estate; others were not tenants, but had located themselves upon the property without permission. To have retained such persons upon my estate, after the continued and systematic provocation to which I have been subjected, would have only encouraged a spirit of general insubordination and lawlessness; and, therefore, in justice to myself, to my peaceably-disposed tenants, and to my neighbours, I felt reluctantly compelled to remove these tenants from my property. Such were my only reasons for evicting them; and to state that I evicted them, or that I ever evicted any tenants, for refusing to send their children to a Protestant school, is to assert that which is absolutely untrue. I am aware that a number of most specious misrepresentations have been industriously circulated in reference to this matter. Your Lordship will be, doubtless, surprised to hear that even falsified reports of the very evidence which I have given upon oath in open court have been furnished to the press, and words which I have never uttered have been published, and quoted as mine, with a view to convict me of perjury and falsehood."

I shall now beg to call the attention of the House to the two following facts, which are open to investigation. At present there are 179 Roman Catholic tenants on Lord Plunket's estate, none of whom send their children to a Protestant school; and at the time when his Lordship first acquainted the twelve families with his intention of evicting them, he could not have been influenced by any refusal upon their parts to send their children to his schools, for there was not, as it happened, amongst them all at that time, with perhaps one exception, a child of an age suitable for attendance at school. With respect to the rev. Gentleman from whom the hon. and learned Member for Wexford (Mr. McMahon) had obtained much of his information. He (Mr. Lefroy) must inform the House, and he did so with much regret, that the Rev. Mr. Lavelle was obliged to leave Paris for misconduct of some sort; when he came to this side of the Channel, thinking, perhaps, that he might take greater liberties. The rev. gentleman attended a meeting in the round room of the Rotunda in Dublin, upon which occasion the Rev. Mr. Anderson, formerly a Protestant clergyman, now a Roman Catholic priest, gave a reading of his translation of the sermon then lately preached in Paris by M. Dupanloup, Bishop of Orleans. The proceeds of this meeting, it was stated, were, as in the case of the French bishop's sermon, to be applied to the relief of the "victims" of Partry, and of "similar cases of unmerited distress." What were the real motives which underlay this system of tenant commiseration and landlord denunciation might be gathered from the concluding proceedings of the meeting. On that occasion Mr. Kavanagh, of the Catholic University, moved a vote of thanks to the Rev. Mr. Anderson, and the Rev. Patrick Lavelle seconded the Motion, and concluded, in the words of the report, in these terms—

"We are all Nationalists. [Great cheering.] We have all one end in view—the liberation of our dear, suffering, bleeding country. [Tremendous cheering, and waving of hats.] Do you know my creed at this moment? I know I am looked upon by the magnates of the land, and by the powers that be, as a firebrand. [Hear, hear, and laughter.] Well, I proclaim this:—give me Jew, Turk, Heathen—give me anything for twelve months—but send away the English tyranny. [Loud and long-continued cheering.]

Such was the language in which it was sought to raise up the worst passions of the people of Ireland, and such was an instance of the meekness of the rev. gentleman on whose authority the hon. and learned Member relied. He would leave it to the House to say how far they were disposed to come to a decision adverse to Lord Plunket on such evidence. Before the House appointed a Committee as was moved for to inquire into "the expediency of devising some means to prevent the recurrence of such scenes," it should at least be ascertained that the cases which were supposed to warrant an investigation were neither doubtful nor paltry. It appeared to him upon every consideration that he had given to the subject that not a single fact had been stated to warrant the Committee which the hon. and learned Gentleman required.

Mr. WHALLEY said, that after the clear and complete answer which had just been given to the charges of the hon. and learned Member for Wexford, he should not have risen but that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lefroy) seemed to admit that the House had jurisdiction in these questions. On the contrary, he submitted that a greater abuse of the time of Parliament, and a greater outrage on the attention of Members, could not be perpetrated than by occupying the House with a mere question of the relations between a landlord and his tenants. In the county where he lived there had been cases of men having been put out of their holdings for acting in discharge of their political convictions, but it never entered into their head to bring their grievances before the House. But what was the charge against the right rev. Prelate? It was that he had attempted on a grand scale a system of proselytism. Why, what should he do? If the hon. Gentleman had seen Ireland as he did in 1847, when he could have taken a line and marked out the townships where famine and death and starvation extended almost precisely according to the jurisdiction and control and power of the Roman Catholic priests. ["Oh, oh!"] What should any right-minded and benevolent man then desire so much as to establish a system of proselytism? He wondered what the rev. rector of Partry should have done, when at his ordination he recognized the religion which they not only tolerated but encouraged and paid for as "blasphemous and idolatrous." Every clergyman was called upon to preach against the "blasphemy and idolatry of Popery." He was not using his own words. Why, then, should a right rev. Prelate be attacked as for doing something wrong when he had merely endeavoured to proselytize and to win people away from a system which those who had examined it knew to be injurious, and to produce misery and all those miseries which were the natural results of its teaching? It was a first principle of that religion that no one should be at liberty to exercise his own judgment—that no one should read the books they pleased, but implicitly rely on what they were told, and thus, as it were, emasculate themselves, and render themselves incompetent to discharge the civil duties of life. Why, then, should hon. Gentlemen presume on their position in that House to make a charge against the right rev. Prelate of proselytism, when he had endeavoured to reclaim his tenants, not for the sake of religion merely, but for the sake of civil society, for the sake of the welfare and material interest of the country, from such a system of religion as that? ["Question."] It was the question. If hon. Members wished let them discuss the matter as it was discussed in 1688, when it was declared that the first principle of the Constitution should be Protestantism, and that Romanism, the effects of which they had then experienced more recently than now, should by all possible and tolerant means be discouraged. Was it, then, right that the House should be occupied for two or three hours with a discussion like that because a landlord and a Bishop had endeavoured to exercise his authority as a landlord to reclaim his tenants from the social evils of Rome?—[Laughter.]—Well, was it not a social evil when these evictions could not be carried out without police and without putting the country to expense? But it was the result of the education which was given at Maynooth, as he knew full well. It was in precise conformity with the doctrines and principles there taught that the law could not be carried out without the assistance of the police and military. Should the hon. Gentleman go to a division, he (Mr. Whalley) should go with him, in order, if possible, that they might have some principle laid down as to whether the time of the House should be occupied in discussing the relations between landlords and tenants, and especially to see whether it was not the duty of every man in the country, to the extent of his ability, to proselytize and to maintain and extend that Protestantism which was recognized as part of the Constitution.

MR. MAGUIRE: Sir, I do not intend to follow the hon. Member who has just spoken into the horrors of the social evil, or the iniquities of the Scarlet Lady, in dismissing which rather complicated question the hon. Gentleman has not only confounded himself, but utterly bewildered the House. Neither shall I attempt to follow him through the maze of his mental vagaries, which would not be a very useful or profitable pursuit. I assume that the hon. Gentleman had forgotten part of the famous Maynooth harangue, which was to have astonished the House and the country, and pulverized the College, if not demolished Popery in Ireland; and that he has, therefore, thought it right to supplement that magnificent oration by the speech which we have just heard. I can assure that hon. Gentleman that Catholic Members have heard that great as well as that supplemental speech, not only with the most perfect satisfaction, but with a sense of pleasure which it is almost impossible to describe. The hon. Gentleman has taken upon himself to decide on the propriety of bringing questions such as the present before Parliament, and he has gone so far as to designate their introduction "an abuse and an outrage." But I put it to the hon. Member for Peterborough himself, who, if he could only get rid of his nonsense about Popery, would be a useful and, indeed, efficient Member—that is, with respect to small Bills—whether there is any other course left to a persecuted tenantry than an appeal to public opinion, through the medium of this House? Let us really see what the state of things is. We find that the vast majority of the tenants of Ireland are tenants-at-will, that they hold their farms from year to year, and that they can be removed from them at any moment by the owners of the land which they cultivate by their capital and labour. It is a fact beyond controversy that about nine-tenths of the tenants of Ireland stand in this precarious position. Now, I not only admit, but, as an Irishman, I am proud to state, that we have in Ireland numbers of landlords—Protestant landlords of Catholic tenants—who are an honour to their country, and towards whom their tenants display a feeling of clannish attachment and devotion such as cannot be exceeded in any country whatever among a class holding similar relations with the owners of the soil. For such landlords changes in the laws are unnecessary; for not only do they deal with their tenants kindly, humanely, generously, and according to the principles of justice and equity, but they act wisely and prudently by encouraging the industry and protecting the interests of those on their estate; for they well know that the more their tenants are prosperous and contented, the more certain must they be of their own prosperity and that of their estates. But, unhappily, there are landlords in Ireland who entertain different notions of their duties, and who regard their tenants in a very different light; and it is against this class that protective laws are necessary—or, if changes in the law cannot be obtained, that the aid of public opinion is to be invoked. The right of the landlord is clear and unmistakeable. Where the tenant does not hold by lease, the tenant is absolutely at his mercy. If the landlord have 100 tenants, or 1,000 tenants, on his estate, he can, at any moment, or from any motive, whether of caprice, love of gain, or desire of vengeance—clear these 100 or those 1,000 tenants from off his property. If this be so, and it is so, I ask is not the landlord endowed with the most extraordinary powers over the tenant—a power almost of life and death? Then, in case that wrong is inflicted by those who hold and exercise such powers, and that there is no redress to be had in the ordinary tribunals, what is to be done? Public opinion alone is influential in checking the undue exercise of these tremendous powers. In a court of law, save where the law has been violated, the tenant cannot be heard with much practical effect; and if the voice of oppressed and persecuted men is not to be heard in this House, where, in God's name, is it to be heard? There is no Parliament in Dublin—I wish there was; and I confess, for my own part, I would gladly surrender the honour of belonging to an assembly which legislates for and concerns itself with interests that embrace so large a portion of the world—I say I would cheerfully exchange all the honour and glory of forming part of this great Assembly, for the opportunity of devoting all my energies to the improvement and happiness of that country which I love with the ardour and earnestness of one sprung from the soil. But, as there is no Parliament in Dublin, I would look upon the Irish representative as a dastard and a coward who, being a Member of this House, did not raise his voice to proclaim and denounce any wrong to which his humble countrymen had been subjected. It is true, Parliament has no power or authority to restore these unhappy victims of Lord Plunket to their holdings, and to reinstate those against whom this grievous wrong has been done; but it has the influence to check, by the expression of its opinion, the intentions of those who might be inclined to imitate so evil an example. And it is in this spirit that my hon. and learned Friend (Mr. M'Mahon) has brought forward this question. As to this case of Lord Plunket, we have abundant evidence to prove that he has acted harshly and inhumanly towards those people whom he has banished from his property. It has been established by sworn evidence, given before a Judge and jury, that this right rev. Prelate—this Bishop of a Christian Church—this gentleman of high rank and illustrious lineage—has transgressed every principle not only of Apostolic teaching, but of ordinary justice and fairness. No doubt he has acted strictly in accordance with the law of the land ; but it is because he has done so that it is necessary to appeal to public opinion against the law as well as against him. The friends of Lord Plunket seek to defend their noble client by attempting to damage the Rev. Mr. Lavelle ; and the hon. Member (Mr. Lefroy) stated that Mr. Lavelle had been driven out of Paris—thereby endeavouring to produce an unfavourable impression against him on that account. But the simple part of the case was this—Mr. Lavelle, being a Professor of the Irish College at Paris, had a dispute with the President of that establishment as to its internal organization ; and I am authorized to state, on behalf of Mr. Lavelle, that he had the approval of the Catholic Prelates of Ireland for his conduct on the occasion. So much for that accusation. A speech attributed to Mr. Lavelle has been also quoted against him. With that speech, whether it were “incendiary” or not, I have nothing whatever to do, as I know nothing whatever respecting it. If Mr. Lavelle speaks as a freeman ought, he is entitled to every protection ; and if he transgress the law, there are those who can take cognizance of his indiscretion. But the question is not as to whether Mr. Lavelle was driven from Paris or not, but whether this Bishop of a Christian Church did turn out the people or not ? It is not whether Mr. Lavelle spoke a certain speech or not, but whether this Protestant Prelate exercised his enormous power as a landlord for an unworthy purpose ? My hon. and learned Friend mentioned only twelve cases of evictions ; but there have been twenty-eight cases ; 165 people having been turned out within the last five or six years by the right rev. Prelate—all of them with the exception of a few families who had been evicted by a near relative of his. It has been asserted that these persons who were evicted had no children—no children of a sufficient age to be sent to school—no children of such an age that the proselytizers would desire to get hold of them. In justice to these proselytizing gentry, it must be admitted that they are not at all particular, and that if they cannot procure a child of eight, or ten, or fourteen years of age, an infant of two will answer their purpose—which is to make a show in their schools. If there were no children, then the charge against Lord Plunket at once falls to the ground. But were there no children ? If there were no children, why the “earnest desire” that they should be sent?—why the repeated applications to their parents by the agent, the missionary parson, the bailiff, and the daughters of Lord Plunket ? It is said that the people last evicted had no children. That statement is entirely unfounded. The direct opposite is the fact. When these poor people were expelled from their homes in that merciless weather, by a more merciless act, there were seen hanging about them children of all ages, who had to follow their wretched parents into desolation and misery. Over and over again the representatives of Lord Plunket called upon these Catholic parents, importuned them, besought them, threatened them—used every influence to induce them to send their children to his schools, the avowed object of whose teaching was to make them Protestants. The evidence of the Rev. Mr. Townsend is conclusive as to the object in obtaining these children. There was no disguise whatever about it. The mothers of the children were in the habit of resorting to all sorts of expedients to escape this shameful persecution. Sometimes the child was hidden behind a box, at another time under a bed, at the approach of Miss Plunket and the Scripture readers, and one child narrowly escaped suffocation in consequence. It was proved that the Rev. Mr. Townsend went to poke with his stick under the bed to discover if any juvenile recusant were there concealed. Before I give evidence—sworn evidence—upon this question of the children being sought after by Lord Plunket and his agents, I may allude to the striping of the land, which has been given as the alleged reason for these evictions. Now, what is the fact in reference to these twelve cases ? With the exception of two holdings, all the rest had been striped for several years before. Here, in this single fact, is the answer to that alleged reason for demanding possession. At the trial at Galway eighteen witnesses were examined on Mr. Lavelle’s side to prove this system of proselytizing by threats of extermination. Mr. Lavelle had sixty witnesses to prove to the same effect ; but the Judge and jury were wearied with a trial that had extended over six days, and only the number I mentioned were examined. Lord Plunket was present, looking down from the Bench on many of the victims of his landlord cruelty ; and his agents, of all kinds, were likewise present. But not one of them was able to answer the main allegations of those poor people. [The hon. Member then read extracts from the evidence of several witnesses, in corroboration of the facts he had before stated; and then proceeded]—I could multiply these facts to show that the landlord's agent, the bailiffs, the proselytizing minister, the daughters of Lord Plunket—in fine, every one who had authority or influence over the people—came to them, over and over again, to induce them, by threats as well as by persuasion, to send their children to schools which, according to the sworn admission of the Rev. Mr. Townsend, were intended, by their teaching, to make Protestants of them. What did Lord Plunket say, in reply? He said "I expressed my earnest desire that my tenants should send their children to my schools." His "earnest desire!"—the "earnest desire" of a man who had the power of life and death over these poor helpless people. Of course, charges are now trumped up against the unhappy victims of this merciless system—this system of fraud and tyranny. One of these tenants was found guilty of an assault. What was the origin of this assault? A Scripture-reader went one day into one of the cottages, and seeing a scapular—which is a symbol of a particular devotion—suspended from the neck of the woman of the House, he rushed at her, told her that it was an emblem of the devil, and tore it from her bosom. The woman struck him, and her son afterwards punished him for this ruffianly outrage; and I think those who hear me will agree with me when I say, in the language of a certain finding of a jury—"Served him right." We are told not to judge of Lord Plunket's motives. But the motives cannot be mistaken; they lie on the surface, and are patent to all men. Here is a grand fact—every tenant evicted was a tenant who refused to send his or her children to the proselytizing schools, while all those who yielded, and sent their children, have not been disturbed. When Mr. Lavelle came to Partry he found the Catholic chapel almost empty, and the Catholic school without children; but being a man of energy and zeal he set about remedying such a state of things, the result of which is that his chapel is crowded with pious worshippers, and that his schools are filled with children whose faith is protected against the base and dishonest artifices of the proselytizer. Hence the enmity to Mr. Lavelle—hence these evictions. Mr. Lavelle would have failed in his duty if he had not acted as he did. A Protestant clergyman, under similar circumstances, would have done the very same. It has been said that Lord Plunket had a right to preach the doctrines of his church, and endeavour to win converts to his creed. That I do not deny. On the contrary, I admit it. Let him preach on the highway if he please, provided that he does not provoke to a riot thereby. There is, however, a more suitable and a more potent way of preaching his doctrines—by the gentleness of his manner, by the beneficence of his acts, by the virtue and holiness of his life. But I hold it is contrary to the principles of justice, of liberty, and of Christianity, that Lord Plunket should wield his enormous power as a landlord against these unhappy people, not to make them converts to his creed from a sincere belief in the truth of Protestantism, but to make them liars and hypocrites, sacrificing their unfortunate offspring for some temporary gain. The whole system is one of the meanest imposture and of the most fiendish cruelty; and what I desire to elicit is some generous expression of opinion by some influential English Member against any attempt to propagate religion by such abominable and iniquitous means. The greatest misery and wretchedness are inflicted upon the humbler classes of the people of Ireland by this madness for proselytizing. I know of a striking example of it in my own county. In a certain rural parish of that county the priest and the parson lived together on terms of neighbourly kindness and Christian amity. Each respected the other, and the other's faith. In works of charity and kindness they were sure to be found associated together; and in the hour of emergency, when their people suffered from any cause, the united appeal of these two worthy ministers of the Gospel was irresistible in their behalf. In the fulness of time it pleased God to remove the worthy Protestant clergyman from his earthly labours, to the grief of the priest and his flock. The successor was a man of a different stamp, and was one of those who happened to be in connection with Exeter Hall, or one of its missionary and aggressive associations. Soon after his arrival peace fled from that once quiet parish, and hate and discord prevailed. The fruits of his zeal were visible ere long in riots on the highway, in prosecutions at petty sessions, quarter sessions, and even at the assizes; and for years this wretched locality was torn asunder by strife, malice, and hate, disgraceful to a civilized community, and degrading to the name of religion. It has been said, in vindication of Lord Plunket, that he has 175 Roman Catholic tenants still on his estate. My answer is his Lordship may not find it over convenient to eject them; for not only would such folly be sure not to pay, but he may not desire to brave public opinion farther than he has already done. Mr. Lavelle has been stigmatized as a "priestly agitator;" but Mr. Lavelle was bound to defend his people, and to protect their faith; and it is not because a priest is a minister of religion that he loses his rights as a citizen on that account—and, in my opinion, the clergy of Ireland would be guilty of a dereliction of duty, as citizens, if they did not appeal against laws which oppressed and demoralized their people, or if they did not seek redress for such flagrant wrongs as that which Lord Plunket has inflicted on the victims of his power. If the tenants of Ireland do not pay their rent honestly, then there is a law to compel them to do so; but there should be no authority given to coerce their conscience. I yield to no man in the feeling of reverence which I entertain for the great name borne by Lord Plunket—I honour the memory of the illustrious man who made that name famous. I am proud of his glorious genius, and prouder of the still more glorious use to which it was directed; and, therefore, my regret is the deeper when I see a degenerate son of that great man practically repudiating every one of those principles which his illustrious father so eloquently proclaimed, not alone for the guidance of his own time and country, but for that of the world and posterity. Sir, I call upon this House not to be guilty of the folly, the insanity, of refusing to listen to such an appeal as is now made to it. Do not close your doors or shut your ears to the recital of wrongs such as have been described. Let no feeling of impatience or annoyance, let no considerations of momentary convenience prevent you showing that you are not indifferent to evils which inflict misery upon the poor and the helpless. This, I say, is the right place, and the only place, where an appeal against legal injustice can be made with a hope of advantage, and I beseech the House to listen to the appeal now made on behalf of a suffering and a persecuted people.

MR. WHITESIDE: Sir, this Motion is one of considerable importance, because, unless the House interposes to check such Motions, it will find itself involved in great difficulty, and it will become what the late Mr. Drummond styled it in reference to a similar Motion, "a tremendous Inquisition." Mr. Drummond made use of this observation on the occasion of a Motion made by the hon. and learned Member for Wexford some time ago, under similar unfortunate circumstances in connection with the conduct of Mr. Pollock, who had bought a large property in Ireland, and had made some useful and permanent improvements upon his estate. The hon. and learned Member for Wexford brought that gentleman under the attention of the House, and entered into a statement in which he described the number of tenants that he had evicted and expatriated. But what turned out to be the facts of that case? The very tenants who were said to have been thus persecuted had actually signed a paper expressive of their gratitude to Mr. Pollock for his generous conduct towards them. The hon. and learned Member for Wexford, in the face of the real facts of the case, excused himself by saying, that that part of the country with which he was connected being situated at a great distance from the scene of those alleged occurrences, he was not thoroughly acquainted with the facts, and he proceeded to make the best justification he could for his unwarrantable attack upon a gentleman who was deserving of the highest commendation. Well, what difference is there between that Motion and the present one? We have heard of sixty or seventy ejectments brought by Lord Plunket against his tenantry. His tenants, however, did the same thing as the tenants of Mr. Pollock had done. They had some difference with their landlord; but they addressed their landlord in the following terms:—

"TO THE RIGHT HON. LORD PLUNKET.

"Castlebar, March, 12, 1860.

"We, your Lordship's tenants in this present ejectment, feel much grieved at being in a position antagonistic to your Lordship. It is not, nor ever was, our wish to interfere with your Lordship's rights on your property. We now beg to leave ourselves entirely in your Lordship's hands, and to withdraw all further defence."

(Signed by all the Defendants.)

Upon receiving this memorial Lord Plunket directed his counsel (Mr. Robinson) to take the opportunity of stating in Court that it was not intended to evict any of those sixty cases, with the exception of fourteen, affecting individuals who had been concerned in serious infractions of the law of the land, or of the rules of the estate. The truth is that those persons were advised not to quarrel with their landlord when they had no defence. The Bishop then offered to restore all those persons to their holdings except such as he felt he had serious charges against. I distinctly say that a more unjust and studious misapprehension of the facts cannot be made than to say that sixty or seventy families had been evicted. It appears that Lord Plunket had a very worthy man, a ploughman, in his employ. This unfortunate man, for no other offence than that he was Lord Plunket's ploughman, was shot dead at his own door. The House will judge of the nature of this circumstance by the following facts:—The family of a man named Lally was the first evicted. The Bishop I admit was inexorable as to this man—he said “Tom Lally, the son, stands at present charged with having been concerned in the murder of a poor man of the name of Harrison who had been employed by me as a ploughman.” I rather think that the Crown had directed a prosecution for the murder. The evidence against the accused was that he was seen close to the spot where the murder was committed, and that on the ground was found the piece of paper which had been used in loading the gun; on it was written the name of Thomas Lally; and in a box at the head of his bed was found the sheet of paper from which it had been torn; and also in the same room the gun recently discharged. This, you will see, was rather suspicious evidence against him. I should certainly like to live out of reach of Thomas Lally's gun. The case came on for investigation; but as it could not be proved that Lally had actually fired the shot, he was admitted to bail, and the case was ordered to stand over until further evidence was procured. When the case came on at the assizes the counsel for the prisoner applied to have his client admitted to bail. The House will, no doubt, be startled to hear that the Rev. Mr. Lavelle, the Roman Catholic priest of Partry, came forward as his bailsmen and stood security for this man. The hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Maguire) must admit that in each of the cases of evictions there was a distinct accusation of crime, of one sort or another, brought against the evicted persons. The facts of the case of Prendergast, in the words of his agent, are these:—“It is now about two years ago since Lord Plunket resolved to remove Prendergast and his family from the estate in consequence of the part which his son had taken in the illegal proceeding of removing the stones of Miss Plunket's house. In common with others he took defence, put Lord Plunket to great expense, and vexatiously summoned him and his daughter to appear as witnesses at Castlebar. When upon that occasion the tenants yielded an unconditional submission, Prendergast and twelve other tenants received notice that they would be evicted in November. They were thus given six months to prepare for their departure. But when November came, instead of yielding peaceable possession, they compelled Lord Plunket to resort to forcible eviction. It was upon this occasion that, just as Prendergast was about to be evicted he was permitted by Lord Plunket, at the request of a friend, to remain upon the estate, on the condition that when a farm should be provided for him upon another part of the property he should leave his present holding. To this arrangement he then gladly and gratefully agreed. Since that time, however, it appeared that other influences had been brought to bear upon him. When the time for moving to the new holding arrived, he refused sturdily to go, asserting that he would not accept the best farm on Lord Plunket's property. He felt, no doubt, that it was more advantageous to his interests to be evicted and a martyr, as it were, in the cause.” But a further charge was made against Lord Plunket, that he had evicted those tenants in the month of November. He did so at that time—but why? The tenants had sown their seed crops. They had been served with notice eight months before; but Lord Plunket allowed them to remain until November, because, as he humanely said, as they had sown the seed they should reap the crops. Well, what is the grievance? The grievance is that these tenants walked out of their buildings in November, owing one and a half year's rent each, and taking with them their crops. My notion of Lord Plunket as a landlord is this, that a kinder-hearted and a better man does not live. The hon. Member for Dungarvan said that these tenants had been evicted because they had refused to send their children to Lord Plunket's schools. Why, what was the fact? Not one of those twelve families evicted had any children fit to send to those schools. As to the Rev. Mr. Lavelle, he, no doubt, had a perfect right to fill his church and his school by every means in his power. Now, I do not believe that in Her Majesty's dominions there is to be found a speaker who can express himself with more force than the Rev. Mr. Lavelle. I understand that the rev. gentleman sometimes displays his eloquence in the shape of appeals to the Irish people to relieve themselves from what he calls English connection and English tyranny. I believe, too, that he has been a professor in the Irish College of Paris. But the laws of France are rather sharper than those of England. I once met the rev. gentleman who was at that time at the head of the college. I met him on the occasion of the late Mr. O'Connell's departure for Italy. The rev. Dr. Miley was the gentleman to whom I allude. Dr. Miley whilst at the head of the College referred to, had, unluckily for him, the rev. Mr. Lavelle as a professor. The House may form a judgment of the peace and happiness of the College with a professor of such literary ability and warm temper as the rev. Mr. Lavelle. Differences arose between him and Dr. Miley. At length it was determined that one or other should go. Mr. Lavelle said, "I will not go." Under those circumstances an order was given on a certain day by Dr. Miley to the porter not to admit Mr. Lavelle into the College when he should return from a walk. Mr. Lavelle having presented himself at the door about eight o'clock in the morning, was informed by the porter that he could not be admitted. Mr. Lavelle insisted upon his right to enter, and suddenly darted down the street. In a few minutes he returned with a ladder, and before the President of the College or the porter could prevent him he ascended the wall and leaped down inside, and thus again was entrenched within the premises. As soon as Dr. Miley found he was within the building he consulted the Minister of Education. The Minister of Public Instruction sent a polite message to inquire of Mr. Lavelle whether he intended to persevere in his intention to remain against the command of his superior. On Mr. Lavelle replying that he did, the Minister of Public Instruction communicated with another gentleman of considerable authority—the Prefect of Police. He sent a hussier to invite Mr. Lavelle to leave; but he preferred to stay. The Prefect then drew out a paper, which, after referring to several articles of the Code, stated that for the preservation of public order it was necessary Mr. Lavelle should quit Paris within two hours. Mr. Lavelle then left France, when he could no longer remain there, and, unfortunately for the peace of mind of Lord Plunket and the tranquillity of his estate, settled himself down in Partry, and from that moment, with admirable skill, contrived to keep the place in hot water. Now, as to the question of education, it should be recollected that the Roman Catholics possessed about eleven-twelfths of the grant given for the education of all classes in Ireland. Surely, then, the Bishop of Tuam had a perfect right to establish a school at his own expense for communicating religious instruction in the way he thought best. Mr. Lavelle had succeeded in emptying the Bishop's school; but he hoped he would not succeed in inducing the House to listen to a Motion that was totally destitute of foundation, in point of fact, and contained no principle that could justify the House in adopting it. He believed the object of the Motion was to terrify landlords from taking any proceedings against their tenantry that might not be approved by those who exercised an authority over them to which they had no right by law. He wished the House not to suppose that there was a great quarrel existing between Irish landlords and their tenants; on the contrary, an agent with whom he had travelled told him that, instead of running after the tenants for the rent, they now came forward to pay it. The tenants were as a class meritorious and industrious, and were living on the best terms with nine-tenths of the gentry, who were recovering that consequence to which their position entitled them. For his own part, he detested ejections without good cause. In the north of Ireland they were almost unknown, and the tenantry were prosperous and comfortable. He wished them to be equally so in the west, and he was quite sure the kind-hearted people of that district would get on well with the Bishop and the gentry of the country if they were not stimulated into a course of conduct which brought them into trouble and did no possible good to the country.

MR. CARDWELL: The right hon. Gentleman has, with his usual ability, contrived to make an amusing speech on a subject which is of the most painful description to every one else. I wish to confine myself strictly to the question before the House, which is, whether this House will grant a Committee to inquire into the case that has been brought before them. Of the main facts there can be no doubt.

That Lord Plunket is an amiable man is known to all who have the advantage of his friendship. That he has spent large sums on the improvement of the district is known to all who are acquainted with that part of the country. That he and his friends have been zealous promoters of conversion to the Protestant faith of the Roman Catholics in the district is also true, and the result which unfortunately so often happens in Ireland under these circumstances followed in this case. In particular, during the last three years, since Mr. Lavelle has been settled in the district, a state of society arose deeply painful to those who are entrusted with the peace of the country; and at last a murder—the murder of Lord Plunket's ploughman—led to the application of the extraordinary powers entrusted to the Executive for the preservation of the peace. But I must say that there is no resemblance between this case and that which was discussed a few evenings ago, for there is here no charge of Ribbonism. In the case of the Derryveagh evictions there was a wholesale ejection of families on general grounds, without any personal application to any of the families evicted. In the case now before us it is charged on the one hand that all the evictions took place because the parents declined to send their children to the Protestant schools. On the other side that statement is met by a pointed and explicit declaration by Lord Plunket given on oath. ["No!"] I am speaking from a newspaper account of the trial where Lord Plunket was a witness, and where he made a statement on oath that no one of the persons evicted was evicted for this reason. This House has not the power to administer an oath, and if it had I do not think it would be disposed to exercise it in the present case. Would there be any use, then, in appointing a Committee to hear these motives ascribed to Lord Plunket on the one side, and to hear his Lordship on the other repeat the statements which he had already made in a more solemn manner, denying them, and which he has since reiterated in his published letter to Lord Cowley? Every argument that had weight against the Motion for inquiry the other evening had increased force now. Such an inquiry would be wholly without profit; it would not tend to elevate the character of the House; but it would make the House for the first time usurp the functions of the tribunals in a way that had undoubtedly never been done before. The powers of this House are without limit; but they are limited by our own sense of discretion and guided by the precedents of former generations, and I believe that no precedent can be produced of the House having acted in a manner so contrary to its functions, and so inconsistent with its prudence. I feel I shall best discharge the duty which devolves upon me by avoiding all discussion on the details of this most painful case. The feeling I entertain is one of deep regret that our common faith should become, not the cement of cordial union and good-will in this district, but a cause of discord and strife. I should deeply regret if one word were to fall from me tending to increase those feelings, and happy should I be if the discussion in this House, and the expressions of feeling which have come from both sides, were to reach that district, and tend to the restoration of unity and concord in that portion of the community.

Question again proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

FRANCE AND SWITZERLAND.

QUESTION.

MR. KINGLAKE said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What progress has been made towards effecting those "full and adequate arrangements" which, in Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech addressed to the Houses of Parliament in August last, were expressed to be confidently looked forward to as the means for "securing the neutrality and independence of the Swiss Confederation;" and whether (pending the Negotiations referred to in Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech) the continued occupation by France of Territories which have been declared to "form part of the neutrality of Switzerland" is sanctioned by any Provisional Agreement or understanding between the guaranteeing Powers? The hon. Member said, that if he had for a long time abstained from bringing this subject before the House it was not because there was any inclination on his part to desert the duty he had undertaken, nor from any belief that the subject had by any means diminished in importance; but he had remained silent because the declarations of Her Majesty's Ministers in the course of last Session coincided with the views which he entertained; and, therefore, he left the matter in the hands of the Government. He acknowledged that he knew of no act done, or words spoken or written, by Her Majesty's Ministers which should lead him to withdraw his confidence in them; but, considering that eleven months had now elapsed since the House had received any authentic information respecting the negotiations, and that during that interval France had remained in occupation of that territory which was the subject of dispute, and, considering the silence he had hitherto maintained, he thought he was justified in now venturing to call the attention of the House to the matter. He would endeavour to deserve the indulgence of the House by abstaining with great care from going again over the ground of last year; but it would be necessary, in order that he should be intelligible, that he should remind the House on one or two points. He would remind them, in the first place, that at the close of last Session the Royal Commissioners declared that Her Majesty confidently trusted that adequate arrangements would be made for maintaining the neutrality and independence of Switzerland. In 1815 arrangements were made, in terms not perhaps very grammatical but perfectly clear, by which it was declared that the provinces which were the subject of his Motion should form a part of the neutrality of Switzerland. Under these arrangements, it was provided that when war should actually occur, or even be imminent, the Sardinian troops should march out of this territory, and that the Swiss should be competent to occupy them with their own troops. In fact, the peculiar position of these provinces might perhaps be best understood by saying that, although for mere municipal and domestic purposes they were a part of the Sardinian Kingdom, yet, for what might be called European purposes, they were a part of Switzerland. That arrangement was obtained by Switzerland for her own benefit, as the result of earnest entreaties addressed by her to the English Minister of that day. It was most favourable to her, because she had a comparatively weak Power for her neighbour; and for all practical purposes she was as well situated as if those provinces had actually belonged to her. This being the case, Switzerland having this benefit provided for her, and being also entrusted with the duty of maintaining the neutrality of those provinces, as well as the neutrality of her own States, it was obvious that neither her right nor her duty could be annulled by any transaction to which she and the Great Powers of Europe were not parties. That was the view of the whole of Europe; because, when the Emperor of the French entered into the Treaty of Turin with the King of Sardinia, he acknowledged in very fair terms that he had no right to acquire that territory, except upon the same conditions as Sardinia held it. The contracting parties went on to say that it would be the duty (l'appartiendra) of the Emperor of the French to come to an understanding on the subject, both with the Great Powers and with the Swiss Confederation. It became important, therefore, with a view to the restoration of that tranquillity which had been disturbed by the annexation of Savoy and Nice, to see whether it was possible in any way to reconcile the acquisition of the main part of those provinces with the rights of both Switzerland and of Europe. It would have been easy for the Emperor, by giving up to the Swiss Confederation those provinces, or even the portion of them required to give Switzerland a good military frontier, to have done much towards allaying the indignation occasioned by the act of annexation last year. At one time, indeed, it was supposed that that would have taken place. The Emperor of the French, as they all knew, promised that these provinces should be given to Switzerland. That promise was afterwards withdrawn; but still it was hoped that a mere belt of mountains—which would have answered the purposes of Switzerland without in any way hurting the frontier of France—would have been conceded to Switzerland to replace her in the position she occupied before the Treaty of Turin. Such was the posture of affairs last year. It was then felt in this country that, if matters were allowed to remain in the condition to which that treaty had brought them, Switzerland would be grievously damaged; and he regretted to say that all the gloomy anticipations last year entertained on that head had been realized. Alarm and anxiety, varying in intensity from time to time, prevailed in Switzerland, and especially in that part which the French journals were beginning to call French Switzerland. The manner in which that country was affected by the late change in the map of Europe was very intelligible. In the first place those provinces which used to be the most valuable barriers for Switzerland had been converted not only into no barrier at all, but into what might be accurately described as the hostile lodgement of a great Power. The result was that the cantons of Geneva and Vaud were so hemmed in that their position became, as it were, paradoxical. They had France on all sides of them. Moreover, the inhabitants of Chablais, Faucigny, and Genevois were by the Treaty of Turin converted into Frenchmen. They were actually French subjects. It so happened that a very large portion of the inhabitants of Geneva were persons who had been born in those provinces; and the consequence, was that there having been a very large body of Frenchmen resident in Geneva, the number was now enormously increased by the operation of the Treaty of Turin. Any one who knew the configuration of the country would readily understand that there must necessarily be a very strong attraction continuing between Geneva and the inhabitants of those provinces. It would be recollected that in the course of last year an earnest effort was made by the people of Chablais and Faucigny to become annexed to the Swiss Confederation. That effort failed; and the result of the existing state of things was that the very men who had been the most anxious for annexation to Geneva, having themselves been annexed to France, were for the very same reasons now anxious to draw Geneva to themselves, and bring it into the same strait in which they themselves were placed. There was another difficulty caused by this treaty to which he wished the more to direct attention, because since he last had the honour of addressing the House there had returned something like French statesmen. Opportunity had been given for discussion, of which in former years France had been deprived; and, as the view which he was now about to take was the one most important, he would not say to the Emperor, but to France and the French people, he trusted it would receive the consideration it deserved. Look how the arrangements for the neutrality of those provinces would operate if nothing were done by the French Emperor. As matters stood before, the configuration of the country made it quite certain that the provisions of the Treaty of Vienna would be literally executed—because it was practically impossible for the King of Sardinia, even if he wished, to retain provinces situated like Chablais and Faucigny; and he must, therefore, have marched out his troops whenever war was imminent. But, supposing nothing was done, he entreated the House to reflect on what would be the operation of those stipulations which the French Emperor admitted to be binding. If war between neighbouring Powers should break out or should impend, what would be the duty of Switzerland? It would be to maintain the neutrality of those provinces. In case of war it would be the duty of Switzerland to call on France to evacuate those provinces, and to allow the Swiss to march in. But did any man believe that that was a stipulation which would or could be acceded to by the Emperor of the French? Did any one imagine that at the call of Switzerland he would march out of a territory which he alleged to be French? If he did not do so what would be the duty of Switzerland? Why, to attempt to make him by force of arms. Of course, that would be quite impossible. It would be preposterous to ask Switzerland to attempt it; and if she should not do it, what would be the consequence? That Switzerland would be in default towards the other Powers of Europe, who would be entitled to say, "Swiss neutrality has ceased:" the moment it was declared to have ceased for one side it would cease for the other; and the object which was so sedulously sought to be gained by the parties to the Treaty of Vienna would be for ever defeated. He believed that Swiss neutrality was an object more important to France than to Austria, or any of the German Powers. When they remembered that in 1814 it was by violating the Swiss neutrality and entering Franche Comté that Prince Schwartzemberg invaded France, every one would see that the neutrality of Switzerland was no less valuable to France than to the German Powers. He hoped, therefore, that this consideration would weigh with Frenchmen and that they would be disposed to influence the Emperor, so far as they could, towards rendering justice to Switzerland and reconstituting that neutrality of Switzerland which had been shaken and tampered with in the manner he had described. He was sorry to say that since the Treaty of Turin much had been done towards increasing the anxiety felt in the canton of Geneva, and that by many a new annexation to France was believed to be inevitable. It was said that in order to obtain votes persons known to be in the French interest had come into that canton as settlers; and that the fatal words "universal suffrage" had been again pronounced. The House might know, as a matter of common report, that a French Prince whose name was familiar to them had gone so far as to say that before long French Switzerland, as he called it, would be annexed to France, and that it would be annexed to France on its own petition. Those and other cries might appear slight when taken separately, but when taken together they were of considerable moment, more especially when looked to with the light afforded by the transactions of last year. The Emperor of the French must pardon him when he said that he felt it his duty to consider all his actions and all his words with constant reference, not to the mere fact of the annexation of Savoy and Nice, but with constant reference to the particular process by which that operation was effected. Well, now, taking that formula of the annexation of Savoy and Nice as his guide, he found we were now in what we might call "the denial stage." We were in the stage in which it would be formally denied that there was any intention to annex to France any portion of French Switzerland. Ascertaining that we were now in the denial stage, he ventured, following up his formula, to ask what would be the next? and his guide told him that the next stage would be that of solemn assurance that there would never be any annexation of French Switzerland to France without consulting the great Powers of Europe. The stage following that would be an actual annexation, accompanied by a mere statement of the fact to the great Powers of Europe, and perhaps a despatch to the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary; after which, when the noble Lord imagined himself to be consulted, and proceeded to give his reasons for thinking an annexation should not take place, he would be told that the discussion was one which could have no practical effect. He had never desired to occasion unnecessary alarm, and he was glad to be able to state that in this instance, so far from being an exciter of alarm, he ventured to think that the words which would come from him would rather have a contrary effect. Notwithstanding all those reasons for anxiety which he had ventured to refer to, it was not his belief that this annexation would take place;—but in saying that he must also express his belief that if it did not take place it would be prevented by the firmness of England. But for the firmness of England he would despair for Switzerland; but his opinion was that if the policy which Her Majesty's Government had hitherto adopted was continued with firmness the evil which many anticipated would not take place. The treatment which Switzerland had recently undergone at the hands of France had been accompanied by a very singular statement on the part of the French Government. It was alleged that in some of the communications on this subject to the Swiss Confederation the French Government distinctly stated that but for the interference of England, in endeavouring to prevent the annexation of Savoy and Nice, the Emperor of the French would have kept his promise, and ceded Chablais and Faucigny to the Swiss Confederation. What principle was this? That because England interfered a promise to Switzerland should be violated? What violence, what lawlessness, and, at the same time, what miserable weakness was implied in such a statement? The statement was unjust to Switzerland, and it was offensive in a high degree to England. He hoped that among the papers which the noble Lord would be able to give him was a despatch said to have been written by Captain Harris; and he further hoped that the noble Lord would make a statement which would satisfy the House that if a charge of so serious a description had been made it had been met in the way it deserved. It was admitted by every one—by the French Emperor as emphatically as by others—that some arrangement must be made with the great Powers. England had declared more than once that the present state of things was inconsistent with the public law of Europe. By the Speech from the Throne at the opening of the present Session they were led to expect that negotiations would be entered into on the subject. The Emperor of the French had said that Savoy and Nice were irrevocably annexed to France. He thought he went somewhat further, for, after giving a statement of the principles of the maintenance of rights and the generosity on which the Government had acted, he said, "Thus it is that Savoy and Nice are irrevocably annexed to France." At the same time there was laid before the Chambers a volume of despatches, compiled somewhat in the way that blue books were supplied to this House; and there was among these papers a despatch of so singular a description, as far as concerned Her Majesty's Government, that he thought it right to read a passage from it to the House, which he would do without comment, leaving to Her Majesty's Ministers to make what reply to it they thought proper. The despatch to which he referred was a circular addressed to the diplomatic representatives of France in all the Courts of Europe, dated the 30th of April, and it stated that the Government of the Emperor thought it important to enlighten the English Cabinet on the consequences of the annexation of the Italian provinces to Sardinia, and the connection it would have with Savoy and the county of Nice. The Ambassador of the Emperor entered into explanations on this subject, in the most positive terms, at the beginning of December. Not only had the Government of the Emperor no intention to conceal from the Ministers of the Queen their opinion on this subject, but Count Persigny had on his responsibility put forward the idea that England herself should propose to Europe this transference of Savoy to France. Now, that was so singular a statement that he had thought it right to draw the attention of the House to it; for they had always been told and believed—he was sure he now believed—that Her Majesty's Government had lost no opportunity of stating in the most express terms that they entirely disapproved, and that they would not for a moment listen to, the annexation of Savoy and Nice to France—not that they were perpetually saying this, but they would omit no fair opportunity of saying that was the case. Yet here was this strange statement by M. Persigny that the communications with the English Government were constant, and that they had gone to such a length—the House would see how much was implied in the statement—that M. Persigny had thought it right to suggest to the noble Lord that he himself should take the initiative and propose to Europe the annexation of Savoy and Nice to France. The diplomatic representative of France was ordered to read the despatch but not to leave a copy with the Ministers of foreign Courts, and, therefore, naturally it formed no part of the papers laid before the House of Commons. Now, so far as he was able to see, there remained this state of actual antagonism upon this subject between the Governments of France and England, and if that was so he must own he was not surprised to find that in France there was considerable stagnation of commerce. It would be strange if commercial men entered upon their enterprises at a time when this antagonism between two great Powers of Europe was actually ascertained to exist. As he understood it, he should say the policy of Her Majesty's Government was extremely well fitted for the peculiar occasion. At a time when a certain disturbance of the existing state of Europe was from time to time threatened, it was of great importance that there should be something like an intermediate state between perfect acquiescence and that greatest of all miseries, actual and flagrant war. Therefore, he thought that Her Majesty's Government did wisely in determining that when the French Government had, if he might so speak, dislocated the European system in such a way as not necessarily to force on England the duty of an appeal to arms, yet still in a manner so serious that acquiescence would be culpable—that deviation from the true course should be so manifested to Europe upon the authority of the English Government, that what France might gain in position she should lose in credit, and that the distrust which such a transaction was calculated to excite should be proportioned—more than proportioned—to the advancement she gained. Well, now, the papers which he was anxious to obtain, if there should be no objection, were of three kinds—first he wished any papers relating to the negotiations referred to by Her Majesty's Speech of last year. If the probability of attaining the result to which Her Majesty then looked forward had ceased, the means by which the Government attained to that knowledge must, he supposed, have some trace in writing, and if so, as he understood no negotiation was pending, he hoped there would be no objection to produce that class of papers. Then he should also be glad to receive papers respecting M. Thouvenel's circular of the 30th of April. Thirdly, he wished Captain Harris' note, and any other papers relating to the same subject. If the Secretary of State led them to think that there was not altogether a failure of all hope that something might be done by negotiations between Switzerland and France, he must say he believed that within a few days—on Monday last, he could answer for it—there was no prospect of effecting anything like a beneficial result by that means. If he were asked at what practical result he aimed in putting this question, he would say his object was to shut the stable door before it was too late by calling attention to the danger in which the Swiss Confederation was placed. He should be the very last person to press on Government the fruitlessness of negotiation if he saw the way to any practical result; but if there was nothing of this kind to be relied on—if they were to remain at arm's length—if after hopes had been raised by Her Majesty's Speech in August last nothing was to be done—if the Government were to do nothing, the responsibility of private Members of Parliament would begin; and he for one would certainly think it his duty, if nothing were done to carry out the policy of Her Majesty's Government as declared last year, to throw on the French Emperor the moral responsibility of the situation, and extend that circle of distrust which was fast gathering around him.

SIR ROBERT PEELE: I cannot say with my hon. Friend that I have not addressed the House before this Session, but I trust the House will allow me to offer a few remarks on a subject in which I have taken a great interest before the noble Lord rises to reply. The House will not, I am sure, grudge the time necessary for a brief discussion of this important question, which has excited very great alarm both in this country and on the Continent, and which, it is admitted by Her Majesty's Government, has imperilled the peace and security of Europe. My hon. Friend is right in saying that this is the first time this Session that we have ventured to bring the independence and neutrality of Switzerland before the House. But this has been, not because we believe that the subject is of less importance than it was last year, and certainly not because we believe the House of Commons will manifest a less generous spirit than it did last year, but because we have been desirous to avoid recrimination, to manifest a spirit of conciliation, and because we have been in the hope of meeting reciprocal assurances on the part of the Government of France. I think Her Majesty's Government will admit that we have been disappointed in that hope. There are a very few in this House, and I hope not many in the country, who maintain that England ought not to occupy herself with the affairs of the Continent. There are also some—but I trust they are not many—who may think that the treaty stipulations in which this country may have engaged are of no importance. I believe, on the contrary, that we are as much consulting the real interests of this country in taking up a question of this kind in a fair, liberal, and honest spirit, as in considering anything that can happen to the country. I must say I deplore on public grounds—I say nothing of my own personal feelings in regard to Switzerland—this series of annexations that is taking place during the rule of the noble Lord the present Foreign Secretary, to the positive detriment of the trade and commerce of this country in one place, and to the destruction of our honour and interests in another. I think that once this Session we ought to bring the subject under the notice of the House. My hon. Friend has alluded to two subjects. First, he adverted to the influence which the annexation of Savoy has had by the augmentation of the territory of France; and, next, he alluded to the influence of that annexation on the independence of Switzerland as guaranteed by the great Powers. These are the two views discussed by the noble Lord, the Foreign Secretary, in his circular of last year to foreign Courts. My hon. Friend has touched on the events of 1815, in which I will not follow him. I regard the annexation of Savoy to France as a fait accompli—there is no use, therefore, in discussing with France her past policy with Sardinia;—but in regard to Switzerland we are bound by treaty obligations to Europe, and by the prestige and honour of our own character, to consider the question in a public spirit. Her Majesty's Government told us at the close of last Session that they were going to enter into negotiations with France; but I am bound to say that if the Government have been disappointed in the expectations held out last August in the Speech from the Throne as to what they hoped to be able to accomplish with regard to the neutral provinces of Switzerland, the blame and the responsibility must rest entirely with them. From the very earliest time I have followed this question throughout, I have read all the documents published, not only in this country, but by the French Government and that of Switzerland; and I am bound to say that Her Majesty's Government, in their treatment of this question, so far as Switzerland is concerned, have acted to my judgment with the ability and the spirit that I expected from them. The noble Lord the Foreign Secretary has written several despatches, which may be found in our blue books, of remarkable interest. I would refer more especially to his despatches dated April 24, May 15, and July 18 of the present year, which both here and in Switzerland are considered honourably to represent the opinion of this country. In his despatch of the 24th of April to Lord Cowley, the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary remarks on the French arguments respecting neutral Savoy, and ably recapitulates the views of Her Majesty's Government as to the manner in which the question might be settled to the satisfaction of Switzerland and Europe. In the noble Lord's despatch to Lord Cowley of May 15, he defines the position which Her Majesty's Government mean to assume respecting the neutral territory, and boldly asserts that the manner in which the vote of the people of Faucigny, Chablais, and the Genevois was taken deprives it, in the sight of Her Majesty's Government, of all authority. The despatch of July 18, addressed to Lord Cowley for communication to the French Minister of Foreign Affairs, although written at M. Thouvenel's earnest request, was evidently written by the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary de son propre chef—at his own proper inspiration. The noble Lord in that despatch told Lord Cowley to communicate to M. Thouvenel that "the recognition of the annexation of Savoy to France was positively refused so long as the just and legitimate demands of Switzerland relative to the neutralized territory had not been taken into account by the Powers." For all these three despatches I give the noble Lord my most cordial thanks; and the people of Switzerland will, I am sure, reciprocate my views. The noble Lord the Prime Minister went even further. He alluded to this subject on the 14th of August last year in this House, and his opinions were so much more stringent even than those of the Foreign Secretary, that I shall be glad to recall them to my noble Friend's mind. The noble Lord the Prime Minister said—

"The neutrality and independence of Switzerland are for the interests of all Europe. . . . It was not simply and solely from a regard to the Swiss that the arrangement was made. It was from a wise and well-considered regard for the general interests of Europe, and the maintenance, as far as possible, of the peace of Europe."—3 Hansard, clx. 1809.]

This speech was made at the close of last Session, at the time when it was announced in the Speech from the Throne that the Government were then engaged in negotiations with a view of settling this most unhappy and unfortunate matter. But I will ask the House what has been the result of all these assurances? Absolutely nothing. All the Powers of Europe had been consulted. They had all expressed a strong condemnation of the policy of France. But although that condemnation may be some comfort to Switzerland, I greatly regret that nothing whatever has been done. I cannot help thinking that the position of England is wrongly interpreted. The people of Switzerland say, "Why does not England go on and support us?" But England was only one of the contracting parties to the Treaty of Vienna. I say, in the interests of Switzerland, it is idle to suppose that England will venture herself alone in a quarrel for that which the whole of Europe equally guaranteed. Russia, Sweden, Austria, Prussia, Portugal and Spain were all parties to the Treaty of Vienna. They all said they were anxious to defend the independence of Switzerland, and to meet in a Conference last year. But none was held. Why? It was impossible to hold it after the circular despatch of M. Thouvenel. He said the Powers might meet and discuss the matter, but they must recollect that the whole of Savoy was irrevocably attached to France, and they could not, therefore, treat that subject. Of course, when the French Government shut out the possibility of treating the only subject that could bring the Conference together the Conference was of no use. Then occurred the events in Syria, and other matters; and so nothing was done. But the noble Lord has said that, as the representative of this country, he will never recognize the annexation of the whole of Savoy to France until the just and legitimate rights of Switzerland have been acknowledged by the Powers of Europe. It is very curious on this subject to hear M. Thouvenel and the French Emperor talk of the uselessness of the Treaty of Vienna. But the other day, when Spain and Austria asked France to join them in supporting the Pope at Rome, what was the answer of the French Emperor? He said, "I should be very glad to join you, but the Treaty of Vienna maintained the position of the Pope as it stands, and without the consent of the Powers of Europe who are parties to that treaty I can do nothing." I want the French Government to follow that reply in their action with respect to the neutral provinces of Savoy. Let them adhere to the stipulations of that treaty, and all will be well, and then they would settle this miserable dispute, they would pacify that portion of Switzerland, and satisfy the just requirements of Europe. I go no further back than last year. The most positive assurances were then given to Europe as regards these neutralized provinces. The King of Sardinia from the Throne, in language most emphatic, stated—

"That in making a sacrifice which, although necessary, cost him a good deal, he reserved its ratification to Parliament and universal suffrage, and he expressly reserved, as regards Switzerland, the guarantees of international right she was entitled to lay claim to."

I find these assurances were repeated by Cavour, who said that the Treaty of Turin was only made on the distinct understanding of an adhesion to the 92nd Article of the Treaty of Vienna. Lord Cowley received repeated assurances to the same effect. My hon. Friend referred to the account of a conversation with un membre important du Cabinet, which had been laid before the French Chambers, and one or two extraordinary assertions made in that despatch from this country written by M. Persigny the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Department must explain. I hope the noble Lord will state who is the Cabinet Minister so distinctly referred to in that despatch. I am quite sure it was not the noble Lord himself, or the Prime Minister, or the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It must have been the Postmaster General or some subordinate member of the Cabinet at the time who made use of the extraordinary expressions contained in that document. At the very time that Sir James Hudson was giving assurances that nothing was done with respect to the provinces of Savoy, and while M. Thouvenel was making the same statement to Lord Cowley, M. Persigny writes from London to the French Minister for Foreign Affairs as follows:—

"I think it desirable that I should submit for your information details of an interview I yesterday had with an important Member of the Cabinet."

This, as I said before, must have been the Postmaster General, or, perhaps, the Duke of Argyll. M. Persigny said—

"If you could construct a submarine tunnel between Dover and Calais, this would be all very well in times of peace, and without any serious inconvenience in times of war, for each country would have the control of either extremity of the tunnel; but if one or other possessed the two extremities of the tunnel—that is to say, in this case, Dover and Calais—there would be very great danger to the other Power."

The membre important du Cabinet replies "True," and says no more. M. Persigny observed—

"Well, if the two slopes of the Alps were in the hands of one and the same Power, there would be a corresponding advantage either for defensive or offensive operations, and the tunnel through the Alps actually in course of construction replaces in our mind the imaginary submarine tunnel I have already alluded to."

The "important Member of the Cabinet" said in answer, "Indeed, that is true." M. Persigny continued—

"But that is not all, the advantage which Savoy, in the event of a European war, would offer to the Italian kingdom, or rather to the allies of that kingdom, to attack France, would, in a strategical point of view, be infinitely greater than our imaginary submarine tunnel between Dover and Calais in the hands of the English, for an English army starting from Calais would only attack France at one of its extremities, while a European army deploying from Chambery might in twenty-four hours take possession, between Vienne and Lyons, of our great line of communication between Paris and the Mediterranean, and cut France in two."

The important Member of the Cabinet answered, "Again too true." M. Persigny said—

"Well, it was this eventuality which the Emperor foresaw at the commencement of the Italian campaign; the independence of Italy could only establish itself in two ways, either by a confederation of the several Italian States or by the formation of one great State in the north of the Peninsula, and the Emperor declared to Sardinia, who consented, that in the latter alternative he would claim for the protection of France the French slopes of the Alps, and France would have been obliged to make this claim, even although she had not borne the brunt of the expenses of the struggle for Italian independence."

The reply of the membre important du Cabinet is, "that is true," and, indeed, he appears to have said nothing but "C'est vrai," "C'est bien vrai," and "C'est encore bien vrai." M. Persigny proceeds—

"I ask you if the two schemes of Italian independence—namely, a confederation of States or an Italian unity; one giving Savoy to France, the other retaining Savoy, which of these two schemes has the Emperor constantly advocated and recommended? Is it not the scheme which left Savoy to Sardinia?"

"True again," replied the important Member of the Cabinet. Thus, it appears that France actually proposed to leave Savoy to Sardinia. We never heard that from the noble Lord. M. Persigny continued—

"And if now the Emperor appears rather to incline to the scheme of a great kingdom of Italy, is it not owing to the recommendation and advice of the British Government?"

The reply was, "C'est encore vrai." M. Persigny said—

"What, therefore, in the conduct of the Emperor during all these transactions is more conspicuous than his thorough frankness."

The answer is not given, but, no doubt, it must have been—" C'est bien vrai." This despatch, I think, requires some explanation from the Cabinet Minister in question. My hon. Friend has alluded to the intelligence from Berne relative to the assertion made by the Political Department to the Federal Councillors, that it was owing to England alone that France had not given to Switzerland those neutral Provinces, and has asked the Government to produce the despatch which the British Minister at Berne had written in reply. It is a good despatch, and at once repudiates, on the part of the Government, such a representation. The British Minister at Berne wrote to the Federal Council a note of which the following is an extract:—

" Berne, June 13.

" Monsieur le President,—In the officially published report of the Political Department, to be submitted to the Federal Councillors, who will arrive in Berne on the 1st of July next, I have read, not without some surprise, the following passage in reference to the question of Savoy:—

" 'In conclusion, we believe that, in giving an unprejudiced representation of affairs, we cannot omit to mention the fact that, on the part of France, it has been repeatedly maintained that it was the obstinate opposition of England to any annexation which had principally compelled France to retract the promises given by her in February, 1860, with reference to the cession of Northern Savoy to Switzerland.'

" I have carefully re-perused the voluminous correspondence published on this question, but do not find such a motive anywhere mentioned as having determined France to secede from her promise. On the contrary, I find it repeatedly stated that the sole motive for this proceeding on the part of France originated in the disinclination of the people of Savoy for any dismemberment of the country."

I see with great jealousy the visits of General Dufour to Paris at present. I only wish to impress on Swiss statesmen the expediency of refusing to treat in any underhand or private manner with France. This is a European question, and is not to be dealt with by private negotiation, and if Switzerland attempts without the consent of the Powers of Europe to treat with France, the consequences might be extremely detrimental to the interests of Switzerland. I am quite ready to admit that there is an apparent lull about Switzerland at this time. It has been said in "another place" that Switzerland was perfectly quiet; but I can tell the House that there are at this moment preparations going on, silently but steadily, in that country. It is but natural that this should be the case. A large French army is now being drawn towards the borders of the Lake of Geneva. There are 60,000 infantry and 20,000 cavalry on active service in France more than appear in the official returns. That was stated in the French Chambers the other day, and has never been denied. But, to return to what occurred in "another place" with respect to this question, I find that Lord Carnarvon, who brought the subject forward, said that the fortresses of Switzerland were unguarded because the leading men of the country feared to take any step to place them in a state of defence lest it might be construed into a measure of defiance. He added—and it would perhaps be desirable that I should read what he did say to the House, as his words ought not, in my opinion, to be allowed to pass without comment. ["Order!"] Well, I shall content myself with simply observing that it was a few days ago stated in "another place" that there existed in every part of Switzerland apprehensions of some impending calamity, and that the recent visit of Prince Napoleon to Geneva had filled the public mind in that country with alarm. Now, that is not the case. Prince Napoleon, indeed, did not enter Geneva at all on the occasion alluded to; but, be that as it may, the Swiss—though they may see great danger in the movements of France—yet entertain no fear. They are not like the Savoyards. On the contrary, they have from the very first moment when this question began to be agitated displayed an energy and a determination which show that they are deserving the approval of Europe. They have manifested no craven spirit. The first decision of the Conseil Fédéral, upon the receipt of the intelligence to which I have adverted, was to order 25,000 men to be sent into Western Switzerland and to issue instructions that 100,000 men should be prepared to march. Le Grand Conseil de Berne took immediate steps to support the policy of the Federal Council. They said, we regard this question of Savoy "comme une question vitale pour la Suisse," and therefore it is that we are ready—" se declare prêt d'accord"—to undergo every sacrifice "pour atteindre ce but"—the maintenance of the independence of their native land. Well, this declaration was made on the 20th of March, 1860. The general elections in Switzerland took place in the following October, and the result was that the people of that country gave energetic expression to their approval of the policy of the Federal Government. Only two cantons, Vaud and Zurich, showed a hesitating spirit. What was the consequence? The people in those cantons strongly condemned the intrigues which their leaders sought to promote, and returned members to the Swiss Chamber who now support the views of the Federal Government. But that is not all. General Dufour, one of their most distinguished men, made a speech the other day, and I may be permitted to take this opportunity of expressing a hope that he will not, in the course of his present mission to France, vary from the determination at which he on the occasion to which I am alluding declared himself to have arrived. General Dufour on the 25th of January last said:—“We must repel without hesitation offers the most seductive, and, in appearance, the most profitable.” Now, I too, would recommend the people of Switzerland to resist these seductive offers, and to place themselves in the hands of Europe. It was, I may add, only this morning that I received a copy of the speech delivered by the President of the Confederation on the 1st of July on the occasion of the opening of the Swiss Chambers, and I find that in that speech he says, alluding to the dangers by which his country is surrounded—

“Switzerland must be prepared to spare no sacrifice, for none is too great for the defence of our liberties; neglect nothing to complete our system of defence; let us complete the armament of our troops; let us complete the fortifications upon all the points which require them, and let us open those means of internal communication which will facilitate the movements of our men.”

That extract, I think, shows that Switzerland is taking most active steps in making preparations for defending herself against any attack which she may anticipate. But it was, as I before stated, said in “another place” that the fortresses of Switzerland and her military stores were practically unguarded, because, although the inhabitants of the country recognized the danger which impended over them, her leading men feared to take any step to place her in a state of defence, lest it might be construed into a defiance towards France. Now, I have here a statement made by General Dufour of the military preparations of Switzerland at this moment, and it may be interesting to hon. Members to know what would be likely to be her position in this respect in case any attack were made upon her. General Dufour says:—“We have an army of more than 100,000 men, and the Landwehr makes 50,000 more—that is to say, we can calculate on an army of 150,000 soldiers, armed, equipped, and sufficiently instructed to be opposed to the best disciplined troops”—and the House should recollect that the surface of the country is such that skilful manœuvring and charges of cavalry are almost impossible. He goes on to say “we possess a number of skilful marksmen, as well as of volunteer corps; our parks of artillery are at full strength, our batteries are numerous, well equipped, and ready for immediate service.” “The Confederation,” he adds, “has procured all the guns of large calibre which will be necessary for the armament of our fortifications, our arsenals are well secured, and all the arrangements for the commissariat are made.” He concludes with this remarkable sentence—“The expense which results from all this organization is in itself a proof that Switzerland sets a high value on her neutrality, and that she is determined to defend it most earnestly.” Now, I submit that Switzerland is resolved to defend her liberties, and I know that any political manœuvres resorted to with the view of extorting from her an acquiescence in the policy of France cannot intimidate her into submission. Such an attempt may be made, but I am quite certain it will fail. The other day at a meeting of French officers in the neighbourhood of Switzerland, the effect of what was styled the glorious policy of the new Emperor in restoring Savoy to her destinies formed the topic of consideration, and, no doubt, the principle of universal suffrage—that admired instrument in the hands of despotism—would seem to have elicited in favour of that project an apparent unanimity on the part of the Savoyards. I, however, maintain that that apparent unanimity is contrary to the real feelings of the people of that country, and that every one who listens to me must be thoroughly alive to the absurdity of the operation by which that solemn act of adhesion on the part of Savoy to France was effected. I have here and elsewhere resisted that annexation, and I think the nations of Europe did wrong in permitting the matter to proceed as they did. The statesmen of this country will, I am afraid, sooner or later regret the conclusion at which the question arrived; but, be that as it may, the case of Switzerland and that of Savoy are widely different. The Savoyards fell into the trap which was laid for them. Disorganized, deceived, and neglected, they became the ready victims of a conspiracy by means of which their ancient rights and liberties were sacrificed. It is not so with Switzerland. The French Emperor may tempt her with promises. All the schemes which a subtle Macchiavellian policy can suggest may be laid against her liberties; but will they be successful? I, who am acquainted with that country, am happy to think that such will not be the case. I know that in the bosoms of these men still exist the patriotic sentiments, and the Swiss still pride themselves on the glorious traditions of their race. Louis Napoleon will find it a more difficult task to deal with them than with the Savoyards. I would simply add that a second edition of an admirable work on Italy by Lord Broughton has been recently published. The history of Julius Cæsar, is there referred to, and if the Emperor of the French will dwell upon that history, he will find that Julius Cæsar, in the words of Suetonius, jure cæsus existimetur because he attempted to destroy the liberties of his own people. Now, I would ask Louis Napoleon to reflect what may possibly be the lot of a man whose policy—God forbid it should ever happen—leads him without reason or justice, or any offence on their part, to destroy the freedom of an ancient and a friendly people? I feel certain that Louis Napoleon will not succeed; and this I can predict that if he dares to take a single step beyond the limit to which he has already gone, he will find that, so far from grinding down the Swiss people or humbling them to his will, his policy will only have the effect of rousing every man in Switzerland to engage in a patriotic struggle, and of causing the brave people of that country to spurn unanimously the smiles and flattery of a despot.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, I cannot deny that it is perfectly natural that my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgwater should ask for some explanation with respect to the statement made in Her Majesty's gracious Speech at the close of the last Session of Parliament to the effect that, although the proposed Conference on the subject of the cession of Savoy and of Nice to France had not been held, Her Majesty confidently trusted that in any negotiations which might take place full and adequate arrangements would be made for securing, in accordance with the spirit and letter of the Treaty of Vienna of 1815, the neutrality and independence of the Swiss Confederation. But, before I enter upon that question, it may be as well to refer to some circumstances which have been mentioned in the course of this debate, and which, although they have been explained before, perhaps require some further elucidation. It appears now to be perfectly clear—not from any diplomatic documents, but from what has been reported and not denied—that before the Italian war took place, in the summer or autumn of 1858, an agreement was come to between the Emperor of the French and the Prime Minister of the King of Sardinia by which hopes were held out that French troops would be sent to the assistance of the King of Sardinia in case he should be attacked by Austria, and by which it was stipulated that if the result of the war should be to give Lombardy and Venice to Sardinia, in that event Savoy and Nice should be surrendered to France. As I have heard the story, Count Cavour is reported to have said “That is a matter to be considered;” and the expression of his opinion or wish that it should be considered was taken by France as an assent. The war took place in the following spring, but the result was not the conquest of Lombardy and Venice, because the Peace of Villafranca provided only that Lombardy should be surrendered to France, in order that France might afterwards transfer it to Sardinia. But consequent upon that war insurrections took place in Modena, Parma and Tuscany, and those central duchies declared that their wish was to annex themselves to the kingdom of Sardinia. There is a phrase which has been used more than once by French Ministers, and which was referred to by the hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth—namely, that the favour which was given by England to these annexations was the cause of the annexation of Savoy and Nice to France. I understand the meaning of that phrase to be that, Venice not having been conquered by France or given to Sardinia, it was not in contemplation for a considerable time that the proposed cession of Savoy and Nice to France should take place. But then it was said that if England had interfered in order to procure the restoration of Tuscany, Modena, and Parma to their former Sovereigns, the aggrandizement of Sardinia would not have been such that the Emperor of the French would have asked for the cession of Savoy and Nice. Whatever may be the truth with respect to these allegations, it was, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, impossible for them to be a party in any way to counsel or to advise that force should be used against the people of Central Italy, with the view of obliging them to recall the Sovereigns whom they had ejected, and whose rule they repudiated. Therefore, if the non-annexation of Savoy and Nice to France was to be bought by the use of force, or the consent to the use of force, to subjugate the people of Central Italy, it was our opinion that it would be far better not to interfere with the inhabitants of the three duchies, but to proclaim aloud the principles of non-intervention, be the consequences what they might. The duchies did declare in a very solemn way, by their representative assemblies, their wish to be annexed to the kingdom of Sardinia. The question of the cession of Savoy and Nice was again brought forward, and the consequent negotiations terminated in the Treaty of Turin, by which Savoy and Nice were surrendered by the King of Sardinia to the Emperor of the French. I shall not revert to the correspondence which took place upon that subject. The hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth has admitted that we used the strongest language which was compatible with friendly relations in order to express our objections to the Treaty of Turin. Upon various occasions we stated that we did not agree in the opinion that this extended frontier was necessary to France. We said even that we considered it would be a disadvantage to France to give the example of that annexation; and we pointed out—as a separate, but, at the same time, a very considerable question—that the neutrality and independence of Switzerland would be impaired by the transfer of Savoy to France, instead of remaining part of the dominions of the King of Sardinia. That question led to further debate, and in one of the last despatches published in the blue book, M. Thouvenel stated that the Treaty of Turin having referred to an understanding to be come to among the great Powers, such understanding might be arrived at in one of the several ways. He said it was proposed to reconcile the 92nd Article of the Act of Vienna with the 2nd Article of the Treaty of Turin, and he pointed out how that might be done. It might be done by a conference of the Powers of Europe; it might be done by notes giving the consent of Europe to the transfer, the Emperor assuming towards the Powers those obligations which the King of Sardinia had previously fulfilled—namely, that in case of war the King of Sardinia should evacuate a certain portion of Savoy, called the neutralized territory, and that Switzerland should have military command in that neutralized territory during the continuance of such war; or, thirdly, it might be done by an understanding between France and Switzerland, which should be communicated to the Powers of Europe. The opinion of Her Majesty's Government was very promptly formed, and that despatch of M. Thouvenel being dated June 20, on the 25th of the same month a despatch was addressed by me to Lord Cowley, in which I stated that Her Majesty's Government were prepared to accept a conference on the mode in which this very important question should be settled. M. Thouvenel replied that the Government of the Emperor were ready, on their part, to adopt the course which the other Cabinets might desire, and which might seem to them best suited to the subject. That was the course which Her Majesty's Government desired, and it was the course which Switzerland had always proposed. The only request made by Switzerland to the Government of Her Majesty was that this question should be settled in a conference of the great Powers of Europe. In proposing to assent to a conference, therefore, we did everything that Switzerland had ever asked. But it was of no use for the Emperor of the French to propose this course, or for Her Majesty's Government to assent to it, as long as the other Powers of Europe were not consenting parties. The consent of the other Powers was not obtained. Prince Gortschakoff, the Minister of the Emperor of Russia, declared himself perfectly satisfied. He said that Russia considered that, provided Sardinia was willing to cede this territory, and the Emperor of the French was willing to accept it—provided that the Emperor of the French accepted it with the obligations, or servitudes, as they are called, to which the King of Sardinia had been subjected by the Treaty of Vienna—the transaction was complete; Russia had not a word of objection to offer, and so no need of any further conference or negotiations. Russia, therefore, was not prepared to send a representative to the proposed conference. The Emperor of Austria and the King of Prussia expressed no wish to have a conference. Their opinion was that no advantage could be derived from a conference; and they, therefore, expressed by notes that they did not desire a conference. The French Minister even interpreted a note of the Minister of the Emperor of Austria as being an acquiescence in what had taken place, and an admission that the possession of Savoy and Nice by France was thenceforward part of the public law of Europe. Her Majesty's Government, of course, could not press for a conference in which the other Powers were not willing to take part; but they could do one thing, and that one thing they did. They could say that, sufficient security not having been provided for Switzerland, and the neutrality and independence of that country having, in their opinion, been impaired by the Treaty of Turin, they could not, without further negotiation, whether in the shape of conferences or otherwise, hold that the annexation of Savoy and Nice was part of the acknowledged public law of Europe. That was stated in a diplomatic document; and, having done that, they could not have gone further unless they had found a disposition in Austria, Russia, and Prussia to agree with them in endeavouring to arrange such terms as would place the neutrality of Switzerland in a state of greater security. But, though no such conference was assembled and no such agreement was come to, the question of the neutrality and independence of Switzerland as guaranteed by the Treaty of Vienna still remained so guaranteed, and it is an obligation which I trust the Powers will not repudiate. It was an additional security to that neutrality and integrity that such a Power as Sardinia should hold Savoy, and that a portion of the territory should be neutralized in case of war; but that was not the neutrality and independence of Switzerland herself, though it was an additional security to her. What remains to be done has been eloquently stated by the hon. Baronet; it is that Switzerland should herself assert, without delay and by every means, her determination to defend her own independence, and to maintain that neutrality which has been guaranteed by the Powers of Europe. I know not what dangers may threaten Switzerland, but of this I feel certain—that if the Powers abandoned a cause so just and so strongly guaranteed as the neutrality of that country, they would not only fail in the obligations of treaties, they would not only commit a dishonourable act, but they would shake the security of every State in Europe. The hon. Baronet has truly said that Great Britain, in this case, cannot act alone; but I entirely agree with him as to the interest which he says this country has in preserving her connections and alliances with the various Powers, and in maintaining that independence of the several States of Europe which is generally known by the name of the "balance of power." I believe that if she tried in any selfish spirit to set aside any part of her moral obligations, and endeavoured to insulate herself from the other Powers, though there might be seeming security in that position, it would soon fail, and she would find herself abandoned by all the States whose interests she had herself disregarded. We have seen in recent transactions the advantage of European concert. There was considerable danger, many persons thought, in what happened last year in Syria, when the whole mind of Europe was shocked by the dreadful massacres which took place in that quarter. We appeared to be placed between two dangers. The one was that the massacres would be repeated in various parts of the Turkish Empire, and that Mahomedan fanaticism would have its full sway, and play a part of blood and rapine which would raise all the Powers of Europe against the maintenance of the Turkish Empire. On the other hand, if European occupation were permitted, there was the danger that the occupation by one Power might be continued, and that the example might be followed by others of the Powers who were neighbours of Turkey. The Powers agreed in concert at Paris that a body of French troops should go to Syria, with a view to prevent a repetition of the massacres and their extension to other parts of the Turkish Empire. The time came when it appeared to us that the occupation might be safely discontinued, and that there was, in fact, far more danger in its continuance than in its cessation, and that opinion was expressed to the assembled Powers at Paris. The Russian Government gave the directly opposite opinion that there would be the greatest danger in France relinquishing the occupation of Syria; but the determination to which Her Majesty's Government had come was, in fact, binding on all the Powers. They all agreed that if the Sultan required that the occupation should cease, it was impossible that the Powers could insist on its prolongation, and Her Majesty's Government supported the Sultan in that demand. The French Emperor showed his good faith, as I stated in this House that I fully expected he would, by withdrawing his troops on the very day that had been stipulated. That is one indication that the Powers are disposed to treat questions such as these in such a manner as may lead to their pacific solution. Again, there is this very question of Italy. It is well known that the French Government have repeatedly expressed their preference for a confederation of States—for one Italian Power in the north, another in the centre with the Pope at its head, and another in the south, with perhaps other smaller States interspersed—to the unity of Italy. But the people of the country declared in favour of unity; and the Emperor of the French has amply acknowledged the legitimacy of the title of the King of Italy. Here also Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the Emperor of the French are entirely agreed in respecting the principle of the national will of a people who, I trust, are destined to renew their former glory in arms and in the arts of peace. Other questions are still pending, some of them on the Continent of Europe, and some may also arise in the unhappy war which is now taking place in America. If France and England can act in harmony on these subjects it will be a great benefit, not only to the two countries themselves, but to Europe and the world. We have on every occasion made the frankest communication to France of our opinions and views in regard to them, and I must say that we have been met by France in a very proper spirit. I trust that, whatever unfortunate differences may have existed at any time last year, we shall now continue to act in concert and harmony, that the peace of the world may be preserved, and that these two great nations may combine to promote the best interests of the world.

IRISH CONVICT PRISONS. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD NAAS rose to call the attention of the House to the recent changes in the Board of Directors of Irish Convict Prisons, and said that at the time of the abolition of the transportation system, in 1854, an inquiry was made into the convict establishments of Ireland, which were found to be in a state of the greatest disorder, and a thorough reform took place; and he believed that the new system, under the direction of Captain Crofton, had proved a complete success. When transportation ceased it was feared that great evils would arise from the necessity of maintaining so many unreformed men at home, but in Ireland that apprehension had been proved to be unfounded. A new system had been established in that country. Convicts, in the earlier stage of their detention, were subjected to almost complete separation. They were then placed at work in the open air. They were then passed to an intermediate prison, where they enjoyed a modified freedom, and they were finally released on tickets-of-leave, which differed from tickets-of-leave in England, inasmuch as the men were still kept under the supervision of the police. Knowledge of each individual's character was sought. Industrial training was offered, and by a judicious system of marks the convicts could shorten the period of their detention, and on their release receive a small sum to put them in the way of earning their livelihood. The experiment of the intermediate prisons had been completely successful, as not a single instance of attempting to escape had occurred; and another advantage which was obtained was that a most complete supervision was obtained over the convicts after they had left the prison. The directors of prisons were acquainted with the exact condition and state of those who had been under their care, and it was not, therefore, assumed that every man who did not bring himself within the purview of the criminal law was put down, as a matter of course, as doing well. In addition to other advances, the Irish convict system had been the means of furnishing more valuable criminal statistics to the country than had ever been furnished before. In order to show the House how complete had been the success of the licence system, he would state a few statistics on that point. In 1854 the number of prisoners detained in the Government prisons in Ireland was 3,933, and on the 1st of January, 1861, it was only 1,492. The number of licences issued was 1,462, and the number revoked 89, of which 30 were revocations for irregularity. Only 10 per cent of those who had passed through the intermediate prisons had returned to them. The success of this system in an economical point of view was quite as extraordinary. The cost of Irish convict establishments was £28,000 a year less in 1860 than in 1856, and the cost of maintaining 2,220 convicts at Chatham and Dartmoor was £28,000 a year more than the cost of the whole of the Irish establishments, which contained about the same number. With such results it was no wonder that the system should have been lauded by the press both at home and abroad, and that distinguished foreigners who had seen it in operation should attempt to introduce it into their own countries. It was, therefore, with great regret that he saw it was proposed to make an important change in the Prisons Board, by not filling up a vacancy in the Board of Directors. At all events that seemed to be their intention, from the somewhat ambiguous answers which had been made by the Irish Secretary in that House in reply to questions which had been put to him on the subject. The duties of Chairman of that Board were very onerous, there being no less than five prisons, two refuges, and nine reformatories to manage. The Government would probably defend their proceedings on the ground that three Directors managed the prisons of England, and a smaller number might manage those of Ireland. As far as saving was concerned, the full salary of a Director was only £600 a year, and since the vacancy the services of an assistant had been obliged to be had recourse to, so that the actual saving was only £300. He would also point out that the governors of prisons in England received a much higher salary than those of Ireland, and performed duties somewhat akin to that of Directors in Ireland. The system went on and worked well; but more assistance would be required for the future. It was said that three Directors were found sufficient in England, and that a smaller number would be sufficient for Ireland. The circumstances of the two countries were, however, widely different. A high authority in Ireland had given it as his opinion, that it was utterly impossible that the duties of the Irish Board could be performed, unless further assistance was rendered by the Government. He (Lord Naas) thought that the alarming disturbances which lately occurred in Chatham were owing to the want of some central directing authority. There was not one such instance in the convict prisons in Ireland. Captain Crofton, who had had the management of the convict department in Ireland, and to whom the public were deeply indebted for the success of his experiment, was resolved to retire unless he was supplied with sufficient means to carry out his system. He thought it would be a great public misfortune if Captain Crofton resigned the office which he had filled with so much credit to himself and satisfaction to the public. He hoped that he had stated such facts as would induce the Government to reconsider their determination, and to make such arrangements with Captain Crofton as would induce him to remain some time longer in the service of the public. He thought that if it were shown to Captain Crofton that he would have the cordial assistance of the Government, he would not, under the pressing circumstances of the case, be disposed to carry out his present resolution to retire.

MR. CARDWELL could assure the noble Lord it was not necessary, as far as the Government were concerned, to show the value of the convict system in Ireland. That system was instituted by the Government of Lord Aberdeen, and it had been followed by the most satisfactory results. He (Mr. Cardwell) had always given that system his most cordial support. He concurred entirely with the noble Lord as to the value of the services of Captain Crofton, and had recommended the Treasury to increase the remuneration of that able officer, when he added to his other duties those of inspector of reformatories. As to the intention of the Government with respect to the Prisons Board the circumstances were these. The other day there occurred a vacancy in the County Prisons Board, and it occurred to the Irish Government that by appointing one of the Convict Directors to the vacancy, and thus forming a union between the two Boards, increased efficiency would be obtained. With this view it was intended that Mr. Lantaigne should be appointed to the vacancy without resigning his seat at the Convict Board; but it was found that there was a difficulty in the way, and Mr. Lantaigne was then appointed to the County Prisons Board, and resigned his seat at the Convict Prisons Board. It then became necessary to consider whether the vacancy should be filled up or not. When the system was first established it was the intention of Parliament that the number of Directors should be reviewed from time to time. The system then was new, and the number of convicts was 4,000. Now it was working excellently, and the number of convicts was less than 1,500—a result, no doubt, very creditable to the system. In the month of May he received from the Directors a proposal that, inasmuch as the time of Captain Barlow, the Inspector of convicts at Spike Island, had been relieved by the removal of the convicts from Forts Carlisle and Campbell, he should be taken to Dublin to assist the Directors. That was carried into effect, and he was now engaged in further inquiry as to whether or not it was right to fill up the vacancy. The Irish convict system was established by a Government of which he had the honour to be a member. To that system he had always given, and should continue to give, the most cordial support—no object of small economy would induce the Government to impair its efficiency—but when a vacancy occurred in any department it was the duty of the Government carefully to consider whether or not it was necessary to fill it up. Captain Crofton would have the best support of the Government in the discharge of his laborious duties. He was sorry to hear that the health of that gentleman was so bad, but hoped that it would soon be sufficiently restored to enable him to continue the discharge of his duties.

MR. WHITESIDE trusted that the expression of opinion by the House would prevent a valuable department being sacrificed by a course which the right hon. Gentleman was rashly going to take. The gentleman who was at the head of this department had a peculiar genius for the office. Captain Crofton had succeeded in accomplishing what no other man, perhaps, had been able to effect—namely, in showing that no criminal, however great, was incapable of being reclaimed. Captain Crofton had succeeded in a great degree in his noble task of reformation. When the late Government proposed to consider whether the punishment of death might not be abolished for a great many offences, he (Mr. Whiteside) was induced, from his observations of Captain Crofton's system of secondary punishment, to concur in the opinion that the punishment of death might be abolished for all crimes except that of murder. The right hon. Gentleman did not appear to be advised by anybody in Ireland who could give him sound advice, and it was believed that he had intimated his intention to change a system that had worked extremely well, without having the courtesy to consult the eminent gentleman who was at the head of the department. The excuse of ill-health put forward by Captain Crofton was, it was generally supposed, but the expression of that officer's disgust at the way in which he had been treated by the Government. He (Mr. Whiteside) asked whether this was the act of Lord Carlisle, or whether it was recommended by Colonel Larcom? Was it the intention of the right hon. Gentleman to break up a system which had proved so successful, and which had given satisfaction to the people of all religious denominations? He did not complain of the right hon. Gentleman's wishes—it was of his conduct he complained. It appeared that the right hon. Gentleman had borrowed the services of the Inspector of Spike Island, when Captain Crofton said it was impossible to do without further assistance. In acting thus the Government were enabled to save £200 a year, at the risk of breaking up the department which had attracted the notice of every philanthropist in Europe. He had a high respect for the right hon. Gentleman, but he could not help thinking that there was great danger and mischief in his attempting to undertake the Government of Ireland alone.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS had never heard a charge which had less foundation than that which had been made against his right hon. Friend, of endeavouring to overthrow the convict system of Ireland. That system had been strictly adhered to by his right hon. Friend, and there was not the smallest ground for the imputations which had been cast upon him. What he had done he was called upon by his duty to the public to do—namely, when an office fell vacant, to consider whether the public service required that it should be filled up. In England the number of convicts was 8,000, while in Ireland it was only 1,500; or rather less. The Board of Management in England consisted of only three persons; and as he was convinced that the recent disturbances at Chatham, to which reference had been made, arose in no degree from insufficiency of superintendence, there was a prima facie case that the number in Ireland was unnecessarily large. Something had been said of the greater expense of English as compared with Irish convicts; but, in making such a comparison, it was necessary to bear in mind the earnings of the English convicts. It appeared to him that the course which had been taken by his right hon. Friend was fully justified by the circumstances, and he trusted that these continual appeals for the increase, or against the diminution of establishments would not discourage the Executive in performing what used to be thought one of its most important duties—namely, keeping the expenditure of the administrative departments within reasonable bounds.

MR. MONSELL said, the speech of the right hon. Gentleman (Sir George Lewis)

involved a complete fallacy. His strong point was that as the 8,000 English convicts were managed by three Directors Ireland could not require so many to manage 1,500. But the difference between the two countries was this—that the work left to be done in England by the governors of the prisons was in Ireland done by the Directors themselves—they became acquainted with each individual convict, and kept their eye on them for years after they had left the prison. The right hon. Gentleman talked of economy; but he believed there would be no economy at all, for what was taken from the Directors would be added to the governors of prisons. But if they wanted economy—though he did not think there were too many offices in Ireland—he would recommend the Government to abolish an aide-de-camp or two, which Ireland would cheerfully sacrifice rather than risk the abandonment of a system of prison discipline which was attracting the attention, not of this country alone, but of the whole civilized world.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the impression seemed to prevail that his right hon. Friend was about to make important changes in the system of prison discipline. But his right hon. Friend had stated in the most explicit terms that he contemplated no change whatever, and that the only question was whether, seeing an establishment of three Directors was thought sufficient when the Irish convicts amounted to 4,000, a smaller number of Directors might not be adequate now that the convicts had fallen to 1,500? But his right hon. Friend had not even decided on that step; he was only trying whether the experiment would answer, and he hoped the House would not force the Government to fill up the appointment before the experiment was fairly tried. He could not believe that Captain Crofton, for whom he had the highest respect, was at all concerned in this attempt to force the Government to fill up the vacancy.

Mr. KINNAIRD was surprised that the right hon. Gentleman should have made this imputation on Captain Crofton. That Gentleman had taken no steps whatever in opposition to the Government; he offered to resign his appointment. It was they who believed that the system of Captain Crofton was a most admirable one, and who believed that it was in jeopardy from Captain Crofton's resignation in consequence of the increased duties put upon him, that they were induced to come forward and insist that his duties should be lightened by the vacancy being filled up.

Mr. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, that the right hon. Baronet had put the case in a most unfair light to the House. What was the state of the case? Here was a system of convict discipline not only far superior to that in England, but such that it had attracted the attention and was commented on by all who took an interest in these questions throughout Europe. Captain Crofton's system was, he believed, the most perfect system of convict discipline that had yet been adopted. But it was not the Government that could claim any credit for this system; it was not the Government that commenced the system; the whole credit of it was due to Captain Crofton. Now, that system being perfectly successful, a vacancy occurred, and the Government hesitated to fill it up, their plea being economy. He believed the saving would be somewhere about £200 a year; and for that sum this admirable system was to be put in jeopardy. What they said was this—that when Captain Crofton had established a system the beneficial results of which had attracted the notice of statesmen and philanthropists all over Europe, it was only fair that the Government, before making any change in the appointments, should have consulted Captain Crofton. ["Hear!"] He observed that hon. Gentlemen opposite cheered that statement, but he believed no communication had been made to Captain Crofton whatever; or if there was, it was made in such a manner as left him no room to express his opinion. Captain Crofton felt that as he was not properly supported by the Government, nor supplied with the proper assistants to work out his plans, it would be better for him to resign, and it was to prevent that they now urged on the Government to give him that support to which he was so well entitled.

Mr. BEAMISH strongly urged on the Government to support Captain Crofton, as the results of his system were more than enough to justify a greater outlay than it incurred.

WAKEFIELD NEW WRIT.

RESOLUTION. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read for resuming Adjourned Debates on Question proposed [28th June],

"That Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown to make out a New Writ for the Electing of a Burgess to serve in this present Parliament for the Borough of Wakefield, in the name of William Henry Lenthall, esquire, whose Election has been determined to be void."

Question again proposed.

MR. SERJEANT PIGOTT said, that having been Chief Commissioner to inquire into the corruption practices at a recent election for the borough, he rose to state his conclusion that the writ ought not to issue. The hon. Member for Beverley (Major Edwards) who had moved the writ had stated no sufficient reason why the writ should issue for a borough of which the Commission of Inquiry had reported that the electors had been guilty of gross corruption and bribery, and that these practices had been committed by all parties. If Wakefield suffered any inconvenience from not being represented, it was the proper consequence of its own act. The Report of the Commission was entirely borne out by the evidence. Should the writ issue, it would seem as if the House, instead of marking its sense of the corruption to the electors, intended to give them a second opportunity of displaying it in the same Parliament. This question ought not to be treated with the levity with which it seemed to be met on the former evening, when it was said there were Members in the House who were known to have obtained their seats by bribery. [Cheers from the Opposition, and cries of "Reading."] Let the House consider what bribery was. ["Oh, oh!"] Mr. Justice Blackstone called it "the infamous practice of corruption;" and another high authority declared it to be "poisoning the fountain of public security." The House should express its determination in tones that admitted of no mistake to do its best to repress bribery. What was the use of issuing a Commission of Inquiry if they did not act upon their Report? The object and end of such a Commission was to punish a place where bribery had extensively prevailed. If one party only in a borough was implicated it would be unjust to suspend the writ, because in doing so they would confound the innocent with the guilty; but where it was found that the heads and subordinates of all parties were engaged in the same corrupt work, surely the borough ought to be punished. It might be said that the steps taken by the House should be definite, and that it was unconstitutional to keep the writ in abeyance. But was it not both constitutional and according to precedent that the House should suspend a writ in such a case during its pleasure? It was done with regard to Liverpool in 1831. The Committee declared that gross bribery, treating, and corruption prevailed at the election for that borough in 1830, and it was decided by the House that the writ should not go. Again, in the case of Stafford, the writ was suspended in 1835 on the same grounds, after the Report of a Select Committee. More recently the House also chose to suspend the writ for Nottingham, but without a Report from a Select Committee. These instances showed that the House had full power, if it chose to exercise it, to suspend the writ in the present case. There would be no injustice in punishing the whole borough for bribery which was common to the whole borough. He believed it would be a wholesome lesson to constituencies if the writ were suspended. Bribery was not more engrained in society now than was duelling formerly. The latter was put an end to by a firm exposition of the law on the part of a Judge whom they had lately lost, and he believed the former would be put down too by a firm declaration of the opinion of the House. He should vote against the Motion of the hon. Member opposite.

MR. KNIGHTLEY hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, after the clear and distinct promise which he had given on that night week, would not oppose the issue of the writ. He admitted that there were precedents for the suspension of writs; but the course, except while inquiries were in progress, was inexpedient and unconstitutional. If the places were really corrupt, the proper course was to follow the precedent set with respect to Sudbury and St. Albans, and to disfranchise them altogether. But such a course ought not to be pursued in isolated instances; it ought to be extended to all places in which corruption was shown to be deep-rooted and wide spread. The hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down had accused him of levity in speaking of the subject of bribery. He denied that he had treated the matter in any such spirit. The hon. and learned Gentleman certainly could not be accused of having spoken with levity, for he had rarely listened to a more solemn or, he would add, dreary speech. Nobody denied that bribery had taken place at Wakefield; but anybody who read the Reports of Committees or Commissions which had sat elsewhere would have arrived at precisely the same conclusion. The noble Lord the Foreign Secretary the other day seemed perfectly shocked at the idea of a writ being issued to a corrupt place like Wakefield. But how had the Government treated candidates who corrupted constituencies? It was all very well for Committees to draw up a Report in a stereotyped form, to the effect that sufficient information had not been brought before them to prove that the bribery or corruption had taken place with the knowledge or sanction of the candidates; but could any sane or reasonable man doubt where the money came from? Possibly, the money was originally subscribed to a general fund. He was happy to say he knew nothing of such arrangements, for he did not represent a borough. A very ordinary practice was for certain funds to be subscribed, of which the Gentleman going down to contest a corrupt borough usually contributed the largest portion, or possibly he might avail himself of the accommodating and useful assistance of some political friend like the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wells or Honiton, who might be able to make arrangement for the transmission to its destination of this general fund. Now, how had the Government treated Gentlemen who were instrumental in corrupting constituencies? Immediately after the last general election, one of the Members for the town of Norwich was convicted through his agents—of course, the noble Lord knew nothing of the circumstances—of gross, glaring, wholesale bribery. Yet, he now sat on the Treasury Bench, and occupied a high and responsible station in Her Majesty's Household. He alluded to the noble Lord at present Member for the Wick Boroughs (Viscount Bury). Another noble Lord was also convicted on a former occasion of gross, glaring, and wholesale corruption in the town of Hull. That noble now occupied a yet more responsible position in Her Majesty's Government in "another place." He alluded to Lord De Grey, who was well known in that House as Lord Goderich, who had been convicted of gross bribery. The House of Commons having condoned the offences of those corrupt constituencies, and Her Majesty's Government having rewarded the Gentlemen who corrupted them, it was perfectly preposterous for the House to affect precise puritanical scruples about issuing writs for Wakefield or Gloucester, the circumstances of which were in no way distinguishable from those of the other towns to which he had alluded.

SIR GEORGE GREY regretted that the hon. Gentleman should have introduced any personal question into the discussion. He should have remembered that now Election Committees were bound, when they found bribery to exist, to report whether that bribery had taken place with the knowledge or consent of the candidates or Members. In both cases of Hull and Norwich the Committees reported that the bribery had been without the knowledge or consent of the noble Lords who had been referred to. [Mr. KNIGHTLEY: But by their agents.] Every one professed to be desirous of putting an end to bribery, and complaints were made that the Reports of Committees and of Commissioners had not been productive of greater results—that those Reports were laid upon the table, and nothing was done upon them. He thought there would be less justice in these complaints if some more decisive and less cautious attempts were made to check bribery. Disfranchisement did not follow where the corruption was not nearly universal, and as long as they adhered to that rule there would be but few cases of disfranchisement. Much might, no doubt, be said about the extent of constituencies like those of Gloucester and Wakefield, and it may be urged that it would be hard to disfranchise the whole for the faults of a portion of the constituency. But in the case of Wakefield, not only were a large number of voters corrupt, but the Commissioners called attention to the fact that what was called the respectable part of the constituency had not exercised that influence which they possessed to prevent bribery as they might have done, and, therefore, the corruption in that place must be assumed to have gone beyond the voters actually bribed. With respect to boroughs so situated he last year stated the course proposed by the Government—that where the corruption was extensive, but not sufficient to deserve disfranchisement, a temporary suspension of the writ was expedient. He also stated that the Government would have introduced a Bill to apply that principle to these two boroughs, had it not been that a Reform Bill was then before Parliament, which if adopted would have created many new voters. The subject having been referred to a Committee, that Committee made a recommendation in accordance with that suggestion. After the time which had elapsed since the election, the Government did not think it expedient to introduce a Bill specifically applicable to these two boroughs; but the question now coming before the House must be considered together with that recommendation, and it would be for the House to determine whether such a rule should be prospective or retrospective. In any case, if the House was inclined to discourage bribery by suspending the issue of writs for corrupt boroughs for a minimum period of five years, as recommended by the Committee, it would be improper after the lapse of less than two years to allow those boroughs the opportunity of repeating perhaps the same practices as those of which they had before been guilty. He did not think a sufficient time had elapsed. The hon. Member who spoke last had taunted the Government and the House with punishing the constituencies and allowing the candidates to pass by unnoticed. He must remind the hon. Member that in the cases where a candidate had been open to prosecution, in consequence of not receiving a certificate from the Commissioners, the Attorney General had instituted proceedings. In one case the prosecution was for a time defeated by the obstinacy of a witness in refusing to repeat the evidence he had given before the Commissioners. In another case—that of Berwick—the Attorney General had stated that he did not prosecute the candidate because the principal witness had absconded. He was glad the question was now discussed in a full House, when it could be deliberately considered.

MR. HENLEY said, that the precedents quoted by the hon. and learned Member for Reading (Mr. Serjeant Pigott) had convinced him that the writ for Wakefield should be issued. In the case of Stafford the House had passed a Bill of disfranchisement, but in consequence of a difference with the other House the writ only remained suspended. It was, no doubt, in the power of the House to suspend a writ for an indefinite time; but whether it was right or constitutional he could not say. Suspension of the writ was clearly a penal proceeding, and the question now was whether the suspension had lasted sufficiently long. No one had proposed a Bill to disfranchise this borough, and if the Government had thought that five years' suspension was the proper punishment, they should have introduced a Bill to the effect immediately after the Report of the Commissioners. They not having done that, and believing that indefinite punishment was wrong, he should vote for the issue of the writ.

COLONEL SMYTH regarded this as no party question. Every one admitted that bribery had been practised at the last election for Wakefield. He deplored the fact, and he was authorized by the two gentlemen who were candidates upon that occasion to express their regret. The question was whether Wakefield had not been sufficiently punished already. Two years of disfranchisement to a large commercial town was a heavy penalty to endure. Not only so, but Wakefield had also been deprived by the Appropriation of Seats Bill of the important position which it hitherto held in connection with the elections for the county. He must say he had been startled and surprised at the declaration of the Home Secretary. When the debate was commenced that night week that right hon. Gentleman clearly stated that if the second division then taken went against the Government, as the first one had gone, he would support the issue of the writ. ["No!" and "Hear, hear."] He mentioned this with pain, but the right hon. Gentleman was so reported in The Times of the following day. The House was entitled to look for straightforward conduct on the part of those who were its leaders, and he must, therefore, now call upon the right hon. Gentleman to act according to his own declaration. The right hon. Gentleman was afterwards urged the same night to go into the lobby in opposition to that declaration; but it was to be hoped that he would be prepared to-night to say, on behalf of the Government that he would not further resist the issue of the writs for Wakefield and Gloucester, and he would thereby regain the confidence which he had heretofore most deservedly enjoyed on that side of the House.

MR. BENTINCK contended, notwithstanding the reproof administered by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster in regard to the introduction of personal matters into that discussion, that the hon. Member for Northamptonshire (Mr. Knightley) was perfectly justified in the illustration he had used in support of his argument. The report of the inquiry relating to Kingston-upon-Hull declared that systematic bribery had been committed on behalf of Lord Goderich; that it was not proved that such bribery was committed with Lord Goderich's knowledge, but that it was proved that he had a knowledge of facts which should have caused him to inquire into the mode in which the money was expended, and that such an inquiry must have led him to the conclusion that bribery was being practised on his behalf. If the Government would bring forward a Motion for the disfranchisement of Wakefield and Gloucester he was prepared to vote for it, but he thought it unjust to deal out one punishment to one delinquent borough and another punishment to another. With respect to the constitutional part of the question, he could not understand a more unconstitutional course of proceeding than that the right of dealing with questions of this description of delinquency should rest either with the caprice of the House of Commons, or the caprice of the Government of the day. There ought to be some clear and definite rule of action. The Government ought to follow one of two courses—either to sanction the issuing of the writ or deal with these two places as others had been dealt with. He firmly believed that nothing would stop bribery, and the course the House adopted was to encourage it at elections. The real fact was that in the country there was no feeling against it, and no belief in the mind of the public that there was any turpitude in either giving or taking a bribe. He was not so sanguine as the hon. and learned Member as to believe that the House had only to express its reprobation of such delinquencies in order to effectually eradicate electoral corruption. Bribery could only be dealt with by making the penalties and the punishment so heavy that it would be dangerous to commit it.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON:—I think there is a great deal of force in the observation that we ought to take some decided course in regard to these boroughs. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has explained why, when the Bill that now lies on the table was brought in, it was not deemed proper to apply to these boroughs the clause which provides that constituencies so convicted shall not be allowed for five years to return Members to this House. But I think it would be fair for the House to consider whether, under the altered circumstances of the case, it would not be right to include

Wakefield and Gloucester in that clause, and that when we come to consider the Bill in Committee, a proviso should be added to prevent their electing representatives until the period of five years has expired. If the House should be of opinion that that would be a fit question to discuss in Committee on the Bill, then surely we ought not to withdraw these boroughs from consideration by now issuing their writs. The hon. Gentleman who spoke last (Mr. Bentinck) is prepared to vote for the disfranchisement of these two towns; but I think there are obvious reasons why we should pause before proceeding to that extremity. The House ought to consider the effect that would be produced on the public mind by adopting the Motion before us. For what purpose, I would ask, are Commissioners appointed to investigate cases of gross and extensive bribery? Is it that the House may have the satisfaction of knowing that corruption exists and then doing nothing? Is it for the sake of informing the public mind that borough after borough is convicted of flagrant venality, and that all this House does, after letting the Report of the Committee lie on the table for a year or so, is to issue the writ and treat the delinquent constituency as if nothing at all had happened? Why, if that is not trifling—if it is not indirectly avowing that we consider bribery and corruption a trivial and venial offence, hardly deserving of any consideration and certainly of no punishment—I do not know what the consequences of any given line of conduct can possibly be. I entreat the House to pause, and remember that its own character is here involved. The Wakefield election took place about two years ago. An investigation was instituted, and I do not believe the Report has been much more than a twelvemonth lying on our table. Circumstances have prevented that Report being taken into serious consideration; and now the first result of all these proceedings is to be that we are to issue the writ, just as if a vacancy had occurred in a common and natural manner. I, therefore, humbly propose to the House that we should not now issue the writ, but that we should reserve for subsequent discussion the question whether it would not be well to visit on these two delinquent constituencies that five years' deprivation of electoral privileges which is prescribed by the clause in the measure to which I have referred.

position in respect to these two boroughs; but, at the same time, I do not see that the proposition of the noble Lord will remove the difficulty. If the proposition is one to extricate us from the difficulty by what is, after all, only ex post facto legislation, I do not think it is one which the House is likely to favour. To-night we are discussing the question of the corruption of a particular borough, and that, to my mind, has nothing to do with the point before us. The point is much more important than the question of the corruption of a particular borough. It is, whether we shall suspend a writ without the authority of law. Really that is the important matter which we have to decide. If, without any violation of the law, we could sufficiently punish Wakefield and Gloucester, I should be most willing to support any Motion having that for its object; but it appears to me that in our eagerness to punish those boroughs we may be laying the foundation of a system which may be found hereafter very injurious to that public liberty and security which—notwithstanding some of the statements which have been made in the course of this debate—I am willing to believe both sides of the House are anxious to preserve. Is that a satisfactory state of affairs by which we may suspend the issuing of a writ at the caprice of an individual, or to suit the fashion of a party? What can be more unsatisfactory than those precedents cited by the hon. and learned Serjeant, which show that the suspension or the issue of a writ may depend upon a majority of one. I think we should lay down some invariable principle which should apply to all cases, and which should remove the difficulty in which the House has been placed, both on the last night when this subject was under discussion and on the present occasion. From all I can learn, if a division had been taken on the preceding night, the writ would have been issued; and surely nothing can be more unsatisfactory than that a matter of great importance should depend upon the chance attendance of hon. Members or the caprice of a Minister. A question of this kind ought to be decided in a manner that should apply inflexibly to all cases, and that should leave no room for cavil. There is no machinery to meet the case at present. It is no answer to the general objections which can be urged against the arbitrary and capricious suspension of a writ to say that Her Majesty's Ministers are sensible that something ought to be done, and that an opportunity will hereafter occur, of which the House may avail themselves in order to do that something. The House ought not to be influenced in its opinion by such vague promises as that which the noble Lord has given us, and which, even if it be realized, will result in legislation of a retrospective character. It appears to me that the best thing we can do now is to assent to the issue of the writ, and take the earliest opportunity of giving the whole subject our attentive consideration, with a view to providing for future cases. If we act in this way, we can hereafter lay down a mode of action which will leave no room for doubt, and which will relieve the House in future of discussions of this character. Though as willing as any one to show my sense of the conduct of the electors of Wakefield, I feel bound to support our constitutional rights, and vote for the issue of the writ.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I have heard the statement of the right hon. Gentleman with regret, for, whatever may be the decision of the House on the present Motion, and though I hope that decision may be adverse, I am sorry that among the leading Members of this House there should be any difference of opinion as to the course which ought to be pursued in such cases. The first objection of the right hon. Gentleman to the proposition referred to by my noble Friend is, that it is one for ex post facto legislation. If that be a valid objection, everything which the House has hitherto done in the matter of disfranchisement is hard and unjust. It was wrong of the old Parliament to disfranchise Penryn and Grampound, and it was wrong in the new to disfranchise Sudbury and St. Albans. The right hon. Gentleman says that we ought not to suspend a writ in an arbitrary manner. He is right; but it is perfectly within the spirit of the Constitution to suspend the issue of a writ till we have had an opportunity of considering what final course we ought to take. My right hon. Friend (Sir George Grey) has explained that the Reform Bill of last year afforded a sufficient reason for not bringing in a Bill applying more directly to cases such as those now under discussion; but as to the present Session my noble Friend at the head of the Government has just declared that the House will have an opportunity afforded to them of considering the amount of punishment in the shape of disfranchisement which ought to be inflicted in such cases. The right hon. Gentleman says that we ought to have some defined and invariable rule—I presume he means as to the character of the punishment, for he cannot mean that all offences of this kind, whether great or small, should receive exactly the same amount of punishment. It would be a proper subject of consideration for the House whether in some instances there should not be absolute and in others only partial disfranchisement. After the passing of the Reform Act the attention of Parliament and the country was directed to this subject, and at length we adopted a machinery, which is formal, solemn, and of a very costly character, by which you have a judicial inquiry as the foundation of your subsequent proceedings. We have now got before us one of the first Reports consequent on such an inquiry, and we are called on to declare how we intend to deal with those Reports. This is a question of great importance. The hon. Member for Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) declared his intention to deal severely with cases of bribery. He has on former occasions shown his indisposition to extensive—perhaps to any—changes in the constitution of Parliament. An opponent of Parliamentary Reform in general, he would be just and severe in dealing with particular cases of electoral corruption. I do not know whether some of those who are most friendly to sweeping changes in the constitution of this House may not be favourable to the issue of this writ, because they may consider that to treat such cases lightly may stimulate in the nation a desire for extensive and organic changes. But let the House see the serious alternative before it. If the country is little disposed to deal with the general question of disfranchisement it becomes doubly necessary that we should deal gravely, severely, and effectively with particular cases of disfranchisement. But if we are to say when particular cases of gross corruption come before us, established by indubitable evidence, that the writ may issue, as is now proposed with regard to Wakefield, then I say that is a mode of proceeding which this House, great as it is, cannot afford to pursue without forfeiting much of the esteem, respect, and confidence of the country.

MR. MACAULAY said, the speech of the right hon. Gentleman had not disposed him to vote against the Motion, more particularly as the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues seemed to arrogate to themselves a peculiar regard for the preservation of electoral purity. He denied that these were first Reports of Royal Commissions. Commissions had, in fact, been issued so far back as 1853, and there had been half a dozen or half a score towns which had been visited by them. When the noble Lord said that after the issuing of a Commission, and the Commission had reported they ought to punish the borough or the Commission was of no use. He would remind the House in the first place that the foundation of the inquiry by the Commissioners was absolute impunity and indemnity of all the parties who gave the information. In the next place, in all cases where Commissions had been issued the elections which had followed them were not marked by those practices which had called the Commissions into existence. This showed that the Commissions were not entirely without their value in eradicating the evil which they were intended to correct.

MR. HODGSON hoped the House would allow him to give some explanation of an insinuation which had been thrown out against him by the hon. Baronet the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. The hon. Baronet had stated that the reason why the Attorney General had not directed a prosecution against him for bribery at the election for Berwick-upon-Tweed was that a material witness had absconded. Now, the hon. Baronet, who lived within a few miles of that borough, might have known the fact that the witness to whom he referred had not at the time absconded; he was resident in Berwick, was there now, and had been for weeks. So far from his shirking any evidence brought against him, he had from first to last taken every means in his power to challenge investigation into his conduct. The witness had been already tried at the Old Bailey, being prosecuted by the Attorney General; and it was at his instance that he had been enabled to meet that trial, which ended in an acquittal.

SIR GEORGE GREY denied that he had made any insinuation against the hon. Member. What he stated was that the Attorney General had prosecuted in two cases in which the candidates had not received the certificate from the Commissioners, and that in one of the cases the prosecution failed from the refusal of a witness to answer the questions put to him; and with regard to the hon. Member for Berwick, he stated that the Attorney General was justified in not prosecuting by the fact that the witness had absconded. The hon. Gentleman said he knew that the witness had not absconded. He only regretted that the hon. Gentleman did not give that information to the Attorney General.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE said, the arguments of his right hon. Friend the Member for Buckinghamshire had not in any way been answered. It was a new thing altogether to say that there was a Bill on the Table to meet the present case, after the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department, the other night, that the Government would consent to the issue of the writ.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that as several hon. Members had adverted to what had fallen from him on the last occasion, he begged to explain what he really had said. The House on that occasion did not seem disposed to enter into the question of the issue of the writ, and a series of Adjournments had been moved. He knew from experience that Motions of that sort were not very agreeable to the House, and it was always unpleasant to the Government to take part in Motions the effect of which was the retardation of public business. He had, therefore, proposed that the division on the Motion for Adjournment should be taken as indicating the disposition of the House, and that no division should be taken on the Motion itself when it was put. Well, if the House had been disposed to adopt that course he should have acquiesced in it. But that was not the case. Hon. Gentlemen continued to move Adjournments, and the consequence was that the Government, not being masters of the majority of the House, acquiesced in what appeared to be the wish of the majority. It was not possible, therefore, to adopt the suggestion he had thrown out. It was a mere matter of convenience, and he saw no inconsistency between the suggestion he had made and the course which the Government had eventually adopted.

MAJOR EDWARDS said, that although he had listened very attentively to this discussion, he had not heard any substantial reason adduced to justify the exceptional mode of proceeding that had been adopted with reference to Wakefield and Gloucester. His connections with the West Riding of Yorkshire enabled him to speak with certainty respecting the first-mentioned constituency, which had a strong claim on the House from its numbers, wealth, and intelligence. He had been very much surprised at the attack which had been made upon him by the hon. and learned Member for Reading. It was the first time, in the whole of his experience in Parliament since 1847, that he had heard of an hon. Member being censured for not making a long speech at two o'clock in the morning; and when he had been as long a Member of that House, he would have learnt, that if not usually impracticable, at all events such an attempt would be injudicious and indiscreet. He had been more astonished still to find that the hon. and learned Gentleman, in the speech he had made, stated the matter which he (Major Edwards) had made use of was irrelevant and inconclusive. He would say farther, that he never was more astonished in his life than when he heard the hon. and learned Gentleman, who had been a personal friend of Mr. Leatham, and supposed to be an active partisan in the Wakefield election, was placed at the head of the commission by the present Government. He was the last man in the world that ought to have been appointed to that Commission, and he said it advisedly, the fact had given the greatest dissatisfaction to the inhabitants of Wakefield and the district. The justice of the report of that Commission was therefore disputed, and this he had no hesitation in stating in the face of the House of Commons. With regard to withholding the writ, it had already been withheld two years, although it had been asserted that less than one-eighth of the constituency of Wakefield had been charged with corrupt practices, and yet 20,000 persons were to be punished for that small fraction of the inhabitants. Such a punishment savoured of injustice, if not vindictiveness, and was unprecedented. Since the Reform Bill he believed no writ had been withheld for so long a period, and it is especially hard in the case of Wakefield, for it is the first time any proceedings have been taken against the borough on the ground of corruption, while other boroughs have frequently been the subject of inquiry. The register is now almost entirely purged of the guilty parties, and 200 new electors are now enfranchised. They had heard for the first time this evening something about legislation on the subject, and the country would, he felt confident, receive with enthusiasm any well digested measure that the Government thought fit to introduce for the prevention of bribery and corruption. Why did not the Government bring in such a Bill at the commencement of last year? Why did they wait until this moment, when they found that one-half of the House of Commons was prepared to vote for the immediate issue of the writ for Wakefield? Why did they now, at the eleventh hour, come down on their knees and beg hon. Members to withhold their votes, to give them a last opportunity to produce a Bill that would satisfy the House of Commons on the subject? It was a sop to certain Members who would only be too happy to have an excuse for voting against the issuing of the writ, and such was the object. There was one thing, nevertheless, the Government never could get over; the Home Secretary had stated in the presence of the Prime Minister and his colleagues, and he (Major Edwards) hoped it would go forth to the country—he had stated that if the Government were beaten on the second division on Friday last, he would withhold all further opposition, and that the writ for Wakefield should be issued. He now called upon the Government as a point of honour to fulfil their pledge, and to let no quibble interfere with its performance.

MR. SERJEANT PIGOTT begged to say that he had never had anything to do with an election for Wakefield, and that he never could have been a partisan, as alleged by the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken. The only thing that he could remember in connection with the borough was that he was once counsel for the brother of one of the candidates. There must be some mistake. He had enjoyed the friendship of the hon. Gentleman himself up to that moment, and he was sure he should not have done so if he had been so unworthy as the hon. Member imputed to him.

SUBDIVISION OF DIOCESES BILL.

LORD LYTTTELTON said, that no counter Motion having been made the other evening, the decision of the House was simply to negative the going into Committee on the Subdivision of Dioceses Bill at that time. The Bill still stood for commitment, and he or any other Peer could move that it be committed. He did not, however, intend to move any further in the matter either in this or in any future Session. He had been advised in the course of the discussion to resume the subject. Whether the advice was given in earnest or not he did not know, but he did not intend to follow it, being convinced that no independent Peer or Member of Parliament could legislate on these Church questions with any hope of success. With regard to the vote of the House he believed it was the single instance in which, after allowing a Bill to be referred to a Select Committee, and after it had been fully considered by a Select Committee, they had refused to allow it even to go into Committee of the whole House.

EDUCATION—REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE OF PRIVY COUNCIL.

QUESTION.

LORD LYTTTELTON begged to ask the President of the Council, Whether the Government intended to propose any Measures in Parliament, or to issue any Minutes of the Committee of Privy Council on Education, in pursuance of the Report of the Education Commissioners; and to draw the attention of the House to some parts of that Report? The noble Lord said that he purposed to detain their Lordships on the first question but a very short time, inasmuch as he presumed the intention of Her Majesty's Government on the Educational question would be made known in the other House of Parliament when the Votes for educational purposes came on for discussion. As that might, however, be at a period somewhat distant it might be useful to obtain from the head of the department in their Lordships' House some notion of what the Government intended to do. The measures which had been suggested by the Education Commissioners in their Report were of two classes. Some of those measures—perhaps only a few—required the interference of Parliament to enable them to be carried into effect ; while the second class might be effected through the action of the Committee of Privy Council on Education. One of his objects was to obtain from the noble Earl an assurance that in regard to questions of difficulty there would not be at present any important alteration. Every one who had read the Report of the Commissioners must be aware that there were points raised in it upon which very great differences of opinion existed, and with respect to them, he was very desirous to hear that it was not in the contemplation of the Government to make any important alteration, at all events, until the next Session of Parliament. He was afraid that some uncertainty and want of confidence still existed with respect to the Committee of the Privy Council in consequence of a practice which had been sometimes pursued of making an Order in Council on educational subjects soon after the rising of Parliament, when there was no opportunity given of questioning its expediency. It would be very satisfactory both to the House and the country to know that no such course was intended to be adopted on the present occasion. Not only was the Report of the Commissioners in itself a very long document, but it was accompanied by five bulky volumes of evidence, and by a most able treatise from the pen of Mr. Senior, which it had given him (Lord Lyttelton) the greatest pleasure to read ; but it was impossible that many of their Lordships, and least of all his noble Friend the President of the Council, should have had time to wade through that mass of evidence. He wished to advert to some few of the topics dealt with by the Commissioners, and to some omissions, but not in any hostile spirit, as he considered their Report to be one of the most able and luminous documents ever presented to Parliament. He was ready to express his almost unqualified approval of the whole of the recommendations contained in the last five paragraphs, and with regard to the last, referring to State schools, as there could hardly be any difference of opinion about it, he should rejoice to hear that something was being done in order to carry it into effect. As was said by Mr. Senior, the question of pauper education was peculiar from the magnitude of the evil and the certainty of the remedy by the establishment of pauper schools. Nothing was wanted but to take away the option from the boards of guardians, and by the authority of the Government or the Poor Law Board to establish these schools throughout the country. He had a doubt with regard to the 37th Section of the recommendations of the Commissioners, relating to what was known as Denison's Act, enabling guardians to pay for the education of children of paupers. What the Commissioners and Mr. Senior dwelt upon was that the Act was erroneous, and, indeed, futile, inasmuch as it prevented boards of guardians insisting upon children being sent to school as a condition of out-door relief. They suggested that the guardians should be required to insist upon children being sent to school as a condition of out-door relief, and in this he agreed. The objections raised against the recommendations of the Commissioners were in a great measure confined to the first and second chapters. The noble Duke (the Duke of Newcastle) would remember that sometime ago, in a debate in that House on the ragged schools' education, the question of county rates had been raised incidentally, and he might be glad of the opportunity of dealing with it. In the section of the Report bearing on this point it was not very clear whether the general conditions under which the Government now gave assistance were to be continued under the new system. It seemed that the Report recommended that the grants made to the public should be divided into two classes—the first according to the present system, which came out of the general taxation of the country, the second out of the county rate. And that no school should participate in those grants which did not comply with certain conditions, which conditions, were drawn out in a somewhat imperfect manner. He believed, however, that while the schools now in connection with the Government were to remain as they were, and the inspector was not only to report upon the state of the school with regard to secular, but as regarded the Church schools with respect to religious education, it was intended that other schools should be inspected by a different class of inspectors, to which alone the charge upon the county rate should refer. With respect to them there was to be no condition whatever with respect to religious teaching, but the children were to be examined in reading, writing, arithmetic, and plain work ; and if these conditions were complied with the school was to receive a very considerable subsidy, indeed, out of the county rates. Assuming that to be the basis of the system, the question was whether such a plan would avoid the well-known objections to the rating system. Those objections were very clearly stated both by Mr. Senior and Sir James Kay Shuttleworth. He must say, however, that when it was said to throw the expense of the education of the children of a county upon the county rate would lead to something like the confiscation of the property of the ratepayers. If there were no other difficulties in the way, if there were nothing but the interests of justice to consider, nothing would give him greater pleasure than to see this confiscation—which would amount to something like 2*d.* in the pound—carried into practice, because they must all be well aware how scandalously the charge of educating the poor was evaded by much of the property of the country, and thrown only on those who voluntarily undertook it. Mr. Senior conceded the whole principle when he proposed that in what he called the apathetic districts there should be rates for education; but if that were once begun they would not be able to exempt any place from rating for this purpose. He (Lord Lyttelton) should be glad if he could see that it was possible to throw some part of the burden upon the rateable property of the country, but practically there were known to be very grave objections to it. How, it had been asked, could such a charge be levied without a change which would transfer the educational management to the ratepayers? In a paper drawn up by the Dean of Carlisle among the evidence before Commissioners he said that he stood aghast at any man who, knowing what he knew of the ratepayers of the country, proposed in any manner to throw any part of the care and management of the education of the people upon them. He (Lord Lyttelton) believed that there was much truth in that. Beside the objections to introducing a rate of this kind, it was a very serious question whether it was right to hold out such very great benefits to these schools upon such very low conditions. Sir James Kay Shuttleworth said this form of grant would be found operating, as far as it went, as a premium on discarding certificated teachers and pupil teachers, and on the limitation of instruction to reading, writing, and arithmetic. With regard to the last recommendation of the Report, he thought it of doubtful expediency. It was stated with great brevity in these words:—“Certificates are to bear no pecuniary, but only an honorary value.” At present the certificates which bore a pecuniary value were mostly attained in training schools by pupil teachers, who had served their apprenticeship, and had undergone a severe examination; and, as the result of those certificates, they became reasonably sure for the time of their service of a certain fixed increase to their salaries received from the Government. The Commissioners proposed that those certificates should be simply honorary, and should give them no claim on the Government whatever; so that they should be left to make their own bargain with the school managers, receiving nothing direct from the Government. He could not believe that such a regulation, if adopted, would apply to the present schoolmasters, though, of course, the Government would have the right to apply it in the case of future schoolmasters. He thought, however, that such an arrangement would be looked upon by the schoolmasters as taking away almost the whole value of their connection with the Government. At present they received a fair salary from the managers besides what they obtained from the Government; but if this proposal were adopted their salaries would be likely to be ground down by the school managers, while they would get nothing from the Government. In the interest of the training schools he confessed that he looked with apprehension upon the recommendation, believing that these establishments would be deprived of the chief source from which they obtained their pupils; and on this point he should be glad to have some explanation from his noble Friend. He would now touch on one or two points which were omitted from the Report. A point of great importance, originally suggested by Mr. Chadwick, and adopted in the work of Mr. Senior, was an alteration in the arrangement of the school hours, by which about one-half of the time now given to ordinary school pursuits would be devoted to certain physical exercises, military drill, and occupations of that sort. On this point he expressed no opinion, as he did not see his way clearly; but some striking evidence had been collected by Mr. Chadwick, and possibly some change in this respect might at a future time be considered desirable by the Government. There was another omission on a subject which occupied a whole chapter in Mr. Senior's work, and had reference to what that gentleman called “the unregulated trades," meaning thereby those trades to which the Factory Acts did not apply in respect of education. The Commissioners found themselves obliged to limit their inquiries to certain specimen districts, in which it happened that the worst cases of these unregulated trades were not included. They were chiefly the glove, lace, and stocking manufactories of Nottinghamshire and Leicestershire. He was not acquainted with the details of the subject, but it was impossible adequately to express the disgust and indignation that every one must feel on reading Mr. Senior's description of the condition of the children in these manufactories. Mr. Senior was not a man to employ rhetorical or exaggerated language; but he said, "We look with indignation on the pictures of American slavery; but I believe that the children on the worst managed plantation are less overworked, less tortured, better fed, and quite as well instructed as these unhappy infants." He regretted that these trades had been exempted from the regulations of the Factory Acts. He believed that the evidence on which these statements were made was collected some years ago; but Mr. Senior asserted that the same evils still existed. He did not know what might have prevented the noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury) who had taken such an interest in the former Factory Acts from applying his mind to these trades; he was unable to see any difference between these works and those that had been regulated, or why the same provisions should not apply to one as to the other. He hoped that before long this question of the unregulated trades would be brought fully under the consideration of the House.

EARL GRANVILLE was understood to say that he would only answer the questions as to the intentions of Government, and would leave his noble Friend the Chairman of the Commission (the Duke of Newcastle) to reply to the noble Lord's observations on the Report. The department with which he was connected had carefully considered the recommendations of the Report. He concurred in many of the observations of the noble Lord, but he did not think that the recommendation as to borough and county rates had been thoroughly considered, and there was no intention at present to bring in any Bill to carry out the recommendations of the Commissioners in that respect. With regard to the better administration of the system he had felt some difficulty how to act; but what he proposed to do was this, which he thought would be satisfactory both to Parliament and the country. He thought he should be enabled in a short time now to lay on the table of both Houses of Parliament a Minute framed on certain recommendations of the Commissioners, and that Minute would be chiefly directed to the simplification of the business of the Council Office as related to schools and the appointment of teachers; and they hoped to be able to suggest something which would meet a crying evil, and give assistance to schools in what were called the poorer districts in the country. The Government, however, in preparing this Minute would do so with any intention of taking immediate action, but with the purpose that it should be laid before both Houses of Parliament for consideration.

LORD BROUGHAM was in favour of a borough rate; but, in the question of public education, there had always been a great difficulty on this point. He had himself brought in two or three Bills on this subject, and one Bill was proposed by Lord John Russell; but these measures were confined to a borough rating only, and did not refer to a county rate. The difficulty was in the disposal of the rate, and the restrictions under which it should be applied. By his Bills the municipal body of the town empowered to raise it were to apply it under the control of the Government, as represented in the Education Department of the Privy Council. The short time system for children would be of great advantage for the promotion of education. Some forty years ago he had made use of an expression which had since become proverbial, that "the schoolmaster was abroad," and last year, at the meeting of the Social Science Congress at Glasgow, he added to that expression by saying that not only the schoolmaster, but the workmaster also was abroad. That expression had given offence to some manufacturers, who understood it as implying that they were unfriendly to the cause of education. That, however, was not so, but the expression was intended as a lamentation over the children and their parents, who could not afford to keep them at school for a sufficient time. A half-time system for children would be of vast importance, because if they were allowed to attend school three hours a day less than at present there would be less temptation to the parents to keep from school. The children could then spend three hours a day at school, but even two hours a day would be of great use. Mr. Chadwick's name was well known to their Lordships from his great and most useful services in the establishment of the New Poor Law, and afterwards in the Sanitary Department. He had acted as President of the Education Department in the Social Science Congress at Bradford two years ago; and in presiding over their discussions had brought forth much valuable information. This he printed in a Report, which being shown to one of the Commissioners whose Report was now before their Lordships, and who attended the Congress at Bradford, he requested Mr. Chadwick to prosecute the inquiry and attend at the meeting of the department. Mr. Chadwick did so, and went over the whole West Riding, examining every school and manufactory and communicating with both the great manufacturers, and the school inspectors, and medical men. The result was an ample confirmation of the opinions expressed at the meeting of this department, that three hours spent at school were amply sufficient; and even two hours, if taken early in the day, very beneficial; while the other three hours of the day taken from work should be spent in healthy exercise. The result of his inquiries and observations was communicated to the Commission, who said it was worth all the other information which the Commission had received. Unfortunately it was given in too late to be inserted in the Report, but Mr. Chadwick's paper had been moved for by his noble Friend (Lord Monteagle), and would very soon be in the hands of their Lordships. There was another subject of great importance to which he wished to call attention—the subject of middle-class education. The Session before last he had presented 120 petitions, signed by 40,000 persons, claiming for middle-class children better schools, and that there should be an extension of the system of inspection to grant certificates of ability and good conduct to schoolmasters for the middle class. The noble Earl upon that occasion raised a very reasonable objection on the score of want of funds; but still it was of the utmost importance that middle schools should be better managed, and that all the benefits should accrue to them which did accrue from a system of inspection. He made a calculation that the number of children of the middle class was 120,000, taking the middle class to represent those with incomes between £120 and £1,000 a year. A right rev. Prelate had objected that the range was too wide, and suggested £150 and £500 a year, and which would show about 80,000 or 90,000 children. The middle class was the class most neglected of all in respect to the means of a good education. Men were not allowed to practise as physicians, surgeons, or apothecaries without undergoing a full examination as to their qualifications for the duties they undertook to discharge. Was it less necessary that those who engaged in the task of instructing and training the young should be subjected to some public test of their fitness for their most important vocation? The extension of the compulsory principle now applicable to factory children had been recommended by some; but that was a point surrounded with considerable difficulty, and the Government had, perhaps naturally, hesitated to deal with it. The suggestion, however, which he was now making was of a very different nature, because he did not propose that every middle-class school should be compelled to come under Government inspection; but merely that any such school placing itself under the Privy Council should enjoy all the privileges and results of their system of inspection. A scheme propounded by Mr. Chadwick for the union of parishes into districts, with a view to the improvement of the education of their children, was of the highest importance; and his report threw valuable light on that subject. To show the difference between the schools carried on under the old plan and those conducted under the new system, in which the reduced number of hours and other improvements were combined, he might mention the fact, based on the evidence of Mr. Tufnell, that of the pauper, orphan, and other children who had passed through the former class of schools, as many as 60 per cent were found, on tracing their subsequent careers, to have lapsed into habits of mendicancy, and sometimes even worse; whereas, under the new and improved schools, the proportion of scholars who had turned out ill was only 2 or 3 per cent. Mr. Hastings, the Secretary of the Social Science Association, had printed a report from the Law Amendment Society some years ago strongly recommending that which the Report of the Commission now before their Lordships proposed—namely, the transfer of inquiry as to charity abuses from the Court of Chancery to some other tribunal. Vice Chancellor Page Wood had presided over the meeting which adopted that report, and he recommended sending these cases to the Charity Commission. But the Society's report preferred the Judicial Committee.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE :—My Lords, I can assure your Lordships that it is as satisfactory to as I am confident it will be to those who have been associated with the Education Commission to have heard the ample and generous testimony to their labours which has been borne, both by the noble and learned Lord who has just sat down, and by my noble Friend who has introduced this discussion. I may say at the same time that, although in some instances there has been, in my judgment, somewhat of over-suspicion of the motives and intentions of the Commission, yet on the whole their Report has been received by the public generally with a candour and fairness most honourable to the country as it is gratifying to the Commissioners. The testimony given by my noble and learned Friend is especially important, as coming from one who has for upwards of forty years laboured so earnestly in promoting the cause of education, and who espoused that cause in days when the education of the lower classes was by no means so popular as now, and, by doing so, gave it a powerful stimulus. My noble Friend near me (Lord Lyttelton), too, has bestowed much attention on this subject, both theoretically and practically, and has furnished, as will be seen from the volume on your Lordships' table, most valuable answers to a series of questions which were sent out by the Commissioners to different persons. Before proceeding further I may, perhaps, touch on what the noble and learned Lord and my noble Friend seem to think are omissions from the Report. First, my noble and learned Friend complained that the Commissioners have omitted all reference to middle-class education. But, my Lords, if that question has not been dealt with by the Commissioners, it is not from any want of appreciation of its importance, but simply because it did not properly come within the scope of their instructions, which were directed to the mode of improving the means of elementary education. My noble and learned Friend has lately presided at a public meeting, the measures proposed at which will be influential in improving and developing middle-class education—a matter which certainly has been of late somewhat overlooked in the earnest and laudable zeal that has been shown in regard to the instruction of the humbler classes. Both those noble Lords have also complained, or rather remarked, that the Commission has omitted all reference to the short-time system, as proposed by Mr. Chadwick. Now, not only did the result of Mr. Chadwick's labours come before the Commission rather late, but the subject itself has not attained that state of completeness and maturity in which it could have been advantageously dealt with either by the Commission or by the Committee of Privy Council. The noble Baron who introduced this discussion has himself confessed that he does not see his way to any practical results on this subject. The question is, doubtless, most important and interesting, but it is yet full of difficulty. One of its difficulties, in particular, ought certainly not to be lightly regarded. Mr. Chadwick's scheme was that the instruction of the children in the schools should henceforth be limited to three hours a day. Mr. Chadwick, of course, felt that the question immediately arose, "What is to be done with the children during the remaining hours of the day? Are they to be allowed to run loose about the streets?" I am not now speaking of children employed in factories or engaged in other industrial pursuits. Mr. Chadwick proposed that the children should spend three hours more in drill, gymnastics, and similar exercises. At present there are in most of our great towns schools which have attached to them no such provision for the exercise or recreation of the children, and unless it could have been arranged how such cases were to be dealt with, it would not have been becoming in the Commissioners to throw out haphazard a number of recommendations for which they saw no practical result, and leave to others to carry them out. The third point noticed by my noble Friend is, that the Commissioners have omitted to make any recommendations as to what are called the non-regulated trades. My noble Friend has referred to the work of Mr. Senior. I have not been able to read that book, but, having sat so long as the colleague of Mr. Senior, I am generally acquainted with his views upon this particular subject, to which he had paid so much attention that probably he might be better prepared than were any of the other Commissioners to make recommendations upon it. My own opinion is that the Commissioners, although they have not overlooked the subject, did right in making no specific recommendations for the extension of legislation to the non-regulated trades; but they have shown in their Report that the subject was not lost sight of. The course of legislation upon this subject has been gradual and progressive. When legislation was first attempted it was not only distasteful to, but was actually dreaded by, employers of labour. Now, however, a different feeling prevails, and we have gained experience which promises to secure a safe and gradual advance in that course. Last year that legislation was extended to collieries and mines, and there is now before the House of Commons a Bill extending it to lace factories, which has been introduced with the consent of the lace manufacturers themselves. My noble Friend who introduced this subject said that to the large proportion of the recommendations of the Commissioners he gave his entire and cordial support. In making that statement, he appears to have referred to the fifty-one specific recommendations at the end of the Report, and to have, to a certain extent, separated them from the Report. Those recommendations are, however, based upon the body of the Report, in which the reasons and arguments in their favour are set forth, and where the noble Baron will find any explanation of them which he may desire. Those fifty-one recommendations are ranged under nine heads. The first head deals with evening schools, to the extension of which the Commissioners attach great importance. The second relates to charities, a subject which I hope will attract so much attention from the public that the Government may be able to deal with it before very long; because I believe that there are many charity funds which are now misapplied—indeed, applied to evil purposes—which might be diverted to making provision for the general education of the people, to their great advantage, and incidentally to the great relief of the public purse. The third head of recommendations relates to children employed in factories; the fourth to pauper children; the fifth to vagrant and criminal children; and the sixth to those schools which are supported by the funds of the State for the education of the children of soldiers and sailors. With all the recommendations included under these heads the noble Baron has expressed his concurrence, except one as to the education of pauper children in district schools. My noble Friend has asked whether, under the plan as proposed by the Commissioners, the religious inspection of Church of England schools will be continued as it has heretofore existed? My reply to that is, that, under the scheme proposed by the Commissioners, that inspection will be continued. A majority of the Commissioners have recommended that the Privy Council inspection should be confined, as in Dissenting and Roman Catholic schools, to the general efficiency of the establishment, and that the inspection of the religious teaching should be left to the diocesan inspectors who were already or would shortly be appointed in all the dioceses of the country. It is right, however, to mention that, while four of the Commissioners held that view, three were of opinion that the proposed system would not secure proper inspection, and would lead to a disregard of religious instruction. My noble Friend has also referred to the recommendation of the Commissioners that the certificates given to teachers by training colleges should bear no pecuniary value, but should be mere honorary distinctions; my noble Friend asked whether this recommendation was to apply to existing schoolmasters, and appeared to be, as he understood many of the schoolmasters also were, under the apprehension that injustice would be thereby committed. The recommendations of the Commissioners were as follows—

“One alteration in the nature of the certificates given to the students in the training colleges will follow from the recommendations which we shall make and explain in the subsequent part of our Report, that all annual grants be paid to the managers in a single sum, to be expended at their discretion for the purposes of the school. They will then make their own bargains with the master, and the certificate, instead of having a money value, will be a testimonial of conduct and ability, issued by an impartial and competent authority.”

My noble Friend must of course bear in mind that, while it is right that the schoolmasters should be dealt with fairly, the usefulness of the schools is the main point to be considered. The Commissioners had the strongest evidence that a certificate, though always regarded as a proof of acquirements, was not in every case a test of the efficiency of the holder as a schoolmaster. Mr. Cooke, one of the Inspectors, reported that some of the best teachers in his district had either no certificate or else an old one, and that some, not remarkable for efficiency, had comparatively high certificates. Mr. Jones also stated that in Wales a certificate was “no sure index of the merit of the holder as a schoolmaster.” It is further very important that all the funds given by the State should be concentrated into one grant, to be placed at the disposal of the managers. I believe that no injury will be done to the holders of certificates by the proposed arrangement, because they will obtain the same amount of money under the new system, though in a different form, as at present. I readily admit that, if that should not be the case, the interests of the schoolmasters who are already appointed ought to be considered, as it would not be fair to place them in a more disadvantageous position than when they entered the service. With regard to the rating plan, the main reasons upon which the Commissioners made their recommendation were as follows:—The first was the expense of the present system and the probability of its eventually creating such a feeling in the country and in the House of Commons as would lead to its sudden break down. The second was the necessity for a simplification of the machinery of the office, if the system was to be extended. The third, and by far the most important reason, was that in the opinion of the Commissioners the so-called “national” system was by no means national in its extent, as large districts were left unprovided for, and as the schools which did not receive any benefit from it were far more numerous than those which did. As to the first of these reasons, if the question were merely one of the expenditure of a million or so, which could certainly be maintained under all circumstances, I believe no money could be better spent, and that it might safely be drawn from the Imperial Treasury. The tendency of the system has been, however, towards annual increase. There has been a slight decrease, no doubt, of late, but that diminution will be rapidly turned into a further increase. After a most careful investigation, the Commissioners, presuming that the system was to continue as at present, arrived at the conclusion that the extension of the general system to the whole country would cost £1,300,000 if the unassisted public schools alone were brought under it. If the system were extended, as they thought was necessary in order to make it complete, to private schools, the expense would amount to £1,620,000, which, making allowance for an increase of 20 per cent in the number of scholars, would soon rise to £1,800,000. Including the capita- tion grants which were commenced two or three years ago, and other expenses which must naturally arise in course of time, the whole expense may be estimated at not less than £2,100,000. That calculation is rather under the mark than over it, Dr. Temple being disposed to estimate the cost at £5,000,000 yearly. The great thing to be feared is a sudden suspension of supplies. We must remember that, as Sir Robert Peel has said, the House of Commons is subject to hot fits of violent extravagance, when they will vote money for any purpose; and to cold fits of economy, when they cut down Votes without regard to the character and requirements of the service for which they were asked. I, for one, fear that the House of Commons, in one of its cold fits, is quite capable of reducing the Education Vote of £2,000,000 to £1,000,000, and thus paralyzing partially, if not completely, the education of the country. I, therefore, wish the whole system to be established on as economical a basis as can be devised. Sir James Kay Shuttleworth, who objected to the recommendation of the Commissioners with respect to rating in a letter to the President of the Council, has acknowledged that it was his sense of this danger in the existing system which led him to support the introduction of the Manchester system, which involved rating. Then as to the second point. Mr. Lingen, who is a most competent authority, and to whom we are much indebted for the management of the present system, has expressed his opinion that it could not be carried further without danger of breaking down, unless material alterations were made. The whole of their inquiries on that subject satisfied them that some change was necessary. I now come to the third and most important consideration—the inadequate number of schools assisted. I feel confident that your Lordships, or at any rate those of your Lordships who have not looked into the statistics or read the Report, will be surprised at the facts and figures which I shall now state to you. The number of public schools assisted by the Committee of Privy Council is 6,897, containing 917,255 scholars. The number of public schools unassisted is 15,952, containing 654,393 scholars. But this is not all. As long as private schools are not abolished, they are recognized as good of themselves, though not, perhaps, as good as public schools, and it should be the object of the State to give encouragement to the improvement of those schools, which is now entirely wanting. The private schools, also unassisted, contain 573,536 children. I may add to this the Birkbeck schools, the factory schools, and that class of schools which has attracted so much attention—the ragged schools, and others, also unassisted, which contain 671,393 children. So that we have upwards of 1,800,000 children in schools totally unassisted by the funds of the State, while the scholars in assisted schools number only 917,000. Is not this a proof that some alteration is wanting? I do not say that the alteration which we recommend is the best. It is the best which has occurred to us after most careful consideration. But I do say that we ought to search for some scheme, and that if we find a scheme, good in itself but surrounded by difficulties, we ought to encounter those difficulties and endeavour to carry out such a scheme to a successful issue. The schools to which no assistance is given exist not only in the large towns, but to a much greater extent in the country. I am sure your Lordships will be equally surprised to hear a statement of the small number of assisted schools in parishes with less than 600 inhabitants—a state of things arising from their being unable to meet the State requirements. In Oxfordshire there are 339 such parishes, and only 24 schools receiving Government aid. In Hereford there are 130 such parishes, and only five schools; in Devon there are 245 such parishes, and only two schools; in Wiltshire there are 159 such parishes, and only nine schools; and in the county of Somerset 280 such parishes, and only one school receiving Government aid. This is not a state of things in which we can maintain that the present system is perfect, or that we ought not to seek material alterations. My noble Friend who brought forward this question said, in one of his answers, there are immense tracts of country in which Government aid is utterly unknown. He stated this without the facts being before him which we have collected and I have now given, and in doing so he made a completely accurate statement. The cause is that the Committee of Privy Council have been unable to adapt their requirements to meet the wants of what are called the “poor parishes.” They may go by any name you like. They are not poor as regards rental in many instances, but they are poor as regards the means of coming to the Committee of Privy Council. Whether it arises from actual poverty, from apathy, or any other cause, they do not provide the means which are required by the Committee of Privy Council as conditions for their aid. We have tried over and over again to devise means of meeting these cases, but it is found impossible to render aid without transgressing the regulations and conditions by which the Committee of Privy Council are bound. These conditions cannot, I believe, be materially reduced if we are to keep within any decent bounds the amount of expenditure. The endeavour to provide something for these schools was the origin of the capitation grant. It has met the evil to a certain extent, but it has created evils of itself; and, moreover, it has proved that you cannot reduce the requirements of the Privy Council in particular districts without reducing them in others. You must bring down the requirements of the richer parishes to those of the poorer. You cannot maintain one system for one and another system for the other, because the line of demarcation is so narrow that, bit by bit, the distinction would disappear, and ultimately you would have to pay out of the funds of the State the whole expense, a large proportion of which is now met by the contributions of benevolent people and the children's pence. These are the reasons, and more especially the last, why we seek for some alterations of the existing system. You are rightly told that the system of parochial rating was proposed on various occasions. My noble Friend, differing greatly from myself and other Members of the Commission, thought that such a system was practicable. I confess that I early abandoned any notion of the kind—believing that the system of parochial rating would be attended with such great evils in itself that, for the cause of education, and for the sake of the social condition of the country, we could not possibly recommend it. We felt that if we adopted a system of parochial rating the ratepayers would rightly claim so material a portion of the management of the schools as to raise that fruitful source of difficulty, the religious question. We felt sure that a dispute would inevitably arise between the clergy and the Dissenters, the clergy desiring to have an important control over the schools in which they were concerned, and the voluntaries, with their particular views, of course objecting to such a system. Without entering into many of the objections which may be raised against parochial rating, I think I have stated quite sufficient reason why we could not recommend that system. But we felt that the objection, however great it may be, is not so much one of principle as one of form. We felt that the system of parochial rating is unobjectionable in itself, but that it brings consequences which cannot be separated from it, and that, in order to be effectual, teaching must be left, as now, to the religious denomination to which each particular school belongs. We thought that we might obviate the evil of material interference with the management of the schools by the body of ratepayers—which of course would tell in some instances in favour of the Church, and in others in favour of the Dissenters—by adopting a larger area and throwing the expense on the county rates. We thought that by so enlarging the area as to cover the whole county and by establishing a county board, we should establish an authority much less liable to interference than if we were to confine our operations to more restricted localities, and we would then leave the general management of the schools in the hands of the members of the religious denominations to which they belong. We thought that by these means we might meet one of the great difficulties of the present system, and obviate one of the great evils of parochial rating. We have studiously avoided any recommendation that contributions should be made out of county rates for building schools. That would be as bad in practice as parochial rating; but, while leaving the contributions for building schools to come as heretofore from the Committee of the Privy Council, our proposal is, that the county funds shall be applied to assist in the maintenance of the schools. The results to be obtained by contributions from the funds of the county, which would not greatly exceed 1*d.* in the pound—no very large tax, though it would produce a considerable amount—would be, we believe, that a vast number of public schools would obtain that assistance which they never can obtain from the Privy Council; that many of the private schools, by the inducements held out to them, would gradually qualify themselves for obtaining aid: that a considerable amount of local interest would be created in these schools, without which it is vain to hope for those voluntary contributions, which we believe will be promoted instead of discouraged by county-rates; and lastly, that the efficiency of these schools would be increased, and the minimum of education at present given would be raised throughout the whole of the schools. In our Report we say—

“Such a plan, we believe, would act directly upon most of the smaller schools of the country, not only by encouraging them to improve their teaching, but by giving them that pecuniary locus standi which is what they may justly require as the means for raising themselves to the higher level of the Government grant. Thus a school of fifty boys, which should obtain £8 or £10 from this examination would receive both an aid and a stimulus, which would induce it to make greater exertion.”

Many persons, I believe, have apprehended that we proposed this as a substitute for the Government grant—or, at any rate, that it would become a substitute for it. That is not our proposal—quite the contrary; but it is obvious that such never could be the result, because the mere fact of a school obtaining this minor assistance would stimulate it to obtain the larger assistance given by the Privy Council. In our Report we say—

“Nothing could more tend to bring the many neglected districts where the assistance to education is given scantily and irregularly under the legitimate influence of the public opinion of the neighbourhood. The reports of the inspectors can hardly be said to have any public circulation, but Boards of Education in counties and boroughs would publish their annual reports of the examinations of their schools and would secure a more judicious attention to the condition of such schools than any other tribunal we could suggest.”

A little further on we say—

“From the plan of an examination we anticipate the double advantage that, while it will maintain the only sound principle upon which schools ought to obtain additional aid, it will at once stimulate and improve the character of their teaching.”

Sir James Kay Shuttleworth and many others who have discussed this subject have objected to what they call the injustice of substituting for an assessment on property of the estimated value of £550,000,000 a charge on the county rate, assessed only on £86,000,000 of property. They say that it is most unjust to relieve the payers of the £550,000,000 of the burden, and throw it upon the smaller contributors. That objection, however, would apply to every species of local taxation—to the police rate and all other local rates. You cannot arrive at a completely just assessment of taxation, either local or general, for any purpose, and I do not, therefore, attach much importance to that objection. I would ask Sir James Kay Shuttleworth, or any other person who has considered this question, whether the present system can be said to be altogether a just one? Can it be just that a vast number of parishes, which contribute to the Privy Council funds through the general taxation of the country, should derive no benefit whatever from them? If you go into the question of abstract justice, I defy any one to say that the last injustice is not infinitely greater than the first, and that it is not most unfair on the enormous proportion of parishes that they should contribute funds for the benefit of the richer and smaller number without deriving any benefit themselves. No doubt, a small additional burden would be thrown on the ratepayers; but, on the other hand, I believe that an improved system of education would greatly relieve the rates. By increasing the intelligence of the people and promoting those virtues which may fairly be said to follow improved education the poor rates and other local taxes would be diminished. Some apprehensions have been expressed as to the feelings of the ratepayers; but, though I should not be inclined to trust them too far at present, yet at the same time I think those apprehensions have been carried to an undue extent. A right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of London) said the other night in the debate on the Bill for the Subdivision of Dioceses that we were unduly apprehensive of the representatives of the people; that for these purposes they were the people themselves, and that if the people desired an extension of the episcopate their representatives would not refuse to assent to such an extension. The same thing, I think, may be said of the ratepayers. They are an important and influential class of the people, and, though I do not say that in their present state of feeling with regard to the dangers of non-education it would be safe to trust them, yet, in the course of years, if we could arrive at an Utopian system, I do believe that it would be far better that the central system should be brought to a close, and that the education of the country should be managed by the local interests rather than from the neighbourhood of Downing Street. We have contemplated no such state of things arising in our time, but we do believe it desirable to engage local interests in the cause of education, while by this plan we maintain all the advantages of the present system. I am afraid that an opinion has been expressed—I hope by very few—but I have heard of it being expressed in the House of Commons, that a disregard of religious teaching has been exhibited throughout by the Education Commissioners, and that it appears in their recommendations. I deny the accusation in toto. I am certain it is not a fair charge as regards their language and recommendations, but I am still more confident that it is unfounded as regards their feelings and wishes. Let me call your Lordship's attention to the language of our Report. At page 310 we say—

“We think also that the existing plan is the only one by which it would be possible to secure the religious character of popular education. It is enough for our purpose to say that there is strong evidence that it is the deliberate opinion of the great majority of persons in this country that it is desirable. Some evidence has already been given upon this subject of the feelings of the parents of the children to be educated. Those of the nation at large are proved by the fact that, with hardly an exception, every endowment for purposes of education, from the Universities down to the smallest village school, has been connected by its founders with some religious body.”

A couple of pages further we express our opinion that—

“The leading principles of the present system are sound, have shown themselves well adapted to the feelings of the country, and ought to be maintained.”

Is not that explicit? But your Lordships will perhaps allow me to read a few lines more. We say—

“Not only does it seem to us certain that the members of all religious bodies would be dissatisfied with any change in this respect, but the fact that religious education has been working with success upon this basis during the last twenty years has given to this principle a position in the country from which any attempt to dislodge it would destroy much that has been gained, and would give a dangerous shock to our system of education.”

Now, I think I may be content to rest on these quotations, and your Lordships and the public will probably hold us discharged from the imputation which has been cast upon us by a right hon. Gentleman who usually takes immense pains with subjects of this description, and who does not generally hazard observations without having made himself master of the subject. But, even if I had not been able to quote these particular observations, what is it that pervades the whole book? Do we not recommend the continuance of the denominational system? And what is that system? Is it not a system of education based entirely and exclusively upon religious teaching imparted by the particular denominations in the schools belonging to them, uninterfered with by the State and unmediated with by the Committee of Privy Council? In recommending this payment from the county rates is it to be supposed that we are departing from some practice of the Committee of Council which has heretofore prevailed? No doubt, we recommend that in the case of this particular grant from the county funds an examination shall be dispensed with except as regards the elements of reading, writing, and arithmetic. But what is now the case in the schools which we want to draw into this system? We say that in those schools, which we think should receive preliminary assistance from the county rates, leading to the greater and more important assistance from the Privy Council, it is desirable that there shall be no examination except in certain elementary particulars. These schools are at present subject to no examination at all, and we want to draw them into a new sphere, introducing in the first place no further examination than that which I have mentioned. It is apprehended by some persons that we are making an inroad upon the present system—that system which, save in its want of sufficient power of extension, to which I have already referred, is working so efficiently and so well. Now, all that is at present required is that the Bible shall be read in those schools which avail themselves of Government grants. So far as the Government are concerned there is nothing in the system at this moment which would prevent a Mormonite school from claiming and obtaining assistance from the Privy Council; it is a system under which those who deny the vital principles of Christianity itself—the Jews—are at this moment receiving assistance. Is it right, then, to make it a charge against the recommendations of the Commissioners, as though they were introducing some frightful innovation, and were proposing some departure from those religious principles which had hitherto guided the education of the poor in this country? The fact is, that it is not the rules of the Privy Council which have created a feeling in favour of the necessity of religious education; it is the religious feeling of the people of England, which has led them to adapt the rules of the Privy Council to religious teaching. I believe not only that the people are in favour of religious teaching, but that they will not submit to any system which does not embrace religion as its foundation, and I say that we have recommended nothing throughout this Report which would prevent the free manifestation of this religious spirit. On the contrary, although we may not throughout this Report have indulged in any fanciful or eloquent phrases upon the value of religion, we have not lost sight of this most important point, but to the best of our judgment we have made such recommendations as in our conscience we believe will most surely attain the desired result.

LORD BROUGHAM explained that his observations which had been commented on applied only to schools in large municipal towns.

THE BISHOP OF BATH AND WELLS having said a few words,

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE, in answer, said that what was proposed was that the Government Inspector should in all cases be a member of the county boards. With regard to the schools to be supported out of the county rates, it was proposed that an examination, not an inspection, should be made. The persons who should make those examinations would not be selected from the high class out of which Inspectors were chosen; they would be schoolmasters appointed on account of merit, and those persons would examine the schools in the elementary branches.

INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS (IRELAND) BILL. QUESTION.

MR. DAWSON said, he wished to ask the hon. Member for Dungarvan, Whether it is his intention to move the Second Reading of the Industrial Schools (Ireland) Bill this day; and, if not, whether he will state his future intentions with respect to that Bill?

MR. MAGUIRE said, that it was his intention to move the discharge of the Order for Second Reading, as he thought he could proceed more effectively with the measure next Session. He should, therefore, move the discharge of the Order.

Motion agreed to.

Bill withdrawn.

REMOVAL OF PAUPERS TO IRELAND. QUESTION.

MR. HENNESSY said, he wished to ask the Lord Advocate, If he has now ascertained whether, in the compulsory removal of Rebecca Kearney from Glasgow to Ireland, the several proceedings required by Law were duly fulfilled?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he had received from the Clerk of the Parochial Board of Guardians in Glasgow a copy of the proceedings in the case referred to. It appeared to him that they were perfectly regular. He should lay those Papers on the Table in addition to what were already ordered.

THE IRISH CONVICT DEPARTMENT. QUESTION.

COLONEL DICKSON said, he rose to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he has received a letter containing a Protest against any reduction in the number of Directors of Convict Prisons; if so, how long that letter has remained unanswered, and whether he has since held any communication with Captain Crofton, with a view to the reconsideration of the question?

MR. CARDWELL said, the first proposal was that Mr. Lentaigue should be a Member of the Local Board. Thereupon, communications passed with the Castle of Dublin, the result of which was that, owing to the objections taken, partly by Captain Crofton and others, it was not carried into effect. He (Mr. Cardwell) found from the letter which he had received from the Directors, dated the 7th of May, that on the 3rd of May General Larcom wrote to them that His Excellency did not intend to fill up the vacancy until sufficient time had elapsed to afford the means of judging whether such appointment was necessary. On the 24th, a letter containing the proposal made respecting Captain Barlow, was written to him officially, and as soon as he received the sanction of the Treasury to the arrangement he wrote to the Convict Directors, expressing a wish to receive a statement of the working of the arrangements when a sufficient time had elapsed to enable them to give the results of their experience.

THE NEW FOREIGN OFFICE. RESOLUTION.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

LORD ELCHO rose to move that in the opinion of the House it was not desirable that the new Foreign Office should be erected according to the Palladian design now exhibited in the Committee room of the House. The question to which he was about to direct the attention of the House was one of considerable importance—it was this—whether a large sum of public money was or was not to be properly expended? He owed an apology to the House for having taken up the subject; he had not, like his noble Friend at the head of the Government, made architecture his study, and there were many hon. Members much more competent to deal with the question than he was. The question of the nature of the building to be erected for a Foreign Office was not a new one, but it appeared before them now in a new phase. The question was no longer what should be the architecture of the new Foreign Office, but the special design which had been sent in by the Prime Minister himself. He thought he should be able to show that what he stated was a fact. The drawing was not, indeed, the production of the noble Lord's own hand, but it was as much his work as any Despatch ever written by the hand of a Foreign Office clerk when the noble Lord was at the head of that Department. In 1856 a Committee was appointed to consider the whole question of the Government public offices, the Foreign Office being then, as now, in a very dilapidated state. That Committee recommended that an enlarged view should be taken of the question, that the public offices should be concentrated as much as possible, the new Foreign Office being the nucleus round which all the others should be congregated. And they further recommended that there should be a general competition for designs. Architects from various parts of Europe competed, and a very large number of designs—upwards of 200—was sent in. Subsequently a Commission was appointed to consider those designs, and it recommended that premiums should be awarded to seven of them. Of those premiums four were awarded to Gothic, and the remaining three to Italian and other designs, including, he believed, a Renaissance. After that Mr. Pennethorne, architect of the Department of Works, was consulted, and entrusted with the preparation of a design—a decision which had justly given rise to a great deal of discontent among those who had received prizes; and this state of things led to the appointment of a Committee of that House, of which he had the honour to be a member. That Committee declined to give any opinion as to the style which should be adopted—they merely inquired into the comparative cost of the different styles—but they made this recommendation—that in the selection of the architect a preference should be given to the successful competitors. At that time the noble Lord the Member for Leicestershire (Lord John Manners) was at the head of the Board of Works, and he took upon himself to decide the question of style, and declared himself to be in favour of the Gothic design of Mr. Scott. The noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley), who was then at the Indian Board, communicated with the First Commissioner of Works on the subject of a new Indian Office, and thinking it desirable that the two buildings should be similar in their style of architecture, he decided also in favour of Gothic. The public were thus naturally led to think that the question was so far settled, and that the Indian Office and the Foreign Office were to be built in the Gothic style of architecture. But the Government of Lord Derby was turned out of office, and his noble Friend (Lord John Manners) of course went out with it. The noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) came into office, and his right hon. Friend (Mr. Cowper) became the First Commissioner of Public Works. With this change of men in office came a change of plans. The whole thing was at sea again. What had been done by his noble Friend (Lord John Manners) was opposed by his noble Friend now at the head of the Government. Indeed, it looked as if the House of Commons was not to be consulted on the subject at all, and as if it had been resolved by the Treasury and the Board of Works to set aside, by their own authority, all that had been done by their predecessors. In these matters of art and architecture we suffered in this country from what were in other respects a great blessing—our free institutions. In Governments where there did not occur these changes of office—as at Paris, for example—a man remained so long in a particular department that something like consistency and a consecutive course of action was pursued with regard to public buildings. But in this country, from the frequent changes that took place, our public works were often proceeded with in a very unsatisfactory manner. What one man did another man undid, and the works when completed were unsatisfactory.

This subject was brought before the House by his noble Friend opposite (Lord John Manners) two years ago, when a very warm discussion took place on the question whether the Gothic or the Palladian style of architecture was the best. His noble Friend at the head of the Government objected to Mr. Scott's Gothic design, and wished him to give in a Palladian or Italian design instead. Mr. Scott accordingly produced a design that was considered to be Italian; but his noble Friend did not consider it sufficiently Italian, and it was altered to meet, if possible, his taste. But even when altered his noble Friend did not consider it sufficiently Italian. Mr. Scott was then compelled—and he (Lord Elcho) thought he made a great mistake when he did so—he was compelled to consent to become the draughtsman of the noble Lord at the head of the Government, and they now had the result in the design exhibited on the walls of the tea-room. He was justified, therefore, in saying that that design was practically the design of the Prime Minister, and not the design of the architect, who had in reality been compelled to draw it. His noble Friend had a horror of Gothic architecture, and, therefore it was that he had insisted on Mr. Scott producing an Italian design. Undoubtedly people would differ on these matters of taste. He (Lord Elcho) would not express any strong opinion of his own one way or the other with regard to Gothic or Palladian architecture, but with a view to refresh his memory as to what had passed in Parliament on the subject, he had run through Hansard, and would give in as condensed a form as he could the arguments against Gothic which had been used by his noble Friend and other speakers. He would thus save the time of the House, as it would be unnecessary for the opponents of Gothic to repeat their arguments. The hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Coningham) said that Gothic architecture gave “a maximum of cost with a minimum of accommodation”—that it gave “no light” and was, moreover, “a barbarous style;” and the hon. Member added that “we did not live in age of darkness,” and that the Gothic style was “ecclesiastical and peculiar to a sect.” He supposed that when the hon. Member for Brighton used the word “ecclesiastical,” he referred to Mr. Beresford Hope, who was then a Member of the House; but he must ask the hon. Member, when he spoke of the style being “peculiar to a sect,” to what sect in par-particular he referred to? He remembered that two years ago a deputation in favour of the Gothic style of architecture being adopted waited on the Prime Minister, and that one of the gentlemen who composed the deputation was the hon. Member for South Durham (Mr. Pease). He did not know that Gothic was a style of ecclesiastical architecture peculiar to the sect to which the hon. Member for South Durham belonged. The hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Tite), the architect of the Royal Exchange, said that the Italian style was "more suited to the wants of common life, that the Gothic gave no light and no ventilation," and this he illustrated by a reference to the Committee Rooms of the House of Commons. Now, he hoped the House would not be run away with by any argument drawn from the abuse of the Gothic style of architecture. Undoubtedly, there were very great defects in the building in which they sat. There was, as the hon. Member for Brighton had said, "a maximum of cost with a minimum of accommodation," and this was an evil from which Gothic architecture suffered. The minds of Members were apt to be prejudiced against it, on account of the abuses of it which they saw before their eyes, and to be led away by the idea that the style was necessarily inconvenient and costly. The hon. Member for Bath further said, that the Foreign Office should correspond in style with the genus loci. Where that was to be found in the neighbourhood of the Foreign Office he (Lord Elcho) could not tell; but the hon. Member for Bath had no difficulty in discovering the genus loci, for he said "the Foreign Office should harmonize with Montagu House." Now, Montagu House might be a very pretty building, but he (Lord Elcho) would rather that it was not taken as a genus loci in this instance. He now came to the noble Lord at the head of the Government. The noble Lord, always gay and cheerful himself—said that public buildings should be gay and cheerful outside, and light and airy in their interior. "The Gothic," he said, "might be suited to monastic buildings or a Jesuits' College, but it was not suited to the purpose to which it was proposed to adapt it. He did not know what the peculiarities of Lombardo-Gothic were, but it combined all the modifications of barbarism." Now, the Committee of 1858, though they gave no opinion as to the style that ought to be adopted, went thoroughly into the question of cost, and it was distinctly proved by Mr. Hunt, the Surveyor of the Board of Works, that in regard to cost there was no difference between one style and the other, the estimate for the Gothic structure being, if anything, rather lower than the other. Then, in respect to convenience, the Gothic was shown to be quite as convenient as any other. As to light, by an actual measurement in feet and inches, it was proved that the Gothic design of Mr. Scott admitted of more light than would be found in any public building in London in the Palladian style. As to the objection that the Gothic was "ecclesiastical," he might pass that by, merely reminding the House that in North Italy nearly all the ancient public buildings were Gothic, and most beautiful they were. As to Gothic being barbarous and foreign, what was the Italian? Did not its very name import that it was foreign? His noble Friend wound up his speech and argument by declaring that he did not know the peculiarities of Lombardo-Gothic, but "he supposed it combined all the modifications of barbarism." He was surprised that his noble Friend, who spoke Italian like an Italian, should speak thus of Lombardo-Gothic. But in Northern Italy some of the most beautiful edifices were in this style—for instance, the Doge's Palace, and many other palaces in Venice, the hospital at Milan, and others. If these were modifications of barbarism he should like to see a few such buildings in this country. They would be a great improvement on the buildings which we were in the habit of constructing in this country. It was said that on grounds of congruity it was desirable to adopt the Italian style. But the most beautiful towns were not the most congruous. Congruity was, indeed, often only another name for monotony. Look at Chester, Heidelberg, Venice, and other towns with gable ends and other irregular and picturesque features; it was this variety that gave these cities their charm. Instead of being built all of one style it was highly desirable that there should be a variety in our public buildings. He had endeavoured to refute the arguments urged against the Gothic style; but he did not wish to pledge the House to adopt that style for the new buildings. But before they sanctioned the expenditure of half a million or more of money, he only asked them to go into the tea-rooms to see the plans of the building now proposed to be built. He spoke with some diffidence on a matter of taste, and he did not wish to express himself too strongly, but he must say that since the plan had been exhibited his noble Friend had succeeded in uniting those who had never before agreed; for those who differed as to Gothic and Palladian united in condemning the plan which his noble Friend approved. In fact, his noble Friend's Foreign Office was as faulty as his foreign policy was sound. He, therefore, wanted the House to pause before they adopted a public building which would not be a credit or an ornament to the Metropolis. Great as our success had been in many things it could not be said we had succeeded in our public buildings. Any one who stood on London Bridge, and looked first upon the southern side and then passed to that street of palaces, as it had been called (New Cannon Street), could not fail to be struck by the unutterable meanness and want of originality of our street architecture. What would happen would be this. If his noble Friend came down and asked for a million of money to erect a large public building in the Italian style, no doubt a most imposing structure would be built; but that building would give the keynote to other buildings. Our street architecture would degenerate. The building would be imitated in plain, mean, brick houses; or, if not, they would have things of stucco—a sham which pretended to be what it was not, and which was almost the worse of the two. No doubt the Gothic style had this advantage, that it permitted every variety of play of fancy and the use of any materials whatever which could be had in London on the spot. The Houses of Parliament were built of stone. They had lately been obliged to paint the building, and they had thus made it look like one of the buildings with stucco fronts. Let them put whatever paint upon it they pleased, however, there was something in the atmosphere of London so hostile to stone that paint could not save it, and a Committee were now sitting to see how they could prevent the Houses of Parliament from crumbling into the Thames. Buckingham Palace, too, had lately had a new stone front. But no sooner was it constructed than they were obliged to paint it. The same thing had happened, he believed, in other buildings. This, then, was a very strong argument against the adoption of the pure Italian, which could not be carried out in that variety of style and colour of which the Gothic would admit. With terra cotta, for example, which was the most durable of all things, they would have variety of colour and ornament, by means of the introduction of serpentine, Cornish granite, &c. Where they had a building all of one colour, it soon became a dead dull gray and then black, as might be seen on one side of Spencer House. On the contrary, where they had a variety of colour, the surface might be discoloured by smoke and dust, like a picture in London, but yet a variety of colour could be discerned beneath the surface. If they were to judge of public feeling by the buildings in hand there could be no question that the classical or Italian was at a discount, and that the style which admitted of a play of fancy, but which his noble Friend described as abounding with all sorts of monstrosities, was predominating in London. He did not mean those mansions which were in course of building for young couples in Belgravia and Tyburnia, with plain stucco fronts. The other day a party who took an interest in this question took a tour through London. They invited his noble Friend (Viscount Palmerston) to join them, but he declined. He was sorry for that, because his noble Friend might have changed his mind in consequence. They saw an insurance office near Blackfriars Bridge, which was, he thought, a happy illustration of what he had advocated. It was built in the style which his noble Friend so much abused; and on the right and left of it were two stucco fronted houses in the Italian style. A photograph had been made of them, which he supposed might be bought, and which described the house on one side as "Palmerston ornate," and on the other "Palmerston pure." The middle building was designated as "What London would be if Palmerston would allow it." [The noble Lord here handed a copy of the photograph to each side of the House.] He would take two large buildings which had sprung up lately—one opposite Buckingham Palace, called the Palace Hotel, which was pure Palmerstonian; the other was the Victoria Hotel; and could any one doubt of the superiority of the latter over the former? There was no comparison between them. One was in the classic style, and the other admitted of variety and fancy, and was a very fine building, though it wanted colour. They found, in going through London, that this sort of building was cropping out in all directions; and if his noble Friend succeeded in erecting the Foreign Office according to the Palladian design in the tea room, all that would be shown would be that the House of Commons was not acting in accordance with the feeling and spirit of the country and of Europe in general on the question of architecture. He begged pardon for having so long trespassed on the attention of the House; but he felt strongly on the subject, and he was anxious that the House should not, by sanctioning the erection of the noble Lord's last design for the new Foreign Office, be led into a mistake which it could not remedy. The noble Lord was all-powerful and all-popular. He hoped the noble Lord would not abuse his popularity and power by attempting to force on the House a design of this kind. Let the House recollect the Duke of Wellington's statue. The Duke of Wellington's popularity prevented that monstrosity from being pulled down while he was alive; and the Duke of Wellington's popularity, now he was gone, prevented any Member of Parliament from moving an Address to the Queen praying that the statue might be pulled down, as being a disgrace to the arts and to the taste and common sense of the people. Let the House take care that the same mistake was not committed in reference to this Palladian design for the Foreign Office, and that the noble Lord's popularity and power did not prevent it from doing that which it ought to do—namely, agree to the Motion with which he should conclude. The hon. Member for Bath, in a former discussion, said that the House of Commons, when it made a mistake in legislation could bring in a Bill to amend the mistake; but the House should take care not to make great mistakes in costly monuments of granite and marble.

Amendment proposed,

"To leave out from the word 'That' to the end of the Question, in order to add the words 'in the opinion of this House it is not desirable that the new Foreign Office should be erected according to the Palladian design now exhibited in a Committee Room of the House.'"

—instead thereof.

MR. BUXTON seconded the Resolution, and said he rose rather to confirm than add to the remarks just made by the noble Lord. The Palladian design, against which the noble Lord had spoken, might have great merit, but he found it allowed on all hands that one merit it did not possess—the merit of being beautiful. Every one agreed that it was—he would not say ugly, but dull. There was in it nothing original or striking. No human being would ever be so deluded as to look up at it with that keen intellectual delight which was awakened by a really noble building. In repeating these general remarks he was not disparaging Mr. Scott. Every one allowed that the Gothic design which that eminent architect had prepared, though its outline might be amended, was radiant with grace and beauty. It glowed with thought and imagination, and would kindle the minds of those who looked at it. This difference was natural. Mr. Scott was a man of genius, but his genius lay in Gothic. In setting him to Palladian they went against his mind's grain; and he was glad to find that many hon. Gentlemen who did not love Gothic, yet said that if Mr. Scott was to be the architect it would be only good sense to give his genius its own sphere, instead of forcing him to work for which he was unfit. He was not going to compare the merits of the Gothic and classic styles. In fact, he had drawn so much enjoyment from both of them that he had no wish to assail either—though in passing he might remind the House that Palladian was not classic, but a bastard daughter of the classic style. But he hoped they would be guided by the plain common sense of the matter. He would not address himself to the good taste of the House, but to its good sense and judgment. And, keeping strictly to that ground, let him try to dispel the illusion that experience in that House showed the inconveniences of the Gothic style for a secular building. It was true that that particular Gothic was inconvenient; but the reason was that it was bad Gothic. We had made great progress in the Gothic style in the twenty or thirty years since that House was commenced, and has ventured to say that in Mr. Scott's Gothic design there would be precisely as much air, light, and freedom from soot as in his Palladian design. There would be none of this absurd folly of large mullions and small panes, and windows opening by pal-leys, or not at all. As to expense, the Committee reported that the style would make little or no difference. But now there seemed to him to be one decisive argument against a Palladian design; that was that the Palladian style had already lost, or was quickly losing, all hold on popular affection. This could not be denied. A thousand things showed that every year public feeling was becoming more and more averse to that style. In all architectural publications it was found that Gothic and other intermediate styles were advocated in preference to it. All young architects, if let alone, forsook it. Scarce a single recent building was in pure Palladian. Lately a great edifice was built at Manchester by a committee of mercantile men, with a Quaker chairman, and they would have it in Gothic. Most striking of all, only last Thursday the Premier himself rode twenty-two miles in a flood of rain to lay the foundation stone of a Gothic building, and told the company he had had great pleasure in doing so. All this might show bad taste in the British public; but it was the fact. Men above sixty still loved Palladian; men of taste below sixty hated it. Nor was that strange. Since Queen Elizabeth's time we had had nothing else. No wonder the world was growing dead-sick of it. It was a style, too, that had little range. It did not, like Gothic, admit of infinite adaptation and variety. Uniformity was its soul. Naturally it palled at last on the eye. Now, he appealed to the noble Lord, whose common sense was the admiration of his countrymen, whether it would be good sense to set up a great mass of building in a style of which the world was fast growing weary. Surely in such a matter the old should a little yield to the young. It was by the men of the future that this building would be enjoyed or execrated. Let it be built as they would wish it built. And of this he assured the noble Lord, that if he built it in Palladian it would not be enjoyed but execrated by the rising generation of men of taste. He put it respectfully to the noble Lord whether he would not generously sacrifice his own prepossessions in order to let this building harmonize with the feelings of the rising rather than the setting generation of men.

Lord Elcho

-MR. COWPER said, he was glad to hear his noble Friend (Lord Elcho) as well as the hon. Gentleman who seconded the Resolution disclaim any very decided partiality with respect to the Gothic, Italian, or Renaissance style, he inferred from that disclaimer that they were not really convinced that the public opinion, of which they spoke so boldly, was in their favour. His noble Friend had used expressions of contempt towards this selected design, and assumed that public opinion had declared against the design by Mr. Scott which was now exhibited in one of the Committee rooms, and for which a

Vote would be proposed in the Committee of Supply. People were apt to attribute to the public that opinion which happened to be their own. Possibly a knot of eager partizans of a particular style had congregated around his noble Friend, and by their constant buzzing had kept from his ears all remarks made by individuals of a different taste; for it so happened that he (Mr. Cowper) had found a different opinion on the subject, not only among ordinary persons to be met with in the streets—men who had superficial notions and slight interest about architecture—but also among persons practically versed in the science of architecture, and, competent to pronounce an authoritative judgment, and the opinion he had heard from illustrious architects who had practised the Italian style was that Mr. Scott's design did that gentleman the greatest credit, and was better than any of the Italian designs exhibited in 1857. If the House should come to the conclusion that the new Foreign Office should be built in accordance with the proposed plan they might, he thought, rest satisfied that we had procured the best design in that particular style which could be obtained. Mr. Scott, who stood so prominent as a Gothic architect, had done himself credit by the manner in which he had succeeded in dealing with architecture of a style with which he was not so familiar; and when his noble Friend who introduced the subject to the notice of the House described the design to which he had called attention as emanating from the noble Lord at the head of the Government, he was paying the noble Lord a compliment more flattering, perhaps, than was intended. The noble Lord at the head of the Government, representing what he believed to be the views and preferences of the majority of the House and of the country, had asked Mr. Scott to prepare an elevation for a new Foreign Office in the Italian style. It would not have been to the credit of Mr. Scott had he said, "I am an architect only in one style: I can do nothing without the pointed arch, and I, therefore, decline to undertake any other"—but Mr. Scott, being conscious of his own ability to deal with whatever style the country might prefer, submitted to authority, and undertook the commission. The noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire seemed to be much pleased at having found certain buildings in the Metropolis which were not in the prevailing style of architecture, and had mentioned an insurance office in Bridge Street with satisfaction and triumph. The House, however, should bear in mind that the money lavished on the outside of assurance offices was intended to attract attention, and that notoriety was obtained more readily by strangeness and peculiarity than by conformity with the prevailing taste. Either a novel or an exploded style would serve as an advertisement and allure business. He was surprised to hear his noble Friend still claiming the Gothic as the national style. If the epithet were understood to denote what originated in the nation, or what exclusively belonged to it, was not more national than the Gothic, the Italian, and Stonehenge or the Irish cabins, were the best examples of the national style. But if the epithet implied that which was adopted by the nation, and prevailed to the greatest extent in the country, it certainly belonged to the Italian style. It must be manifest to anybody who used his eyes that London as a city was built not in the vertical and pointed but in the horizontal or Italian style; and the House of Commons ought in making a selection of a design for a new Foreign Office, to give preference to a style which would be best adapted to a public building, and which would combine the largest amount of internal convenience with an elevation calculated to produce great architectural effect without unnecessary expense. The style best adopted for a public office, and most available for modern construction, was the Italian, nor did the warmest advocates of Gothic architecture assert its superiority over the Italian in these respects. Assuming, then, that upon practical grounds the Italian style was that which it was desirable to select for the new Foreign Office, the next consideration by which the choice in architecture ought to be guided was that of association. Acting upon that consideration, churches were built in the style of the early Christian ages for the sake of preserving in the minds the worshippers the associations of ancient times. And for the same reason the architect of a Wesleyan chapel looking to the associations of the Eighteenth century, built in the style of George III. rather than in that of Edward I. It was also natural that when the present Houses of Parliament were about to be erected, a style should be chosen connected with the period when the House of Commons first acquired its liberties, and thus associate the past with the present. In the case of the new Foreign Office, however, he saw no reason for mediæval associations. No hon. Member wished, he presumed, to associate the transactions in that office with those of by-gone times, nor would he desire to see the foreign policy of the present day correspond with that of the days of King John. On the contrary, the association to be desired was that of the period in which we lived, and the Italian style was that which by its breadth, simplicity, and symmetry best represented modern sentiment and aims. It was a matter of importance that the style, whatever it might be, should be of such a character as would make the new building group well with those in its vicinity. A building of any description standing alone had only its peculiar architectural merits to depend upon; but when there were a number of buildings contiguous to one another, much of the beauty of the entire group, taken from any particular point of view, depended upon the harmony of the whole. Now, he saw no prospect of the plan of clearing the houses between Charles Street and Great George Street, which was a few years ago contemplated, being carried into execution, and the new Foreign Office would therefore be seen in conjunction with the Treasury, the Horse Guards, and the buildings in Whitehall. Any person going from Regent's Park to Pall-mall would find Palladian elevations along the route; and copies from the best models of Italian architecture in Pall Mall. He would find the same style continued through Trafalgar Square and Whitehall, and the Foreign Office should be the culminating point of this long series of buildings. Another object which was sought to be attained in choosing the design, was to afford as much pleasure to the public who would look upon it as possible. It had been asserted that by many persons in this country the Palladian style was execrated; but, for his own part, he was of opinion that for one person who took delight in the pointed, there were twenty who derived greater satisfaction from the Italian style of architecture. The latter was the style which now prevailed in Paris and the Continent. The erection of the new office ought not only to afford satisfaction to those who had a taste for art, but should be the means of furnishing an example and a model of what builders ought to copy. For one person who would profit by the example of a building in the Gothic style, there would be twenty who would profit by the example of a building in the Italian style. He thought these grounds were sufficient to justify the Vote which the Government were about to propose, and which would be for the erection of a building on the last design prepared by Mr. Scott. The noble Lord, the Member for Haddingtonshire, evidently wanted to exclude that design. That design, however, was the best which could be obtained in the Palladian style, and he was sure the House would never regret its adoption.

MR. LAYARD thought it was strange that in this nineteenth century we had made so little advance in the art of architecture. The principle of architecture of the present day, as far as public buildings were concerned, appeared to be to imitate as closely as possible something that had gone before, and was as little applicable as possible to the real wants of the age. That House, for example, was a Gothic building. The exterior had much of the beauty of the Gothic style, but the interior had all the inconveniences which characterized buildings in the time of our forefathers. So with modern classic buildings. We had beautiful exteriors in the classic style, but the interiors, for the most part, were such as prevented us from enjoying—what we all wanted—the light of Heaven. That House moreover, swarmed with hideous and grotesque monsters, which, though called lions and unicorns, resembled nothing so much as the gorillas lately discovered on the west coast of Africa. He believed these frightful animals had even crept into the apartments occupied by the Speaker. Yet they did not necessarily belong to Gothic architecture. In the British Museum, on the other hand, we had a classic building, but we had spoilt it by erecting a great colonnade which rendered a whole series of halls almost useless. When these things were mentioned reference was always made to authority—as if authority alone were sufficient to reconcile us to monstrosities. Take the monument lately erected by Mr. Scott himself in the neighbourhood of Westminster Abbey. Some considered it a very fine monument; but although it might be justified on authority it could not be justified on common sense. On his column Mr. Scott had put a number of Kings and Queens, and on the top of all had placed a George and the Dragon. That was not consistent with common sense. What we wanted was a building adapted to our present wants. The noble Lord at the head of the Government objected to Gothic on the ground that it was an ecclesiastical style—the style of the Jesuits. Everybody knew that the Gothic, instead of being the style of the Jesuits, was the very style which the Jesuits destroyed. The Jesuits introduced a tawdry renaissance style, which utterly destroyed that grand Christian style of architecture which was then developing itself in Italy. Again, the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Tite), who was himself an architect of no inconsiderable eminence, objected to the Gothic style, because it excluded the light. There was no foundation for that objection. They might have the whole side of that chamber one mass of light if they liked. In classic architecture there was something to prevent the admission of light. Classic architecture sprang up in the South, where one great object was to exclude the light and heat of the sun; as far as the admission of light was concerned we could not get a style more adapted to it than the Gothic which originated in the north where more light is required. The President of the Board of Works had said that the Gothic was not in use on the Continent. Mr. Scott had recently erected one of his finest Gothic works in Hamburg, and everybody knew that the Town halls on the Continent presented magnificent specimens of Gothic architecture. The charge of ugliness had been brought against the Gothic. At one time that might have been true; but the Italians had done much to take away all ugliness from the Gothic, and in one of the most beautiful monuments in Florence the Gothic was combined with the classic style in the most exquisite manner. He believed, indeed, that if the Jesuits, to whom the noble Lord at the head of the Government attributed a love of the Gothic, had not interfered, Italy would have given us, in a modification of the Gothic, one of the most beautiful and most Christian forms of architecture which the world had ever seen. It was a mistake to suppose that Palladio, who was a man of genius, confined himself to one style. Palaces at Vicenza in the Italian Gothic style are attributed to him. He most decidedly objected, however, to what was called in this country the Palladian style, and he thought the design prepared by Mr. Scott a mean design. He had no wish to cast reflections upon Mr. Scott; on the contrary, he thought he had produced a fair plan, all things considered; but Mr. Scott was not a classic architect; his whole time and study had been directed to Gothic architecture, and hence he excelled in that branch, and not in another. It was scarcely fair to that House, or to the country, to accept the classic design prepared by Mr. Scott; because that gentleman won his prize by a Gothic and not by a classic design, and classic architects ought to have been allowed to compete with him in their own style. His objection to the Palladian style was that it was a mean style in London, where it could not be carried out properly. The design in the tea-room looked to him like some of the new terraces in Regent's Park, which, like all large masses of renaissance buildings, were exceedingly monotonous. The monotony of classic buildings could only be broken by porticoes and colonnades—the very things which ought to be avoided in this country, where light was indispensable. With classic buildings we could not have that ornamentation which was always necessary. The ancients painted and sculptured the exterior of their classic buildings, and so produced a very fine effect; but we could not have the same delicate painting and sculpturing in London, because the atmosphere would destroy all that kind of decoration in a very short time. The President of the Board of Works had referred in terms of praise to Paris. Everybody knew how monotonous Paris had recently become. The new streets were most oppressive and tiresome, and one was glad to take refuge in the old parts of the city. In Paris might be seen how architecture illustrated the political condition of a people. A stranger seeing Paris for the first time would at once say “A despotic powerdom could execute such works!” The whole was built on one plan. One day he observed a peculiar commotion going on in the Rue Rivoli. From one end of the long street to the other scaffolding poles were erected, and hundreds of people were engaged in scrubbing and scraping. On asking the meaning of it he was told by a person who did not speak English very well that all the people had been ordered to “scratch their outsides.” Such was the system in Paris. Everything was done by one person, and consequently everything was dull and monotonous. What we wanted, on the contrary, was variety, beauty, something that would interest people, not a repetition of the same thing. He did not altogether approve of the Italian Gothic design in the room; but he thought the third plan deserved great consideration. It possessed great beauties. The Houses of Parliament were erected at a time when the Gothic was little known in this country, and they were consequently overloaded with expensive and tasteless ornaments. Nevertheless, Sir Charles Barry deserved great credit for what he had done, for he was a classic architect, and it was not fair to require him to erect a Gothic building. Excessive ornamentation disfigured a Gothic building, and took away from its dignity. He would suggest that the designs of Mr. Scott should be referred to a Select Committee. In ancient times, when great public buildings were to be erected, the architects were always placed in communication with the leading men of the State. He had not the honour of knowing Mr. Scott, but from all he had heard of his character he had no doubt he would be prepared to meet a committee of gentlemen, and, if anything objectionable were pointed out in his plans, to make what might be considered improvements in them. He thought the Gothic plan should be accepted, on the understanding that some changes should be made in it; and then they would have a most magnificent building. His right hon. Friend had talked of the great improvements in taste which had taken place in the City of London. He quite agreed with him in that respect. Everywhere they saw magnificent buildings arising, if not of pure Gothic, of an English character—that is Gothic adapted to the wants and manners of the times. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cowper) made an extraordinary admission with reference to the Fire Insurance Office, when he said it was built as an advertisement to attract people. The fact, then, was that it was thought that that style of architecture would be so attractive to the people that they would thereby be induced to insure their houses and persons in that building. A Gothic building in this country would admit what was most required—colour, by the introduction of terra cotta, red granite, and coloured marbles. It admitted of all varieties, and might well be made worthy of the country and the times in which we lived.

MR. TITE thought the proposition which had just been made one of the most extraordinary he had ever heard. He must certainly challenge the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Layard) to point out any building of distinction which deserved the character of Gothic except in Lombardy, in which coloured materials were to be found. Even in Lombardy, the best specimen, the best Duomo of Milan, was built entirely of marble homogeneous in colour. What would be the effect of York, or Canterbury, or Amlens, or Antwerp disfigured with terra cotta or coloured materials. The introduction of terra cotta or coloured marble into structures of a Gothic character would be a great mistake. There was terra cotta work in buildings in Milan in the Palladian style—but they were Italian buildings in every sense of the word. He had certainly heard a very strong opinion expressed with regard to the design in the tea-room. He had no desire to insist on his own opinion, though he must have wasted his time for forty years if he did not know something about the matter. His friend, Mr. Scott, had as much distinguished himself by Italian as by Gothic designs; and an architect who was well informed in the pursuit he embraced might, without any great difficulty, succeed in one style as easily as in another. Sir Charles Barry did so, and the faults of that House as to cost, darkness, and want of ventilation were not his, but incidental to the style. If they took Mr. Scott's Gothic design, with its large window-heads, the whole upper part of the rooms must be in darkness. What was wanted was a square window up to the ceiling, so that the light might come in freely, and, the sash being let down, that natural ventilation might be available. With regard to the genius loci, he must say, the magnificent Banqueting House of Inigo Jones on the one side, the new buildings of the Treasury on the other, and the mansion of the Duke of Buccleuch, when finished—which was of classical architecture in a certain sense—would not harmonize well with a Gothic Foreign Office. Towards the close of 1859 a large body of the leading architects did him the honour to request him to introduce them to the noble Viscount at the head of the Government. Among them were men of the highest character, such as Smirke, Donaldson, Cokerell, Godwin, and others. They waited on the noble Lord, and expressed to him their obligation for his determination against carrying out the Gothic plan in the new Foreign Office. They thought the application of Gothic architecture to the Foreign Office an entire mistake, and they expressed a hope that the noble Lord would persevere in his determination. Sir Charles Barry himself when examined before the Committee said he did not think we should introduce Gothic architecture here—it would be wrong in his judgment; it ought to be Italian. And then it should be recollected that of the 218 designs only 15 were Gothic; and all the first premiums were given to Italian architecture. He knew no better authority on the subject of the beauty of Italian architecture than Mr. Ruskin—a man who by his Stones of Venice and his Lamps of Architecture had done more than any other to make architecture understood æsthetically. What did Mr. Ruskin say?—

“Of all the buildings in Venice, later in date than the final additions to the Ducal Palace, the noblest is, beyond all question, that, which having been condemned by its proprietor, not many years ago, to be pulled down and sold for the value of its materials, was rescued by the Austrian Government, and appropriated—the Government having no other use for it—to the business of the Post Office, though it is still known to the gondolier by its ancient name—the Casa Grimani.

This Palace is the principal type at Venice, and one of the best in Europe, of the Central Architecture of the Renaissance Schools; that carefully studied and perfectly executed architecture to which those schools owe their principal claims to our respect, and which became the model of most of the important works produced by civilized nations. I have called it ‘Roman Renaissance,’ because it is founded, both in its principles of super-imposition and in the style of its ornament, upon the architecture of classic Rome at its best period. The revival of Latin literature both led to its adoption and directed its form; and the most important example of it which exists in the modern Roman Basilica of St. Peter's. It had, at its renaissance, or new birth, no resemblance either to Greek, Gothic, or Byzantine forms, excepting in retaining the use of the round arch, vault, and dome; in the treatment of all details it was exclusively Latin; the last links of connection with mediæval tradition having been broken by its builders in their enthusiasm for classical art, and the forms of true Greek or Athenian architecture being still unknown to them. The study of these noble Greek forms has induced various modifications of the Renaissance in our own times; but the conditions which are found most applicable to the uses of modern life are still Roman, and the entire style may be most fitly expressed by the term ‘Roman Renaissance.’ It is this style, in its purity and fullest form—represented by such buildings as the Casa Grimani at Venice, built by San Micheli; the Town Hall at Vicenza, by Palladio; St. Peter's at Rome, by Michael Angelo; St. Paul's and Whitehall in London, by Wren and Inigo Jones,—which is the true antagonist of the Gothic school.”

To that opinion he entirely subscribed. He thought the House would do wisely and well to leave the matter in the hands of the Executive Government. The result, he had no doubt, would be a building which would in no sense prove a disgrace to England, but a splendid building adopted in all respects to the purpose for which it was intended—the Gothic style of architecture was the right thing in the right place; but that place was not the Foreign Office.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, the hon. Member who had just sat down condemned the Gothic style, but he must not quarrel with other Gentlemen if they analyzed the reasons which he gave for the opinion at which he had arrived. His objections simply amounted to this—he condemned the Gothic because it was inconvenient, and because a sufficient body of light could not be admitted through the windows of a building in that style. Now, the House must bear in mind that the hon. Gentleman was a member, and, of course, a leading member, of the Select Committee which sat three years ago on this very question. Witnesses of the greatest authority were examined, and those who disputed the views entertained by the hon. Gentleman were subjected by him to a minute cross-examination; and yet at the close of a prolonged inquiry the Committee unanimously reported that, having very carefully considered the two styles with reference to cheapness, commodiousness, and facility of ventilation, the result of their inquiries led them to the belief that in those respects no material preference existed on either side. Yet the hon. Gentleman, who was an assenting party to that decision, now called on the House to reject the Gothic style as inconvenient, and precluding the entrance of a sufficient body of light. The hon. Gentleman himself as an architect had defied any architect to make handsome Gothic windows which would open in a satisfactory manner. But what was said by Mr. Scott, of whom the hon. Member entertained a high opinion? Did he admit that those windows would not open or admit sufficient light? On the contrary, he stated—and his assertion would be borne out by every practical man—that his windows were “Larger than any public building in the opposite style in London, and that the mode of opening and shutting them was the same as in the most recent public and private buildings; they were glazed with large sheets of plate-glass, and were in every way up to the full point of practical improvement which up to the present time had been effected in buildings of whatever style.”

And he would show the House that during the last two years the hon. Gentleman himself had practically shown his approval of the Gothic style by the buildings which he himself had invented or sanctioned. But before he came to this he wished to impress upon the House to deal with this subject apart from the question of taste, and on the ground of common sense. What was the position of the House and the country with reference to the Foreign Office? The architect had been appointed; for, though the noble Lord had questioned and cavilled at the appointment, he had at last frankly admitted, both privately and publicly, that Mr. Scott was appointed in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Committee, and with universal official practice, and, therefore, that he could not be removed from the position of architect to the new public offices. It being admitted that Mr. Scott ought to have the appointment, he put it to the House, as men of business, what was the necessary inference as to the style which should be adopted? Mr. Scott was the greatest Gothic architect, not in England only, nor even in Europe; his fame was spread over the whole habitable globe. Having selected him to erect a great public building, ought they not, as reasonable men, to leave him free to act, and to give him a fair chance for the development of his talent in erecting a public building worthy of his fame and satisfactory to the country? But the noble Lord, although he admitted Mr. Scott should be the architect, said “No; you shall only erect a building in that particular style of architecture which has found favour in my eyes.” Such a course was not fair to Mr. Scott; it was not fair even to the noble Lord’s own colleagues, and they all recollected the annoyance felt by the late Mr. Fitzroy when the whole subject was removed from under his cognizance. It was not fair even to the two distinguished architects who in the great competition of 1856 obtained premiums for the Italian or French style of architecture. The hon. Member (Mr. Tite) declared the Gothic style was so little approved in 1856 that only fifteen architects thought it worth while to compete in that style; but about this there could be no doubt, that of the seven architects to whom premiums were awarded four received them for Gothic do-

signs, and the other three for plans in different styles. It was not fair to those three gentlemen that Mr. Scott should be compelled by the noble Lord to erect a building opposed to his own feelings, to the convictions of his professional life, and to the bent of his genius. The right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works had astounded him by the declaration that it was necessary to adopt this Palladian architecture, because it was the only style which found favour in the eyes of a discerning public. He took most emphatic ground in contradicting that statement. The House had already made a short tour through London, and he would ask hon. Gentlemen to take their stand in imagination on Waterloo Bridge. Casting their eyes up the stream they would see the familiar towers of Westminster; but looking in the other direction, after passing the level but in some respects beautiful elevation of Somerset House, they would see the high-pitched roof and picturesque exterior of the new library ["Oh, oh!"] which had just been built by the Society of the Middle Temple—gentlemen who would certainly condemn reactionary designs in Church and State; and, going to the quarter occupied by the other society, that of Lincoln's Inn, they would find that in its newer buildings the style which found favour was not the Palladian, but an adaptation of the English national Gothic architecture. The House had been told that, whatever might be the case in London, at any rate in the great provincial towns such was not the case. No city could be more free from reactionary or mediæval tendencies than Manchester; but in the architectural room of this year's exhibition, next to Mr. Scott's amended design of the Foreign Office was a plan in what might be called ultra-Gothic of a great public hall of justice now in course of erection in the city of Manchester. Had this been ordered by any private individual? Had favouritism been shown to any particular architect? Quite the reverse. The design was the result of public competition; and in the verdict in its favour not merely the city of Manchester, but, if he was rightly informed, nearly the whole of the county of Lancaster took part. Looking to other portions of the provinces, he found the town of Northampton, which had always returned two Liberal Members to Parliament, within the last few months had occasion to erect a public building. The design was thrown open to public competition, and the gentlemen of that town, in order to be on the safe side, applied to the hon. Member who had just sat down (Mr. Tite) to give his advice and to act as arbiter. The hon. Gentleman examined all the plans, and recommended two as the most suitable for the purpose of this building. [Mr. TITE: It is not built yet.] No; but he had seen the tenders for it. The noble Lord read a newspaper paragraph stating that—

"The Northampton Town Council met again on Monday last, and decided the important question of the Northampton Town Hall. Mr. Tite selected three out of the sixty-nine designs submitted to him; one had the motto Circumspice attached to it, and another Non nobis, Domine. The first was of the Italian order of architecture; the second of Gothic. On the whole, Mr. Tite's bias seemed to be in favour of the Circumspice design, on account of its distribution and artistic effect; but he also spoke in high terms of the Gothic design; as to which he stated that a remarkable degree of talent was exhibited in the management of the style, and that if carried into effect it would be an ornament to the town."

The Town Council, it seemed, took the advice of the hon. Gentleman, and by a majority of twelve to three adopted the Gothic design; and within the last few days he had had the pleasure of seeing in a local paper the details of the tenders for its erection. So wide, in fact, was the spread of the taste for Gothic buildings that he had recently been in a large railway station in Perth erected in that style, which he was told had been commenced by the hon. Member for Bath. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cowper) said that the Wesleyans and other Dissenters were not in favour of the Gothic style, and that they only built their edifices in the style which found favour in the reign of George III. This was a mistake. The Baptists were building their college at Rawden in the Gothic; and a number of Dissenting chapels had been built in the same style. During the last two or three years a great number of buildings of various kinds had been erected in this style. He might instance the town hall at Nantwich, public buildings at Cardigan, town halls and corn exchanges at Alston, Sutton Coldfield, and Leominster; the Royal Victoria Asylum, Wandsworth; the Equity Life Office, Lincoln's Inn Fields; workshops and warehouses in Endell Street, the Crown Assurance Office in Bridge Street, and the London Printing Company's Offices in St. John's Street, in support of his proposition that the Gothic style was increasing in public favour. He presumed that the object of the London Printing Company in adopting the Gothic was not to attract customers at the sacrifice of their own convenience in the business which they had to carry on. In Edinburgh and Glasgow there were some splendid buildings in the Gothic style; and on referring to the Colonies they found that the Parliament House in Canada and the University in Australia were to be Gothic. In Hamburg there were some fine buildings in the same style. So that at home, in the Colonies, and abroad they found a growing taste for Gothic architecture. The noble Lord was now asking the House of Commons to go back half a century, and build the modern Foreign Office in a style which would have found favour with those who lived fifty years ago, but which would not find favour in the eyes of the majority of those who were living now, or of those who were to succeed us. He should sum up what he had to say in the words of a writer in the review to which he had before referred—

“Secular Gothic appears to be making way, and we may look as surely for the town halls, assize courts, and the like, which may be erected during the next few years, to be Gothic in character (not English Gothic, however), as a few years back we might have reckoned on their being Greek. The first great step in that direction has been made in the selection of an intensely Gothic design for the assize courts at Manchester, the city par excellence of Italian Renaissance.”

He would, before sitting down, make a personal appeal in the matter immediately before the House, to the noble Lord at the head of the Government. In 1856, when the noble Lord was Prime Minister, the First Minister of Public Works invited candidates to compete for these buildings, and rumours went abroad that there were those high in authority who were against the Gothic. So prevalent was the rumour that when Lord Llanover received the architects of London, the question was distinctly put to him. He was asked whether there was any bias on the part of the Government, or whether all styles would have an impartial consideration. He answered that there was no bias, and that all styles should be considered with care. On the faith of that reply four of the architects who gained prizes sent in Gothic designs; but since that time the House had heard declarations from the noble Lord the First Lord of the Treasury which had given rise to a suspicion that under no circumstances did he intend, when the competition was entered into, to permit Gothic buildings to be erected. That must be regarded as a most unfortunate suspicion; and he, therefore, appealed to the noble Lord to give him an assurance that, whatever his own views on the subject might be, he would not bring his influence to bear on his own colleagues, or any one else, in order to set aside the decision of the House of Commons. He trusted they should hear from the noble Lord that he would take every step in his power to give effect to the verdict of the House, and in their hands he was content to leave the issue.

MR. DUDLEY FORTESCUE was not at all surprised at the inaccuracy into which the hon. Member for Bath had fallen with respect to the new offices which had been referred to in Bishopsgate Street, when he heard him quoting Mr. Ruskin as an authority in favour of classical architecture. He (Mr. Fortescue) was tolerably well acquainted with Mr. Ruskin's works, and he could state with the utmost confidence that if there was one writer who, more than another, had condemned the use of classical and advocated the adoption of Gothic architecture, it was Mr. Ruskin. He could, if necessary, point out innumerable passages in his works in proof of this assertion. Now with regard to the admission of light to a building in the Gothic style, so far from it presenting any obstacles it was well known to all who had studied the subject that that style allowed of a more ample admission of light than any other, that in fact the supply of light was practically unlimited; in proof of which he need only refer to some of the recently erected buildings in the City to which allusion had already been made, in which the rooms were literally flooded with light, to a degree very rarely to be found in the hearts of this crowded Metropolis. The great superiority of the Gothic over the classical style consisted in its perfect readiness to adopt the exterior of a building to its interior requirements. Every one is aware that the interior of a house is not all divided into equal parts, nor in any way corresponds to the symmetrical regularity of a classical exterior. In one part, varying with the size, the depth, the aspect, the uses of a room you require a totally different provision for the admission of light from what you do in another. Take as an instance the case of some of the Clubs in Pall Mall, no one would contend that the same size or number of windows was required for the south front which looked upon the open space of Carlton Gardens as for the side looking upon the narrow streets which separates the Carlton and the Reform Club, but the classical style in which they were built took no account of the difference—the whole wall surface must be divided into equal spaces whether the building faced north or south, whereas a Gothic building could be adapted to admit a greater or less amount of lights as might be required.

The right hon. Gentleman below him (Mr. Cowper) had observed that in these days people did not build their houses in the Gothic style; now, on this point, he begged to differ from him altogether—not to go beyond the walls of that House, he saw about him several Members, among others the Members for Kerry, for Maidstone, for South Hants, for Winchester, who had all built their houses in that style. It was quite true that the generality of London houses were not of Gothic architecture, for this reason, that they could hardly be said to have any architecture at all about them, being for the most part long lines of brick shells run up by speculative builders with a certain amount of cheap ornaments worked up in cement; but in the case of individual buildings in the City, for the designs of which architects, instead of builders were employed, there was, as had been pointed out by the noble Lord who opened the debate, a decidedly increasing tendency to adopt the Gothic style. He need not refer again to the instances quoted by other hon. Gentlemen in proof of this, but he would wish to direct attention to two buildings with which he had been especially struck, one a large warehouse erected within the last two years in a street adjoining Smithfield; and the other, the new schools for St. Giles's in Endell Street, which really deserved the most attentive examination. It is a brick building, four stories high, with about the same frontage as the Travellers' or the Athenæum, and the whole building which would be an ornament to any part of this Metropolis, he was assured had not cost more than from £12,000 to £13,000.

He would not trespass farther on the patience of the House than to say, that as they had secured the services of an architect of first-rate genius, one whom he, for one, would not be afraid of comparing with the greatest architects of bygone times, who, at all events, had carried off the prizes for important public buildings on the Continent against every competitor, and who had shown by the Government designs, where he has beaten his rivals on their own ground, that he was a master of classical as well as Gothic architecture, and this architect, after studying the subject profoundly for some years, having arrived at the conviction, that for beauty, convenience, and adaptation to meet every possible requirement, no style was to be compared with the Gothic, which he (Mr. Fortescue) would suggest was that they should take their architect's advice by rejecting the Palladian, and adopting the Gothic design.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE promised the House one thing—that he would not say one word about architecture. When the noble Lord (Lord John Manners), in the innocence of his heart, deprecated this being made anything like a party question, it might not be made a party in question in the usual sense of party questions in that House; but he believed that since the celebrated feud between the Montagues and the Capulets there had been no feud like this between the Palmerstonian and the Lombardo-Gothic styles of architecture. He could not conceive a worse assembly for discussing a question of this kind than the House of Commons. That House had been tried in the balance and found wanting on questions of this kind. But he did not intend to enter into these disputes at all—he wished to speak to a matter in which they had undoubtedly been found wanting. Let them look at the House in which they were now sitting—a building which he had never considered a Gothic building at all. The original estimate for that building was £750,000, and it had cost £2,500,000. And then Gentlemen came there and talked of the different styles—the horizontal and the perpendicular—when the country was looking to something else—they were looking to what the building would cost. In 1855, Mr. Pennethorne, the Government architect, was called on to submit a plan for a new Foreign Office. He did so, and the estimate for the cost of the building only was £60,000, and £30,000 was to go for the purchase of ground. The House of Commons of that day was so singularly sparing of the public money that when they were asked for this Vote they refused to give it, and gave £10,000 to patch up the old buildings. Now there was an estimate of £200,000 for the Foreign Office. But did the House believe it would be built for that whatever style was adopted? His hon. Friend below him (Mr. M. Milnes) undertook to do it for less whether it was Lombbardo-Gothic or classical. If so, he would advise the House to give it to his hon. Friend. He did think the question had been properly treated by the House. When competition was thrown open for designs it was thrown open to the whole world, and £5,000 was the total sum for the whole of the premiated designs. The gentlemen who gained the first prizes were Messrs. Coe and Hoffland, and Messrs. Bankes and Barry; but, in consequence of Mr. Scott, who was a celebrated Gothic architect, being second for furnishing a plan of the Foreign and War Offices, he was by some hocus-pocus of the noble Lord the Member for Leicestershire put forward before the gentlemen who had the first prize. If the House were to treat this subject properly some one would move an Amendment in the spirit of "A plague on both your houses," and he (Mr. Osborne) would vote with him. Reject both the Palmerstonian and the Scott plan, re-open the question, and give the building to the man who gained the first premium. He expressed no opinion upon either style—he was so afraid of being a party to the enormous expense which was about to be incurred. He thought the whole question ought to be re-opened, and that these gentlemen ought to have the benefit of the position which they had fairly gained in 1855. He should take no part in the division, but he advised the House to be on its guard and remember always that the estimate for the Houses of Parliament was £750,000, and the actual cost £2,500,000. They were the worst Building Committee in the world, and they stood disgraced in the eyes of Europe as men of business. The cost of this undertaking would, he believed, in like manner swell into a million, and if any Gentleman would move that both plans be rejected, and the thing thrown open as at first, he should be happy to vote for it; but he would say nothing of the merits of the Palmerstonian style, the Manners style, or the Gothic.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, the battle of the books, the battle of the Big and Little Endears, and the battle of the Green Ribbands and the Blue Ribbands at Constantinople were all as nothing compared with this battle of the Gothic and Palladian styles. I must say that if I were called on to give an impartial opinion as to the issue of the conflict, I should say that the Gothic has been entirely defeated. The noble Lord who sits opposite (Lord John Manners) made it a

reproach to me that whereas he, an ardent and enthusiastic devotee of the Gothic style, appointed Mr. Scott as architect, superseding those who had won the highest prizes—thus stepping out of the usual way of selection—and appointed him—I will not say solely and entirely, because he was a Gothic architect, for Mr. Scott has, no doubt, high professional merits, but mainly on that ground—and that whereas when I succeeded to office, and confirmed Mr. Scott's claim as architect, though I did not also agree with him in adopting the style of architecture which he approved, I was bound to adopt not only the noble Lord's architect but the noble Lord's style with him. It is, I think, rather too much for a person who has left office to expect that his views in all things shall be followed by one who comes into office after him. It has sometimes been made a reproach to a new Government that they have adopted the measures of their predecessors; but it is surely no reproach to me that I did not adopt the views of the noble Lord with respect to the style of architecture that we ought to use. The noble Lord alluded to the practice of large towns in respect to architecture; but he forgot to say that some of the noblest edifices in our large towns are in the Italian or Roman style. He adverted to Liverpool. Did he forget St. George's Hall in that town? [Lord JOHN MANNERS: I did not refer to Liverpool.] Then the noble Lord took care not to mention Liverpool, or that noble building St. George's Hall. But he spoke of Manchester, though he did not refer to the Free Trade Hall, a splendid building in the Italian style. Then look at Leeds. Does the noble Lord forget the large and handsome building which is so justly considered the ornament of that town, and which is also in the Italian style? Here are buildings of great magnitude and beauty, and costing large sums of money, erected lately by the people of these towns, and I say these are indications of the taste which prevails in these towns. Then, the noble Lord went further, and saddled on the city of Edinburgh—the modern Athens—upon Edinburgh, which has adorned the Calton Hill with an imitation of the Parthenon—not being satisfied with the Italian, but going back to the Greek—the imputation of having been converted to the Gothic style. Why, Sir, I call upon every Scotch Member to repel that gross calumny. Well, objections have been made on the ground that these plans have no originality. It is said, in the first place, that Italian—I will not call it Palladian, but the Roman classical style—is not a national style. But is the Gothic national? I never heard of the Goths, the Vandals, or the Saracens doing much in this country. I have been told in my early years that the Romans were in this country for a considerable number of years, and it is probable, therefore, that they have better claims to have established in this island a system of architecture that may be considered English than those people who never came here at all. My noble Friend has talked about the real ancient architecture of England. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cowper) suggested that Stonchenge must be the style intended. But I will go further, and say that the real aboriginal architecture of this country was mud huts and wicker wigwams. These were the original styles of those who first inhabited this island. When, too, we are told that the Gothic has been practised at certain periods, I reply, so also was the Italian. When we are asked what is our national architecture, we might, I think, very reasonably, inquire who have been our most distinguished architects, and what style they have practised. Well, who were the most distinguished architects, of this country? One of them was Vanbrugh, who, although it was said of him that he “laid many heavy loads” on earth, yet has given us some very fine buildings in the Roman or Grecian style. Then we have Sir Christopher Wren and Inigo Jones. They were great men who constructed great works which to this day excite the admiration of all who behold them. Do not tell me, therefore, that Gothic architecture is the characteristic architecture of this country. If there was one characteristic style of architecture more prevalent than another it was that employed in the castellated mansions which were erected for purposes of defence, and which we now find all over the country. But the reasons why these buildings were erected have ceased to exist, and we may, therefore, dismiss that style of architecture. The noble Lord told us that there was no style that gave so much light as the Gothic. We have heard, however, of “Great windows that exclude the light,

That, doubtless, was in the Gothic architecture. My noble Friend and my hon. Friend very kindly invited me to take a morning drive with them—an invitation which I regret I was unable to accept. They went through the streets of London to test the public taste, and they found a certain number of edifices in the Gothic style, forgetting, however, all those fine buildings, such as St. Paul's, Somerset House. [An hon. MEMBER: The Post Office.] Yes, the Post Office and others. It is very much as if a gentleman were to drive through the streets of Rome, and, seeing a great number of children with their arms broken and their legs out of joint, exhibited as beggars for the profit of their parents, and forgetting all the well-conditioned, stout, and able-bodied people that he saw, were to say “Let us go home and make our children like them, for that is the taste and habit of the Roman people.” My noble Friend would reverse the boast of the Roman Emperor. He objects to stone, and would make these buildings of brick. Well, we know what the colour of brick becomes after it has been some time exposed to the London smoke. We know that it becomes the most dingy and gloomy colour that can be imagined. I am afraid of quoting an Italian authority against my noble Friend, or I might quote the opinion of Canova, a man versed in the arts, and supposed to be a very good judge. He told me, talking of London, and speaking with Italian hyperbole, “If London were only whitened it would be a real Paradise.” But my noble Friend, instead of making it a real Paradise, would make it a real—something else, with the gloominess that he would scatter over all the streets that he had the power to command. His great objection is the want of variety. Well, no doubt it is well known that error is infinite and truth is simple. Bad taste is infinite, and good taste is simple, and, therefore, it is perhaps that the Gothic admits of an infinite variety. But nothing will satisfy my noble Friend but the invention of some new order of architecture. Mr. Nash, a great architect, tried that experiment, but had not much success. We all remember the story of a gentleman who, walking along Regent Street, and being struck with something very irregular in one of the houses being constructed, said to the clerk of the works, “Good Heavens! what order of architecture do you call that?” The man said, “Oh, Sir, that is Mr. Nash's positive order.” Well, I should like to see the “positive order” of my noble Friend. If my noble Friend wants to invent a new order of architecture, and if it be worth while, let us offer a premium for it. But for Heaven's sake, seeing that we want a Foreign Office, that the Foreign Office is tumbling down, that the Colonial Office is following its example, that we want a new India Office, that the State Paper Office is crammed full and has not space for two years' more papers, I hope he will not call upon us to delay providing for these buildings until he or somebody else shall have invented a new order of architecture that shall be approved by the House of Commons—which is not a very likely thing to happen. It is quite true that I did object to the first plan of Mr. Scott, as being Gothic, and on that account not suitable. Gothic architecture is very fit for churches and other edifices, but I hold it to be very unfit for street architecture in a town where unquestionably a great number of our buildings are of a different character, and we want to combine external appearance with internal arrangement. Objection has been taken to the Italian style on the ground of monotony. But the new plan and the old are of an entirely different character; and I hold that, whether in external appearance or internal arrangement for offices, the Gothic, on the whole, does not admit of the same easy subdivision internally, and is not the proper style. Then Mr. Scott brought me an amended style, which appeared to me Gothic in disguise, with pointed windows rounded at the top. And then he brought me another style, Saracenic or Byzantine. I said then "I know you are capable of excelling in any style; now, do for Heaven's sake go and bring me something in the Italian style!" Mr. Scott did bring me an Italian style, and we have heard from the noble Lord that it has been admired by the very best judges. I do not myself pretend to be a judge of the scientific merits of architecture, but it seems to me a very beautiful plan, and one which combines with sufficient beauty and ornament great moderation of expenso. I think that is an important point. If we adopt the suggestion of my hon. Friend, and adopt different colours and different marbles—with Cornish granite and serpentine outside, which would be costly to get and to work—I say the expenso would be enormous. And, after all, let us recollect what the site is to be. The front towards Parliament Street will be seen, the front towards the Park will also be seen; but the side towards Downing Street will not be much seen, ~~the~~ other side will not be seen at all;

at Palmerston

and, therefore, it would be a waste of public money to throw away a great deal in constructing a highly ornamented building for a Foreign Office. For these reasons I determined that Italian should be the style submitted for the approbation of the House. The building is to comprise the India Office. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for India, who is to build his portion out of the Indian funds, greatly approves the style last prepared by Mr. Scott. If we were to make our part Gothic and his Italian, I do not think we should add much to the beauty and ornament of the whole. I will only now answer the appeal made to me personally by my hon. Friend. He has had the kindness to give me credit for some common sense. He said I had lately shown the possession of that quality by going down to Harrow to lay the first stone of a Gothic building there. Well, I think that did show common sense. I am not fond of the Gothic, but, having been applied to to lay the stone of a Gothic library, the plan of which was approved by the proper authorities, which was in harmony with a Gothic chapel close to which it was to be placed, and also in keeping with old John Lyon's school-house, I waived my objection to the Gothic style in attending on that occasion. Now, I ask my noble Friend and my hon. Friend to show the same good sense on this occasion. I ask them to waive their prejudices, and to agree to lay the first stone of an Italian building; and I am quite sure that when they see that building rise they will have the same feeling that I shall experience when I see this Gothic library—namely, one of great pleasure in having contributed to its erection.

The House divided:—Ayes 188; Nocs 95: Majority 93.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

House in Committee; Mr. MASSEY in the Chair.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) £30,000, New Foreign Office.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY wished to know whether any estimate had been made of the entire expenso to be incurred by the erection of the new office?

MR. COWPER said, a general estimate had been made, as far as it could at present be calculated, of the whole expense of the building, which was £200,000. But tenders would be asked for, and no building would be commenced until they had a contract in gross of the whole sum. The £30,000 now asked for was the amount which might be expended during the present year.

LORD ROBERT CECIL thought the Government ought to name a sum beyond which they would not go in accepting tenders for the erection of the new offices. He made this suggestion because he feared we should go again through precisely the same process as had been gone through in regard to the new Houses of Parliament. In the first instance, a sum approximating to what the whole expense was supposed to be was named; but the Government of that day said there were some uncertainties in reference to details which it was impossible to define at the outset; but great hopes were expressed by the Treasury Bench that beyond a certain amount the expenditure would not extend. What, however, were the facts? Year by year greater expenditure was incurred, so that the cost, instead of being confined to £700,000, the original estimate, rose to £2,500,000; and the building was still unfinished. He hoped the Committee would take every precaution against any similar waste and extravagance. It ought to insist upon an absolute pledge from the Government that a certain amount of money would not be exceeded; and that the Government should be held responsible for any unauthorized changes in the design of the building involving an augmentation of the expenditure originally agreed upon.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE complained that there was no unity of design so far as the proposed buildings were concerned, and thought an estimate of the whole of the improvements which it was intended to make in the vicinity of the Houses of Parliament should be furnished.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works evidently did not understand the question put to him by the hon. Member for Evesham—namely, whether this sum of £30,000 would be the whole expense of the new office. In the course of the recent debate the sum of £200,000 was spoken of.

MR. COWPER said, that the total estimate was £200,000. The sum now asked for was that which it was proposed to expend during the present year. With regard to the remarks of the noble Lord (Lord Robert Cecil) in reference to the augmented expense of the Houses of Parliament, he might observe that there was no security for a definite expenditure so good as a contract. When Sir Charles Barry was architect to the Houses of Parliament there was no contract in gross for the whole building, and no security taken that the approved plan would be adhered to. The plans were altered and enlarged from time to time, and after the first block of building had been erected, the only contract was for a schedule of prices. The course intended to be taken in the case of the new public offices would be different, inasmuch as he intended, having procured plans and specifications to put them out to tender, and then to enter into a contract providing for their construction for a gross sum. Such a contract would be superseded only in the event of a departure from the original plans, which could only take place on the responsibility of the person holding the office which he occupied. He had no reason, therefore, to suppose that those buildings would not be erected for a previously ascertained sum, or that the amount of the original estimate would be exceeded.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE asked the right hon. Gentleman to inform the House upon one point. The noble Viscount at the head of the Government incidentally let fall an observation, to the effect that the President of the India Board was anxious that the building should be commenced, in order that there might be a grant obtained. Now, he (Mr. Osborne) wished to know whether this sum of £200,000 included the building of the Colonial, Indian, and Foreign Offices?

MR. COWPER: No; only the Foreign Office.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, the right hon. Gentleman had not answered one important part of the question, namely, whether the Committee was to receive any guarantee from the Ministers of the Crown that a certain amount to be named as the expenditure for this new building should not be exceeded.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, it was utterly impossible for the Government to do more than cause an estimate to be made, to apply for a Vote founded upon that estimate, and to give instructions that the contract should not exceed the sum stated. But everyone knew that in spite of every care estimates of that kind would be exceeded. Should that happen the only course the Government could take would be to bring the excess under the notice of the House. The House could then inquire into the circumstances, and if they did not approve of the additional estimate, they could revise it. The Government could not go beyond the money voted by that House. It was impossible to say that unforeseen circumstances might not arise to make an increase of the Vote necessary. All they could do was to take every precaution that such should not be the case.

MR. WHITE said, he could not accept the reply of the right hon. Gentleman as satisfactory. There were so many instances of the estimates having been greatly exceeded, and architects seemed to have such capacious notions, that although the Minister might not intend to spend more than £200,000, the building might be commenced upon proportions which would render it impossible to stop at that amount; and then the House would be asked to vote large sums in addition, in order to prevent the first outlay being made to no purpose.

MR. PEASE said, he understood that the buildings were to be constructed by contract. That involved the question, what was the limit which the House would assign to that contract? He begged, therefore, to move that the Vote be deferred until the tenders be received by the First Commissioner of Works.

MR. COWPER said, the course taken with the Houses of Parliament was that which he was anxious to avoid. The course which he proposed to pursue in the case of the new Foreign Office was that which in the case of ordinary buildings was usually adopted. Tenders would be invited, but what the amount of those tenders would be he could not, of course, pretend to say. The present estimate was founded on a tender sent in two years ago from the design which had received the approval of his predecessor in office. The officers of his department believed that the estimate now before the Committee would cover the expenditure, and the sufficiency of the Estimates would be ascertained when he received the tenders. He could not say what a future Chief Commissioner might do with respect to any excess of expenditure, but he was decidedly of opinion that no excess should be incurred without the knowledge of the House. It was suggested that they should not vote the money till they had the tenders; but how could the Government get substantial tenders when Parliament had not sanctioned the Vote?

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE said, if they could ensure that his right hon. Friend should remain at the Office of Works, he would be content to leave the matter in his hands, for he well knew his zeal and perseverance. But suppose that the right hon. Gentleman should, by some dispensation of Providence, be removed from his present office, how could they tell what might be the character of his successor? They might get a Gothic Commissioner instead of a Palladian; and the House might hereafter be of a different temper from what it was now. As matters, therefore, stood, they had no guarantee whatever that the expense would be confined within the present estimate. The Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Durham (Mr. Pease) would postpone the estimate for a year; and he would gladly support it on that ground, for he was of opinion that they were going into this matter without sufficient consideration.

MR. BLACK said, every gentleman engaged in building knew that the cost was likely to exceed the original estimate; and this was more likely to happen with a public building than a private one. But he did not think that was any reason for postponing the estimate. The great object ought to be to get the plans made out as perfectly as possible, and when the contracts were taken to have them laid before the House. It would then be the duty of the House to see that these contracts were not exceeded.

MR. W. WILLIAMS asked what was the estimated expense of Mr. Scott's Gothic design?

MR. COWPER stated that the Gothic building first designed by Mr. Scott would have cost £230,000; but by diminutions in the amount of accommodation provided and otherwise that sum might have been reduced to £200,000.

MR. CONINGHAM thought it would be unsatisfactory to vote the money until they had some further information as to the plans and interior arrangement of the building. These matters seemed to have been regarded as matters of altogether secondary consideration.

MR. E. BALL thought that they could not postpone this Vote, and that, in reason, they ought not to do so. The argument on the other side appeared to be that they should not spend what was admitted to be necessary now for fear they might afterwards be called to expend what was not necessary. Now, it was admitted on all hands that they could not bind their successors, and, therefore, all they could undertake to do was to study economy in the most rigid way, and thus guard themselves and set the example to their successors to guard against the extravagance that in former times had been practised.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL thought it was obvious that the Chief Commissioner could not pledge any future Government or any future House of Commons. There would be no use, therefore, in postponing the Vote for one year, or even for ten years. They could only go upon reasonable expectations. The internal arrangements had been much considered. Some time ago the Under Secretary and other persons connected with the Foreign Office went over the whole subject, and the interior accommodation was found satisfactory. The only opinion he had himself expressed was that he thought it would be unnecessary to provide any residence for the Secretary of State. He believed the plan had been curtailed to that extent.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR submitted that the working plans ought to be laid before the Committee. It had been assumed that we ought to spend £200,000 upon the Foreign Office alone. He denied that that so large an expenditure was necessary, and stated that many Members had gone away under the impression that £200,000 would build, not only the Foreign Office, but, likewise, the India Office and the Colonial Office. The Select Committee said that £90,000 would be sufficient for the Foreign Office. Until they had seen, not only the elevation, but the plan of interior arrangements, the Committee would not do its duty if it voted this Estimate; the proposal of the hon. Member for Durham was, therefore, a reasonable one. If they knew they were in the hands of a great architectural genius—some Sir Christopher Wren, who would produce a work that would be a credit to the country and to the age—they might leave him to expend the public money with something like confidence; but everybody condemned this plan, and the only reason that was given for proceeding with it was that they were tied hand and foot to Mr. Scott. Why did they not pay Mr. Scott a sum of money for his trouble, and then procure a proper plan for the erection of a building that might be worthy of the country? For his own part, he thought that plan was the best which provided the requisite accommodation at the cheapest rate—for no plan of great beauty had been laid before the House. Mr. Pennethorne had erected the Museum of Practical Geology in Jermyn Street: it was a very simple building; everyone admired it; and he offered to build the Foreign Office for just one-half the sum Mr. Scott required for a most common-place building, which had only been accepted in the block in the hope that it might be susceptible of improvement in the details. Nothing could be done until next Spring, and he thought it a very reasonable proposal that this Vote should be postponed in the meantime.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Certainly my hon. Friend proposes a method of securing that there shall be no criticism on the Foreign Office, because if his proposal be adopted it will never be built. That is the only way in which you can prevent criticism on the Foreign Office, by not having it at all; because in regard to architecture, as in regard to every department of the Arts, it is impossible for the genius and ingenuity of man to invent anything which shall not be criticised. Now as to the elevation—building is a more ambiguous word—but after the discussion which has taken place it may be assumed the elevation is decided upon; and I may venture to say this, my hon. Friend thinks it is not sufficiently ornamented. It is not so ornamented as other elevations, and, therefore, it costs less. It may not be a splendid and magnificent piece of architecture, but it is handsome enough for the purpose, and I am quite sure it will be constructed at less cost than any of the other elevations. My hon. Friend has talked of Mr. Pennethorne's—a very handsome elevation; but, if I am not very much mistaken, there was a great deal more ornament in it than in the elevation of Mr. Scott. Well, now, with regard to the ground-plan, my hon. Friend wants the drawings and distribution of the interior to be laid before the House. Now, how can this House form any judgment as to the working plans and internal arrangements? My hon. Friend says when a man builds a house he requires an architect to submit plans as to the distribution of the interior. He is quite right to do so, because he means to live in the house, and he naturally wishes to know whether the arrangements of the interior will suit his convenience. But the House of Commons is not going to live in the Foreign Office.

The Foreign Office has been examined by the persons who are going to inhabit the building, and they have informed Mr. Scott what extent of accommodation will be necessary for them, and how it should be given. As to the capacity of this House to judge advantageously and economically of plans of distribution, we all know that the distribution of this building was very much looked to by Committees of the House; I cannot say that the result has been exceedingly satisfactory. With regard to expense, that depends on the amount of space covered by the building, and the elevation to be given to the building. The amount of space is a fixed quantity; the elevation we have seen, and the fault found is that it is not sufficiently handsome. That is a fault which economists cannot urge. I think it is quite handsome enough. It will be an ornament to the Metropolis; but if we go on postponing from year to year providing the money for it, the Foreign Office will never be built. It is now only lodged in a temporary manner in a building hired for the purpose. Nothing can be got by delay. The sooner the building is begun the sooner we shall obtain our object, and save inconvenience and expense.

LORE ROBERT CECIL said, they would gain this by delay—they would gain some guarantee for the expense, which they had not at present. He did not care much about the style of the building himself; but he knew that Mr. Scott could not give them very accurate estimates, for Mr. Scott was a Gothic architect, and to get a Gothic architect to build a Palladian structure was about as reasonable as to employ a landsman to build a man-of-war.

MR. CONINGHAM said, that the manner in which the plan had been brought before the Committee bore every mark of haste. He thought it was only reasonable that the Government should state distinctly what they were going to do, for of late years they had been erecting public buildings at an expense greatly exceeding the estimates.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR observed, that Mr. Pennethorne had offered to build the Foreign Office for £60,000, while Mr. Scott's plan was estimated at an expense of £170,000. Why should they give Mr. Scott the difference? By obtaining an estimate of the proposed building hon. Members would be able to determine whether it was likely to be erected for the sum named.

He explained that he had never seen the design was not sufficiently ornamented; but that he disapproved of the ornamentation proposed.

MR. BRISCOE said, although a majority of the House had decided in favour of Palladian architecture, they were wholly without information as to the ground-plan of the building. The former plan contemplated a ball room 150 feet in length, and a supper room 50 feet in width; he trusted that on this occasion such absurdities would be avoided, and that in the building only the actual requirements of the public service would be contemplated. In the absence of a model, or of some reliable details, the House was proceeding with unjustifiable haste. He thought they ought to have some security as to the way in which the money was to be expended, and he, therefore, hoped the Vote would be postponed.

MR. PEASE thought he could gather that the Committee was not prepared to withhold its confidence from the Government on the matter; and, therefore, he would not divide the House. It was only due to the First Commissioner of Works that he should have some authority to strengthen his hands. It would be found that this discussion on the Estimates was only like the drops before the thunder storm, if they proceeded with the reckless expenditure of the public money that was now going on.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY asked, whether the present Vote was to be expended with a definite object, or whether it was but the first step by which the House would be drawn into an indefinite expenditure, as in the case of the Houses of Parliament, which commenced with an estimate of £700,000 and gradually swelled to £2,000,000? If it was to be supposed that by voting for this sum they were pledging themselves to an expenditure of £200,000 he would not vote for it. He should greatly like to know on what foundation the present calculations were based.

MR. W. E. DUNCOMBE said, the plan proposed was very much objected to; and, therefore, he trusted the noble Lord would consent to some delay. There was also a fair claim for the postponement of this Vote from the circumstance that many hon. Members had left the House under the impression that it included not only the Foreign Office, but an expenditure upon the Indian Office, and a residence for the Secretary of State.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH wished to know, did the £230,000 include the purchase of the land as well as the erection of the building?

MR. COWPER said, that the total of the Estimate was £200,000 and not £230,000. That was for the works only, and did not include the purchase of the land. He did not see how hon. Members could justify the impression that the India Office was included; because his noble Friend had distinctly stated that the India Office would be paid for out of the revenues of that country. He was surprised at the charge of haste in this case, seeing that the subject had been under discussion for the last four years, and had been carefully examined by two Governments, and he could not see how matters would be improved by delay. The plan of Mr. Penne-nethorne, which had been referred to by his hon. Friend the Member for Poole, was made before the competition for the Foreign Office, and formed part of a general plan for public offices. It was not adopted at the time, and would, if it were now submitted, be found totally inadequate to the demands of a Foreign Office. There was a large space in Downing Street lying waste, and in a condition that was disgraceful to the Government. He did not see that any advantage could arise from detailed plans of the interior of the building being submitted to the House; for it would be impossible for the House to go into them. The Vote now before the Committee would authorize the Government to ask for tenders. He could not now foresee exactly what the tender would be. It was impossible for him to bind himself to any sum; but he would undertake that tenders should be asked for on a complete plan, from which there need be no departure.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY believed the Committee would be lucky if they got the Foreign Office erected for £200,000. He rejoiced that the House had decided in favour of the Palladian style of architecture, but he deplored that the building was to be erected by a gentleman whose great renown had been obtained from his designs of Gothic buildings. The best thing that could be done would be to pay Mr. Scott a premium, and then to engage a good architect who had fully studied the Palladian style of architecture.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR explained that he found the estimate of Mr. Penne-nethorne—£60,000—in the Report of the Select Committee, and that that estimate was submitted to the House by the responsible Government of the day.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY wished to ask again how the architect would be remunerated, and how the land had been paid for, or possession of it obtained, and whether any part of it appertained to the Land Revenues of the Crown?

MR. COWPER said, the architect would receive the ordinary Commission on the cost of the work. The Government did not intend to depart from that custom. A portion of the land which formed the site formerly belonged to the Woods and Forests Department; but an arrangement was come to whereby an exchange of property took place between the Board of Works and the Woods and Forests, and the whole of the site was now vested in the Board of Works.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) £50,599, Two Houses of Parliament.

MR. W. WILLIAMS complained that there was no detail of the estimate for the House of Lords.

MR. PEEL explained that it was not usual for that House to consider the application of the sum voted for the expenses of the other House.

MR. LINDSAY complained that there was no room in which a Member could see a stranger who had business with him, and he wished to suggest that a waiting-room should be provided for distinguished strangers visiting the House, who at present were obliged to wait in the lobby.

MR. CAIRD suggested that the latest telegraphic intelligence should be supplied to the reading-room. He also thought that messengers of the House should be allowed to enter the House to deliver to Members the cards of strangers wishing to see them, as was done in the House of Lords.

MR. MONCKTON MILNES observed, that the access to the House was very difficult owing to the number of persons in the lobby. He thought that one of the libraries, that on the right hand upon entering the House, could be applied to the use of Members wishing to see strangers. The want of accommodation for strangers was a subject of general complaint.

MR. COWPER replied, that all the accommodation had already been appropriated, and the only place he could think of would be one of the libraries, if that would not interfere with Members who were reading there. He did not think it would be well to relax the rule and allow persons not Members to cross the floor of that House. The number of messages was so great that the admission of messengers would interfere with the debates.

LORD HOTHAM remarked that the difference between the numbers usually attending the two Houses rendered any comparison between them quite out of the question.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) £43,173, to complete the sum for the Treasury.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH asked for explanation concerning the balances for former years. The hon. Member also animadverted on the system of employing "temporary, supplemental, and extra clerks" in the Government offices. Vacancies in the permanent staff ought, he thought, to be filled up from the list of temporary employés. There should also be a better classification between those who did head work and those who were mere copyists. The practice of employing men of superior attainments in mechanical drudgery led to discontent, slovenliness, and useless expense.

MR. PEEL said, that the balances were given as they stood on the 31st of December, in consequence of the recommendation of the Committee on Miscellaneous Expenditure to that effect. He did not know how a better arrangement than that at present existing in regard to the clerks in the Government offices could be adopted. The business of registering and copying papers was not performed by the superior class of clerks, because it would be a waste of power for them to do so. In the Treasury there were about twenty supplemental clerks, with salaries ranging from £120 to £500, and it was only in exceptional cases that they rose to the superior class. They knew the footing on which they entered their situations, and he was not aware that any dissatisfaction existed among them. The temporary clerks were appointed to meet an occasional extra pressure of work.

MR. W. WILLIAMS complained of the number of messengers in the Treasury. There were sixty-three clerks and twenty-four messengers. In the Lord Advocate's office there were three messengers.

MR. PEEL said, a great many messengers were required in the Treasury. In the Lord Advocate's office one of the messengers acted as clerk.

Vote agreed to, as were also,

(4.) £25,753, Home Department.

Mr. Courper

(5.) £30,449, Colonial Department.

(6.) £46,715, to complete the sum for the Foreign Department.

MR. LINDSAY said, there were five or six gentlemen in the Foreign Office—the chief clerk and the senior clerks—who were receiving from £1,000 to £1,200 a year each, who were allowed to act as agents for consuls and persons engaged in the diplomatic service abroad, and receive fees for so acting. He considered that such a practice was at variance with the rules laid down for the guidance of the clerks in public offices. This matter had been discussed before the Committee on Consular Services. In the course of the examination he asked Mr. Alston, one of the gentlemen who acted as agent, what he did for those for whom he acted? He replied that he drew the salary and took charge of the letters; and on being further questioned he said, "I believe I stand their friend in all things. I endeavour to be so, and do all I can for them." Now, this might be attended with prejudice to the public service. As "their friend" he would naturally do what he could for them in the way of promotion, in privately advising them of any vacancies, and so forth. And suppose that he (Mr. Lindsay) were to complain of a consul for not having attended to his duty in reference to one of his ships. He brought the matter before the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, who referred the question as likely enough it would be one of detail, to a clerk in the Department. It might so happen that that clerk was the agent of the consul complained of, and of course he would endeavour to put the case in a favourable light for his client before the Secretary for Foreign Affairs. If he did not get a satisfactory explanation he should consider it his duty to move to reduce the Vote by £3,000, which, he believed, was about the sum these clerks received for these services.

MR. MONCKTON MILNES, as Chairman of the Committee that was sitting on the Diplomatic Service, felt himself called upon to make an observation or two on this subject. At first sight it might appear to be inconvenient, and a practice liable to abuse, that the clerks at the Foreign Office should be allowed to act as agents in the way that had been described. Before he took part in the inquiries of the Committee he had formed that opinion; but he came out of the inquiry with a contrary conviction, and with a belief that the custom had sprung up naturally and inevitably out of the relation that subsisted between the Foreign Office and the diplomatic and consular services abroad. These services were, in fact, a portion of the Foreign Office, performing its functions all over the world. The gentlemen employed in these services found it convenient to be brought into connection with the Foreign Office by means of some persons connected with it, without the necessity of having to apply to the Foreign Secretary on matters on which the chief clerks were in possession of all the information; and he must say he was unable to find that any abuse had ever occurred from the fact of these gentlemen acting as agents for them. The relations, also, between the officials of the Foreign Office were of the most confidential kind, and it would be productive of public inconvenience if strangers were permitted to interfere between the Office and its agents. The question which, in his opinion, the House and the public had to consider was whether any Foreign Minister had ever complained of the system as one that interfered with the right discharge of the duties of clerks in the Foreign Office, and whether it in any way detracted from their usefulness as public servants. So long as no complaint could be made on those heads he thought it would not be right for the House to interfere.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, this was a matter upon which evidence had been taken before the Committee on the Diplomatic and Consular Service, and on which they could report if they thought fit. For his own part, he thought there was no public wrong done by the chief clerk and the senior clerks holding these agencies for our Ministers abroad. Those Ministers sometimes would be glad to receive information for which they could not write to the Secretary of State, and they could not with propriety get some agent out of the Office to go to the Foreign Office and obtain it for them, because the nature of the service in the Foreign Office was of the most confidential kind, and it required that there should not be reports spread abroad as to the changes likely to take place, or leave of absence, or anything of that kind. The chief and senior clerks could give the information privately to the diplomatic Minister without employing a great deal of time. There were certain hours, and certain duties that must be performed, whatever the hours might be, and he could not find that those public duties were neglected in consequence of these agencies; while, on the other hand, he believed the public service was benefited by the arrangement.

MR. LINDSAY said, that at the War Office and Admiralty there was no objection to afford information to agents of officers of the army and navy, and he did not see why there should be objections to an agent visiting the Foreign Office.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON could confirm what had been stated by his noble Friend (Lord John Russell). He had certainly in the first instance entertained the doubts which had been expressed by his hon. Friend (Mr. Lindsay) as to the expediency of the arrangement in question; but inquiry had satisfied him that it was a desirable and proper arrangement to be continued. The Foreign Office was totally different from the Admiralty or the War Office, inasmuch as it had to do with very delicate diplomatic transactions; and if our Ministers and Consuls abroad could appoint persons not in the Office as agents, they must have the run of the Office, and they would thus often obtain a knowledge of facts which, put together by persons out of the Office, might be of very serious inconvenience to the public service by enabling persons to further their own interests in a manner which it was not proper to encourage. He had himself been sometimes engaged in difficult and delicate negotiations upon which foreign Ministers took a different view to that which he himself took; and those persons might consider it of great importance to know when a messenger was going to leave, the hour of the day, or the day of the week. The knowledge of that simple fact might be of great importance for thwarting the object in view. His hon. Friend said that the system might lead to favouritism; but from the practice pursued in the Foreign Office he thought that this was not likely. He could assure his hon. Friend that this system of agency could not lead to any indulgence to any particular diplomatic agent abroad.

MR. LINDSAY said, that what he had heard from the two noble Lords had in no way altered his opinion of this arrangement. He made no charge against the honour of these gentlemen, but if they occupied any portion of the time between ten and four o'clock in their correspondence with the Ministers they were occupying upon their private concerns time for which they were paid by the nation. Why should there not be some person in the Foreign Office, not paid by the Crown, who should do all this business?

Mr. DIXON thought that the matter was deserving of consideration, and that the hon. Member had put it before the Committee clearly and without any partiality; but at the same time he should remember that there was a Committee sitting upon the Diplomatic Service, which Committee had investigated this matter, and were about to report to the House. Probably, under those circumstances, the hon. Member would not think it necessary to ask the opinion of the Committee. He must, however, express his regret that the Chairman of that Committee (Mr. M. Milnes) should have thought fit to favour them with the foregoing conclusion of the Committee upon this subject; it would have been far better if he had stated that the Committee were still receiving evidence, and, of course, had not concluded their labours.

Mr. MONCKTON MILNES said, that this was a question which did not necessarily or even naturally come within the purview of the Diplomatic Committee; and, therefore, he could not accept the reproach of the right hon. Gentleman.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL considered he was bound to answer the question put by the hon. Member—namely, whether he thought the public lost the salaries or time of the senior clerks by these agencies. He had to reply that the public service did not suffer thereby, and he should have left an unfavourable impression if, as suggested by the right hon. Gentleman, he had declined to answer the question until the Committee had made their Report.

Vote agreed to: as were also the following:—

(7.) £21,445 Privy Council Office.

(8.) £14,141 to complete the sum for the Board of Trade.

(9.) Marine works and Lighthouse expenditure.

"That a sum, not exceeding £3,710, be granted to Her Majesty, to pay the Salary of the Lord Privy Seal, and the Expenses of his Establishment, to the 31st day of March, 1862."

Mr. HENNESSY moved that the Vote be reduced by £3,710, the salary of the Lord Privy Seal and his Secretary. He expected that some member of the Government would have told the Committee what were the duties of the Lord Privy Seal. He believed he had no duties to perform. The Commissioners of the Civil Service, the Paymaster General, and other officers received no salaries, although they had onerous duties to discharge, while the Lord Privy Seal had nothing to do and received a salary.

Mr. PEEL said, that as the hon. Gentleman gave no reasons for moving the reduction no explanation seemed necessary. It did not follow that the public officers to whom the hon. Gentleman had referred received no salaries from the public, the fact being that they held offices for which they were paid conjointly with others which they discharged gratuitously. The subject was discussed last year, and it was then explained that as a member of the Cabinet the Lord Privy Seal had very useful duties to perform; inasmuch as it had been found very advantageous that there should be one member of the Cabinet who would have time to attend to any miscellaneous business that might arise.

Whereupon Motion made, and Question,

"That a sum, not exceeding £3,710, be granted to Her Majesty, to pay the Salary of the Lord Privy Seal, and the Expenses of his Establishment, to the 31st day of March, 1862."

Put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(10.) £6,106, Civil Service Commission.

Mr. W. WILLIAMS observed, that as the Commissioners were unpaid he could not see the necessity for so many clerks and other officials.

Mr. PEEL said, that the clerks had a great deal to do in examining the returns of the candidates.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, there was no establishment with regard to which it was less necessary to make inquiry as to the expenses it entailed. A great amount of clerical business sprang up upon the vast number of examinations which were held annually, and no department of the Government was able to give a better account of its services.

Vote agreed to.

(11.) £13,551, Paymaster General.

Sir HENRY WILLIAMS asked whether it was intended to make the office of Paymaster General really efficient? As he understood the matter, the Paymaster General did not give his personal arrangements; and the duties of the office were divided in the Paymaster General, who had to sign some vouchers. He thought the head of a Department should be its responsible officer.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was not surprised that after the recommendations of the Select Committee, the hon. Gentleman should bring this subject forward. But with respect to the office of Paymaster General, it was one of the cases in which it would be impossible to obtain recognizances of such an amount as would cover the pecuniary risks involved. That, however, was a separate question, and might very properly be considered by any Member of that House who was desirous of raising the question. The Government believed that the present arrangement, which did not depend on recognizances, but on mutual checks, was perfectly sufficient for the purpose; and since it had been in operation he did not believe there was any reason to suspect that any fraud had taken place, or could take place. With regard to the question put by the hon. Baronet, he had to state in reply that it was not the intention of the Government to make any change by substituting an effective Paymaster for the present nominal head of the office. The Paymaster General was a political officer of importance and an unpaid servant of the Crown, and the practical duties of the office were discharged by an accountant of the highest skill and ability. If the Paymaster General were abolished, the change, so far as salary was concerned, would be nominal, and in making the Deputy Paymaster the head of the office the Government would be obliged to make a difference in the salary of that officer; but he was not aware that any other alteration would thereby be effected.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY thought that there were grave considerations involved in the question, for the Paymaster General was intended to be a control in certain matters on the Treasury.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was not aware that the Committee on Public Monies had ever given the smallest countenance to the doctrine that the Paymaster General should be made a check on the Treasury; but he should protest against such an arrangement as being destructive of the responsibility of the Treasury.

Mr. HENNESSY inquired, why the Paymaster of the Civil Services in Dublin was abolished, while the Paymaster in Hanover was still retained?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the office of Paymaster in Hanover was connected with military duties which had to be discharged on the part of the British Government; but there were great hopes that the office would be abolished very shortly. It was a question whether it might not be convenient to make use of this officer in reference to the Stado Dues, the English portion having to be liquidated in German money, and the Paymaster in Hanover might be kept alive for conducting the operation. With respect to the Paymaster in Dublin, the occurrence of a vacancy in the office offered an opportunity for reviewing the whole establishment, and the result had been an arrangement which would conduce to the effective discharge of the public business in conjunction with a considerable reduction of the public charge.

Mr. BUTT said, there was nothing to which the Irish people were so much opposed as the system of centralization, and it ought to be clearly shown that the arrangement effected would be both economical and efficient for the public service.

Vote agreed to.

(12.) £6,640, Comptroller General of the Exchequer.

Mr. ALDERMAN SALOMONS asked, whether the recent changes would not allow of the whole business of issuing Exchequer bills being performed by the Bank of England?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER agreed that it would be desirable the whole business and manufacture of Exchequer bills should be placed in the hands of the Bank of England. There were, however, various other points connected with the duties of the office of the Exchequer standing for consideration and decision, and the Government had, therefore, thought it convenient to postpone handling with this matter until the Report of the Public Monies Committee could be considered, rather than to deal with it piecemeal.

Vote agreed to.

(13.) £25,333 to Complete the sum for the Office of Works and Public Buildings.

Mr. PEASE asked, what was the difference between the duties of the Assistant Surveyor of Works in, and those of the Assistant Surveyor of, Works out of London?

Mr. COWPER said, it was the duty of the former to examine works in London, and of the latter to examine those beyond that limit—such, for example, as Windsor, Hampton Court, Kew, and Frogmore.

Vote agreed to.

(14.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £18,708, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to pay the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues, to the 31st day of March, 1862."

MR. CAIRD objected to the large amount of fees paid to the solicitor employed in this office—amounting to almost as much as the sum now asked for—and also to the fact, that he was employed in other Government Departments, for which he received extra fees and commissions. Each Department of the Government requiring a surveyor ought to have attached to it a regular surveyor with a fixed salary. It was impossible, in his opinion, that the officer in question could perform such multifarious duties efficiently. Another gentleman was paid for similar duties in another Department a much lower amount. In fact, most competent officers could be obtained, who would do the work for much less payment, and he objected to such a waste of public money. The charge, too, for legal expenses in Scotland was monstrous. It amounted to about 10 per cent of the whole revenue for Scotland. The solicitor for Ireland received but £250 per annum, while the revenue from Ireland was double that of Scotland. In order to test the feeling of the House he would propose that the Vote be reduced £1,000—a reduction which he considered should be made upon the amount paid to the solicitor in Scotland.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY contended that the Committee were not in a position to enter into the question of this Vote. By the 11 & 12 Vict., c. 102, sec. 8, it was provided that the Commissioners of Woods and Forests should lay on the table of the House a full account of their expenditure for the year within three months after the termination of each financial year. This they did, but the statement was kept back until the latest possible moment. Last year it was June 29, and this year it was June 25 before the statement was made. The instant, however, it was placed on the table it was whisked away to the printer, but who whisked it away he did not know. He had endeavoured to get a sight of it, but found this to be the case, and he was unable, therefore, to gain any information about the matter; and further that the probability was the statement would be delivered to hon. Members somewhere ~~in the~~ the middle of the recess. It was perfectly impossible under these circumstances that the House could proceed to discuss a Vote with regard to which they really knew nothing. The gross revenue of the Woods and Forests appeared to be £417,000. The expenditure of the establishment was £142,000, making the net revenue £275,000. The expenditure over which the House had no control was, in round numbers, £100,000, in addition to £16,000 percentage paid to surveyors. He wished to have some explanation on those points from the Secretary of the Treasury, and to know whether those charges were increasing. Now, in respect to the Parks, which were in the department of the Woods and Forests, he observed that for Windsor Park the receipts last year were £6,000. This fact showed the folly of a nation farming. It cost for the oxen upon this park about three times their real value. The expenditure on this Park last year was £18,000. The document showing the receipts and expenditure of the Parks was a very curious one. There was another point connected with this subject to which he wished to call attention. There was a great financial movement going on in reference to this public property, under the authority of the 10 Geo. IV. In the last year it appeared that there was £60,000 of the public property sold, but there was £180,000 of new property purchased. Now he confessed he could not see the advantage of those changes which entailed great losses of the public money, and a considerable expenditure for surveyors and valuers. He wished the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Treasury to give the Committee some explanation upon those points. There would be no occasion to trouble the right hon. Gentleman if the proper papers were before the House. He was compelled, therefore, to ask the Secretary of the Treasury the following questions:—Whether there had been £100,000 expenditure out of the revenue of the Woods and Forests before any balance went into the Exchequer? Whether £16,000 and upwards were paid in the shape of commission? Whether £65,000 had been obtained for the sale of pieces of land here and there? Whether upwards of £100,000 were not invested in other portions of land in the United Kingdom? And where the public advantage was in this system of buying and selling land?

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH objected to the Vote altogether, because the House had no cognizance whatever of the expenditure of this Department, which he believed would prove to be far greater than the hon. Baronet supposed, the practice being to account only for the balance between income and expenditure. The Committee on Public Monies, which sat four years ago, recommended that this department should be brought under Parliamentary control, but nothing had been done to effect this object; and while the Commissioners of Works had to come to the House for its approval of the smallest sums, the Commissioners of Woods and Forests expended much larger sums on precisely similar objects at their discretion, which he held to be highly undesirable. They should have Estimates laid before the House of all the expenses connected with this Department as well as with every other Department.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that the large sum of £173,000 had been expended by the Woods and Forests, and he could not understand why this further sum of £25,700 should be asked for. If the Crown estates were properly managed he felt convinced they would produce an amount equal to the Queen's Civil List. They might spend £38,000 on the management of the Crown property and the residue would be equal to the Civil List. It seemed to him that £38,000 was a large expenditure on a property producing £400,000 a year.

MR. PEELE said, this Department had been carefully inquired into by a Treasury Committee, and they had reported that it was in a most efficient state. As to the large amount of legal expenditure in Scotland, he did not believe that £2,200 was more than was likely to be expended. He would not enter into the constitutional question, as to whether the expenditure for the management of the Crown property ought to be submitted to and voted by the House; but he believed the present arrangement was in accordance with the compact made with the Crown at the commencement of the present reign. It was not surprising that, with so large a property, opportunities should constantly occur for advantageous sales and purchases, but they were never made without the sanction of the Treasury. Ten years ago this property produced £350,000, and it now produced £417,000 a year. The increase of £60,000 or £70,000 in the rental was proof of how well the property was managed. There would be no objection to giving a Return, showing the cost of management during the last five years.

MR. GREGORY wished to know why the expenses of the management of the Crown property in Scotland exceeded the cost in Ireland in the proportion of eight to one?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, the whole sum asked for was £25,707. The share of Scotland was £2,200, and that of Ireland £2,000, being an excess of Scotland over Ireland of £200. It was true that the probable amount of the Irish solicitor's expenditure was £250 as against £2,200 for Scotland; but in Ireland there was a machinery of salaried clerks for carrying on the business, while in Scotland the solicitor's charge included the cost of his clerks, counsels fees, and other expenses. Many questions had arisen in Scotland as to rights of the Crown in the foreshore and salmon fisheries, which, if not insisted upon, would have ended in a great loss of revenue; but they had entailed considerable legal expenses.

MR. FINLAY said, that, in addition to the £2,200, there was a further sum of £6,000 for Scotland. The expenditure was £8,000 to get a revenue of £27,000 a year. He believed that an unnecessarily large amount was spent in litigation in Scotland.

MR. CAIRD said, that the clerks in Dublin were not connected with the legal proceedings, but with the management of the landed property. Ten per cent for legal charges on the whole amount of receipts was surely exceptional.

MR. HENNESSY said, the Secretary of the Treasury had not noticed an inquiry as to the expenditure of £500 to feed game at Windsor. Last year when he called attention to the great distress in Ennis he was told that it was absurd to ask this House to vote money to feed the poor. As they were not to vote money to feed human beings, he should like an explanation of £500 expended to feed game.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was perfectly competent for hon. Members to investigate any of the charges incurred in the management of the Crown lands; but this Vote was for defraying the expenses of the office of Woods and Forests, and it was no more possible effectually to examine into the charges of management when debating the expenses of the office than it would be possible to discuss the Army Estimates in voting the expenses of the War Department. The mode of dealing with the Crown estates had been settled at the beginning of the present century by express contract. At the commencement of the reign a contract was entered into with the Sovereign, and the Sovereign in pursuance of that contract had made over the right to receive the net proceeds after all the charges connected with the management had been defrayed. No estimate could possibly be submitted to the Committee for its previous sanction of those charges without an alteration in the law. At the same time he did not intend to imply that they were removed from the control of the House, but that control could not be exercised by proceedings upon the Estimates. The Act of Parliament passed in 1851 gave the Treasury control over the proceedings of the Woods and Forests, and the House of Commons, therefore, might challenge the conduct of the Treasury in regard to the proceedings of the Woods and Forests, and call on the Treasury to show why those proceedings should not be altered.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, the management of this property did not rest on any compact between the Crown and Parliament, inasmuch as very important alterations had been made in the arrangements by the Act of 1851. The 8th section of that Act directed that the accounts of the Woods and Forests should be laid on the table within three months of the end of the financial year; but they never were presented until the last moment, and then were whipped off to be printed, so that when this discussion came on Members were totally in the dark as to these charges. These establishment charges were put upon the Estimates for the express purpose of giving an opportunity for discussion, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would promise that for the future the accounts should be laid on the table at an earlier period, so that hon. Gentlemen might have an opportunity of inspecting them before this Vote was brought forward. There was a tendency in the Woods and Forests, as in all other departments, to extravagance, and he complained that this was the only opportunity afforded to the House of discussing the question and getting at the real facts.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, the expenses of the War Department were brought forward along with the Army Estimates, and in like manner, when the establishment charges of the Woods and Forests were to be voted, the House ought to have before it the other accounts of the Department.

MR. CAIRD said, that when he brought forward a specific Motion some time ago relating to the management of a Crown estate in Essex, on which, though it was only 1,900 acres in extent, £67,000 was expended, the Secretary to the Treasury asserted that the extent of the estate was 17,500 acres. He was so taken by surprise that he was not prepared at the moment to prove the truth of his own statement; and when he came down afterwards with proofs he was stopped on the point of order. This Vote was the only real opportunity the House had of discussing the management of the Woods and Forests.

MR. HENLEY thought the House was placed in a difficulty by the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He admitted that the House had control over the expenditure, but not in the way of estimate. But they had an estimate of £27,000 now before them. He wanted to know what were the other charges, or why, if one class of expense was met by estimate, the other class could not be the same? He wanted to know farther, whether the solicitor's expenses for Scotland could not be met by salary, as in England, instead of being paid by bills?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was not able to give an opinion upon the question whether it was expedient to defray the law charges in Scotland by salary. With regard to the Woods and Forests, it was enacted that salaries of the Commissioners and other expenses of management should be defrayed from time to time by Parliament. He had referred in his observations to other charges which could not be dealt with by estimate unless an alteration were made in the law. He had never attempted to deny the right of the House to deal with those charges, but he had said that they were to be dealt with otherwise than by estimate. He could not give a specific answer to the question of the hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Willoughby) as to the accounts, although he agreed with him that the accounts ought to be laid before Parliament in the shortest possible time.

MR. GREGORY said, he did not think any satisfactory explanation had been given by the Lord Advocate of the greater proportionate expense charged by the solicitor in Scotland than by the Solicitor in Ireland. It appeared that great complaints were made in Scotland of the amount of litigation which had been going on in connection with the Department.

THE LORD ADVOCATE had no doubt the duty might be paid by salary, but it was not usual. There had been considerable litigation in the Department, but the solicitor acted only on the instructions of the Woods and Forests, and made an annual report to them. The proceedings which had been taken might not be popular, but since these actions had been raised there had been a considerable increase of the Crown revenues in Scotland. It would be very easy to obtain a return of every item of the expenditure, and he had no doubt it would be found to have been perfectly authorized.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he must divide with his hon. Friend, if the Committee went to a division; because he had found, when an account was given of the salary of this officer, an additional charge was always found to have been made for clerks in the Department. He believed that many of these claims on behalf of the Crown were most vexatious.

MR. BLACKBURN thought that some means should be taken to prevent excessive expenses being incurred in litigation of this kind.

MR. HENLEY said, that he was sorry to find that the efforts of the Crown to obtain its rights by legal proceedings appeared to be distasteful to the Scotch Members. He thought at the same time that the work might be done more cheaply.

MR. LESLIE expressed his intention to divide with the Lord Advocate upon this question.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That the item of £2,200, for the Solicitor in Scotland, be reduced by the sum of £1,000."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 78; Noes 122: Majority 44.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH moved the postponement of the Vote.

THE CHAIRMAN said, it was not competent for an hon. Member in Committee of Supply to move the postponement of a Vote.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, in that case he should have no alternative but to oppose the Vote altogether, on the ground that the Committee had no sufficient account of the expenditure.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his remarkable speech, seemed to support both sides, and completely mystified the Committee. It would be a wholesome example to reject the Vote.

Original Question put;

The Committee divided:—Ayes 176; Noes 14: Majority 162.

Vote agreed to.

(15.) £13,753, Public Records.

MR. HENNESSY said, this Vote included an item of £1,500 for forming abstracts of State papers, including editing. He wished to ask whether the post lately filled by the gentleman who was turned away on account of his religion had been filled up; and, if so, whether the testimonials of Mr. Turnbull's successor had been submitted to the criticism of the Protestant Alliance?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that Mr. Turnbull was not turned away; he resigned his appointment, and his resignation was accepted. A trial connected with the case was going on, and the result would probably be known to-morrow; and, therefore, he would not discuss it further.

MR. NEWDEGATE deprecated importing into the discussions in that House matters that were now sub judice. The hon. Member for the King's County put his question intending to raise the issue which he supposed existed between Mr. Turnbull and the Protestant Alliance; and it was only right that he (Mr. Newdegate) should inform the House that Mr. Turnbull had taken proceedings against the Secretary of the Protestant Alliance, and it would not be befitting for the House to go into a question that was before the courts of law. He trusted, therefore, that the hon. Gentleman would delay any further observations he might desire to make until the case had been decided, when, no doubt, there would be Members in that House ready and willing to answer him.

Vote agreed to.

(16.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £184,711, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray Expenses connected with the Administration of the Laws relating to the Poor, to the 31st day of March, 1862."

MR. BUTT objected to the administration of the Poor Laws in Ireland, and moved that the Vote be reduced by the sum of £1,200, the salary of one of the Commissioners in Ireland. All the members of the Irish Poor Law Board were Englishmen, but he submitted that there ought to be at least one able to inform his colleagues as to the feelings and habits of the Irish people. Moreover, one of them ought to be a Roman Catholic; and one of them ought to be what was called a Parliamentary Commissioner, that was to say, a Member of Parliament, so that he might always be ready to answer any questions as to the administration of his department. It was true that the Chief Secretary for Ireland was an ex officio member of the Board; but he did not hold himself responsible for the acts of the Commissioners, but simply exercised a general control over them. The only result was to shelter the Board from the criticisms of the House. He (Mr. Butt) had joined in a vote of censure on the Board last year, but he should certainly have refrained from so doing if he had thought he was including his right hon. Friend in the Vote. He trusted that the Chief Commissioner, whose salary, like that of the President of the English Board, was £2,000, would in future sit in Parliament.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the item of £1,200, for a Commissioner of Poor Laws in Ireland, be omitted from the proposed Vote."

MR. CARDWELL said, the Poor Law Board in Ireland was composed of two Englishmen and one Irishman. He would be glad to see more Irishmen upon the Board; but it must be remembered that the Poor Law was an ancient institution in England, but a recent one in Ireland, and it had been deemed most important to have persons who were practically acquainted with the working of the system. A Committee had recently sat upon the subject of the Poor Law, whose Report had just been delivered; but he believed no suggestion had been made by any Irish Member of the Committee to alter the constitution of the present Board. That Report would also convince the House of the zeal and ability with which the present Commissioners had performed their duties.

LORD NAAS denied that there was any foundation for the allegations made by a certain portion of the Irish press against the constitution of the Board of Commissioners, whose labours had been most arduous and had been crowned with entire success. So far from being unacquainted with the habits and feelings of the people, one of these gentlemen (Mr. Senior) had had probably more experience than any other man in the country. No doubt the Poor Law Commissioners made occasional mistakes, but so did every one else, including even the Judges on the bench. It was not easy to see how the Chief of the Irish Poor Law Board could discharge his official duties and at the same time attend that House as a Member of Parliament. No important step was taken by the Commission without consulting the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and the present system, therefore, insured perfect Ministerial responsibility. The Irish public had no right to be dissatisfied with the Commission; and if fewer Irishmen were connected with the Board than some might desire, it should be remembered that, as the system was a comparatively new one in Ireland, it was necessary to obtain men of experience to work it wherever they could best be found. Moreover, Irishmen were sometimes similarly employed on account of their superior qualifications in other parts of the kingdom; and one of the most intelligent witnesses examined before the Select Committee on the Poor Laws was an Irishman holding the office of Poor Law Inspector in Scotland.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

GENERAL UPTON inquired why the medical officers in Ireland were not placed upon the same footing as in England?

MR. CARDWELL replied that when the arrangement was made by which certain local charges were placed upon the Consolidated Fund, a much larger sum was taken from the local charges of Ireland than from those of England; the whole of the charge for rural police in Ireland being placed on the Consolidated Fund, whereas in England only one-fourth of such charge was transferred.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON moved that the Chairman report Progress, and stated that the Government proposed to fix Supply for to-morrow evening, after the other Notices.

MR. DILLWYN called attention to a deviation that had taken place that evening from the ordinary course of proceeding in regard to the Estimates. It was the usual practice for the Government to submit the Estimates for discussion in the exact order in which they were printed; but that night Vote No. 5, for the Colonial Establishments, had been taken before Vote No. 4, for the Foreign Establishments. That had probably happened through mistake, but it would be highly inconvenient if allowed to be drawn into a precedent.

MR. PEEL explained that the irregularity referred to had arisen purely from mistake.

LORD JOHN MANNERS asked, whether the Government intended to propose that the House should adjourn over Wednesday next, on which the Sovereign's birthday was to be celebrated?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that as Her Majesty would be out of town, and there would be no Drawing Room on Wednesday, there seemed no reason why the House should not meet on that day as usual.

APPROPRIATION OF SEATS (SUDBURY AND ST. ALBANS) BILL.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

MR. COLLINS proposed to omit, in page 2, line 21, of the clause having reference to polling places, the word "Pontefract," for the purpose of inserting "Wakefield." As this was purely a Yorkshire question, to which neither the ingenuity nor the malice of man could give a party character, he hoped hon. Members would give their votes irrespective of party considerations. Not being connected with Pontefract or Wakefield, either in a representative capacity, or by ties of family, property, or marriage, he came into court with clean hands; and he asked the House to give effect to the wishes of the Yorkshire Members, as expressed in the only division which had taken place on this question, in the proportion of five to one. Unless for some good reason shown, Wakefield, the old county town, ought not to be deprived of its ancient privilege. He held in his hand a list of twelve polling places which were nearest to Wakefield, while only seven were nearer to Pontefract; and, of the electors, those who were nearest to Wakefield were 13,325, and those nearest to Pontefract only 4,564, or in the proportion of three to one. He had consulted Bradshaw, and found that the trains from every direction which went to Pontefract, with two exceptions, went to Wakefield also. It was true that by the Government Bill of 1854 Wakefield was incorrectly represented on the map as at the outskirts of the county; but, truly represented, Pontefract was much nearer the outskirts of the southern division than Wakefield. He thought that the House would agree to his Motion, the Government, in the first instance, having given notice of a clause in which Wakefield was substantially adopted.

MR. MONCKTON MILNES said, the gentry and inhabitants generally of the southern division of Yorkshire would be awkwardly situate if the House arbitrarily set aside the arrangement which Her Majesty's Government had sanctioned, after careful consideration; for it was evident that a place which was perfectly central, as long as the division remained intact, must find it itself on the borders as soon as it was divided. He bore no possible ill-will to Wakefield, where his family had resided for years; but he could not shut his eyes to the fact that it was a place which, in electioneering periods, became the resort of tumultuous gatherings. Believing that Pontefract was on every ground more advantageous, he supported the clause as it stood.

MAJOR EDWARDS said: Wakefield being unrepresented, thanks to Her Majesty's Ministers, it behoved all Yorkshire Members to support its interests. It was, perhaps, not generally known that the hon. Member who had spoken so enthusiastically in favour of holding elections for the Southern Division of the Riding in Pontefract, possessed a large estate in its immediate vicinity, and much house property in the town of Ferrybridge, which forms part of that borough. Under these circumstances, and considering how long the hon. Member has been its representative, he would be unworthy the trust reposed in him by the electors, and the property he possessed in the district, had he taken any other course. The House, doubtless, would be of opinion that the influence which the hon. Gentleman had acquired in his borough was sufficient already, without according to him the prestige he would naturally claim by getting £2,000 or £3,000 spent at every general election amongst a certain class of voters, which must be the case were his proposition carried. From time immemorial Wakefield had been the town at which the nomination and election of the candidates for the West Riding had been held, and he saw no reason why its privileges should be transferred to Pontefract. The objection that Wakefield was frequented by multitudinous assemblages at election times was, in reality, not a valid argument, because Pontefract was but a few miles distant, and there were complete facilities for reaching it from all points of the Riding by railway. The hon. Member for Pomfret was wrong in stating on a previous occasion that the borough had more railway accommodation; on that score Wakefield was infinitely preferable, as their lines north, south, east, and west there converge to a common centre. He hoped Wakefield would be selected by the House. It was the old county town, and more convenient to a large majority both of electors and population. The head quarters of the West Riding constabulary—the place where all the public offices were situate, and where every accommodation could be had for the electors. The hon. Member for Pomfret after announcing his conviction to the House that all the principal proprietors and men of position in the southern division preferred Wakefield to Pomfret, must have been somewhat startled to find that twenty out of twenty-six Yorkshire Members went into the lobby against him immediately afterwards.

MR. HADFIELD said, that he and the people of the southern division were very much astonished that Pontefract had been selected by the Home Secretary. Did the right hon. Gentleman know that it was the most inconvenient place in the whole division? A district of 17,000 people would be inconvenienced by its adoption. It was thirty miles from Sheffield; and to get to it a great number of electors would have to travel over three lines of railway. Sheffield was the place. It was a town with 185,000 inhabitants; besides which it was the centre of a district which contained a population of 400,000. The selection or rejection of Pontefract might affect enormous interests of the hon. Member for that borough, but he (Mr. Hadfield) had to defend the interests of a town with a population of 185,000. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would select some more convenient and accessible place than Pontefract, which was the most corrupt place in the whole West Riding.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that notwithstanding the solemn denunciation of the electors of Pontefract by his hon. Friend who had just spoken, the rejection of the word "Pontefract" from the clause under consideration would place the House in a very painful position, for they would then have to decide between the rival claims of Wakefield and Sheffield. The hon. and learned Member who moved the Amendment, proposed that "Wakefield" should be substituted for "Pontefract;" and his hon. Friend who had just spoken would not hear of Wakefield—he must have Sheffield. Some hon. Members proposed Wakefield and others Sheffield; but the best thing to be done was to follow the plan pursued by the lawyer in the fable, and give one shell to Wakefield and another to Sheffield, reserving the oyster for Pontefract. The matter had been fully discussed on a former evening, when a considerable majority appeared to be in favour of Pontefract.

Question put, "That 'Pontefract' stand part of the Bill."

The House divided:—Ayes 94; Noes 107: Majority 13.

Question, "That 'Wakefield' be there inserted."

Put, and agreed to.

Bill to be read 3^o this day.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ACT AMENDMENT (No. 2) BILL.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 (Construction of Section 57 of 5 & 6 Will. IV., c. 76).

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON asked if there was not some mistake in inserting the words "chief magistrate" in the Bill, such term being unusual in municipal Acts?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS had no objection to omit the words, leaving it that "the mayor have precedence."

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT moved the omission of the words, "or other persons," which might be understood as giving the mayor a right to preside at voluntary meetings, or meetings other than those of the magistrates. He was surprised that an Act of Parliament should be necessary to give the mayor proper precedence in any borough, and could not help thinking that the objects of this measure were too petty to be dealt with by Parliament.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that these little things were great to little men. He had received numerous representations upon the subject, and there were persons in many boroughs who took an interest in the question which appeared rather disproportioned to its magnitude. The Bill had been rendered necessary by a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, that the precedence given to mayors by the Municipal Corporations Act meant only social precedence. The object of the clause was to give to the mayor precedence at meetings of magistrates, the words "or other persons" being only intended to include other persons who might be present at such a meeting, and he had no objection to their omission.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. BAINES moved the insertion of words providing that when a meeting of county justices upon county business took place within a borough the mayor should not take precedence at such a meeting.

MR. CLAY resisted the Amendment, as precluding the precedence of mayors in cities and counties. He had a competing Amendment on the paper, which he would move.

MR. HADFIELD objected to vice-chancellors of universities having precedence of mayors.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that the words were found in an old Act of Parliament, and he had retained them.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT reminded the right hon. Gentleman that Oxford University was not placed first in the Bill.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, Mr. Massey, the time is now come when I trust that I may be permitted to state the objections which I entertain to this clause—objections which are felt by the justices of the peace in a great number of boroughs in this country. And first, I would observe that the occasion of difference which has led to the introduction of this Bill unhappily arose in the borough of Birmingham. I do not, however, wish to trouble the Committee with the personal questions which gave rise to the difficulty. Suffice it to say that a person was elected mayor for that borough to whom the justices objected when he proposed to take the chair of right at their meetings, owing to certain circumstances which were connected with that person's character, and which I had hoped would now have been forgotten. The difference originated in these circumstances: the attempt on the part of that mayor to take the chair as a matter of right compelled the justices, from a sense of duty, to resist his claim. Now, although the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department says that this is a little question affecting little men, I must beg the House to consider that for the first time we are asked to enact that whoever may be elected mayor of a borough, whether he be an alderman or a town councillor, is to be entitled to precedence as chief magistrate for that borough. If hon. Gentlemen will take the trouble, as I have done, to look through the Act of 1835, the Municipal Corporations Reform Act, and the debates which preceded the passing of that Act, they will find that in no one part of that Act is the mayor termed chief magistrate.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: These words are omitted. They are struck out of the clause.

MR. NEWDEGATE: But the provision is retained that the mayor shall, of right, take the chair at all meetings of the justices for the borough. Well, practically, that is the point at issue, because the term chief magistrate was merely descriptive and illustrative of the claim which was resisted for the reasons that I have described. According to the Bill in its original form, there were words in the preamble setting forth that doubts existed as to whether the mayor had this right or not. But, Sir, there never existed any reason for doubt at all. When the first attempt was made by the Mayor of Birmingham to take the chair at the meetings of the magistrates as a matter of right, and was resisted, he did not think fit to take the question before a court of law. His successor, however, was induced to do so; and the unanimous decision of the Court of Queen's Bench was that the mayor had no right to take the chair at the meetings of the magistrates. I have referred, in passing, to the Municipal Corporations Reform Act. Well, in every portion of that Act the distinction between the administration of municipal law, which rests with the mayor and town council, and the administration of the criminal law, is carefully preserved. In the 5th Section the mayor is termed the chief officer of the borough. By the 57th Section he is constituted a justice of the peace for the year of his mayoralty, and for the year next succeeding. But by the 99th Section provision is made for the appointment of a stipendiary magistrate, if the council of the borough shall think that appointment requisite. And, by the 103rd Section, the mayor is expressly debarred from presiding at the quarter sessions for the borough, because a barrister of not less than five years' standing is to be appointed Recorder, and that barrister is the real chief magistrate of the borough. He is to have of right the position of Judge at quarter sessions, and his precedence is settled as next to the mayor on all occasions. Now, I beg the Committee to believe that I do not seek to detract in any way from the dignity of the office of mayor. I do not seek, by opposing the retention of this clause, to take anything from the mayor. On the contrary, I wish the dignity of the office to be preserved as fully as possible. But I put this to the House—will it be consistent with the wholesome government of our municipal boroughs, will it be consistent with the dignity and the position of mayor, that mayors, without the slightest knowledge of criminal law, that persons who have never acted as magistrates, that persons without the slightest acquaintance with the laws of evidence, that persons elected to the office of mayor for every reason in the world but their competency as magistrates, should be suddenly invested with the position which their being of right chairmen of the bench of petty sessions must give them? I say that, if ever any device had been thought of calculated to bring the office of mayor into contempt, it would be the forcing of persons who are known to be incompetent into the position of presiding in criminal jurisdiction at petty sessions; and this is a provision which can apply to incompetent mayors only—I mean to mayors only who are incompetent as justices. For it is not denied, and it cannot be denied; it was so stated before the Court of Queen's Bench that, in no case where the mayor was competent, had the justices not willingly elected him their chairman. But they value the power of choice, because in petty sessions each magistrate is individually responsible for the decision of the whole bench; and, therefore, having a great mass of business to transact, perhaps having to act in troublesome times, they do feel that that responsibility would be most unfairly enhanced by their being compelled to accept as their chairman an officer whom they would themselves have chosen, if he were competent, but whose pretensions they have resisted only when they believed him to be a person unfitted to discharge the functions of their chairman. Now I say that the House should do one of two things: it should either insist upon such qualifications for mayors as shall render them surely competent by previous acquirement and experience to the discharge of these functions, appoint a prefect at once, or else the House ought not to fetter the discretion of the justices in the choice of their chairman, when each justice is personally responsible in petty sessions, by forcing upon them a chairman whom you take no security shall be either mentally, or by acquirement, or by character, competent for the situation. I only ask the House not to sweep away at one stroke all the carefully considered provisions which were introduced into the Municipal Corporations Reform Act in this respect; and I beg the Committee to allow me to show them that that Act was passed on the faith of those provisions being strictly observed. In introducing the Bill the noble Lord the Member for the City of London stated that nothing would be done by that Bill which would in any way establish or promote the establishment of a system of elective magistrates. The noble Lord said—

“With respect to the 129 boroughs, the town councils are to have the power of recommending to the Crown certain persons whom they think proper to receive the commission of the peace within the borough; but they are not to have the power of electing magistrates in such sense as that the assent of the Crown shall not be necessary to perfect the election.”

Now, if you pass this Bill, leaving the other provisions of the Corporation Reform Act untouched, one of which is that the mayor shall be elective, and shall be a justice, by virtue of his election, though only for two years, you virtually make him superior to the other justices, all of whom are appointed by the Crown for life, or during good behaviour, which is the same as for life. You not only appoint an elective justice, but you make that elective justice necessarily chairman at every meeting of the justices, than which I cannot imagine any more direct contravention of the understanding upon which the Municipal Corporations Reform Act was introduced and passed. But, farther, the noble Lord said—

“I am of opinion that the town councils will take care not to recommend to the Crown any persons but such as the advisers of the Crown can with safety appoint to the magistracy.”

But the mayor is appointed under the Act of Parliament as magistrate, and although he is placed in the commission of the peace, he is placed there by Act of Parliament, not by the independent discretion of the Lord Chancellor as the representative of the Crown; and this is the magistrate to whom the House is asked to give this additional power. The noble Lord continued, speaking of the smaller boroughs—

“These magistrates will not have the power of sitting in quarter sessions, and, as I have already stated, they will have nothing to do with granting alcoholic licences. But there are a considerable number of these boroughs of the largest size, in which it may be proper to have a court of quarter sessions, in which, indeed, there is a court of that kind already established, and in which there is a Recorder perfectly fit for his situation."

Remember the summary jurisdiction which you have given by recent Acts to the justices in petty sessions; and here you are about to control the justices who are appointed for life by the Lord Chancellor by appointing them a chairman, not of their own free choice, but against their choice. The mayor is an elective magistrate, the only elective magistrate, and elected for only two years; and in presiding at petty sessions he must virtually act as Judge. The noble Lord said—

"It seems to me better that the power should be in the Crown, it being understood that the person (the Recorder) to be appointed shall be a barrister of five years' standing at least, than that there should be anything resembling the popular election of a Judge. The Recorder will be appointed during good behaviour, and will not be removable at the pleasure of the Crown; and it may, therefore, be expected that he will exercise his functions independently and fairly."

Now, what are the securities that the Recorder shall "exercise his functions independently and fairly?" First, that he is competent to those functions, for he must be a barrister of not less than five years' standing; secondly, that he is approved by the Lord Chancellor; and next, that he is appointed for life. Now, if you put the mayor in this position, and it will apply only to the mayor whom the justices do not consider competent, and who is not a justice for life, but for two years; whenever he acts as Judge, or sits in that position, he does so in contravention of every condition which the noble Lord deemed to be essential in the appointment of a Recorder. I think I cannot better express this than in the language of the Lord Chief Justice—"Move, move." Some hon. Members who exhibit impatience may have come down to vote on the Bill in obedience to a certain pressure. I trust, however, that the House contains many other Members who, when such a change of the law is proposed, will not be inclined to disregard the unanimous judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench. The Solicitor General having observed, "I apprehend, if our construction of the statute is right, there is a duty cast upon the parties to perform:"

"The Lord Chief Justice said, as I understand it, it is something more than mere precedence. This is a right claimed to preside as chairman.

"The Solicitor General: Yes; to preside.

"Mr. Justice Wightman: It may be requisite for the due performance of the magisterial business that the chairman should be a more experienced magistrate than the rest.

"Mr. Justice Hill: The ordinary justices of a county take precedence according to the date of their appointment; yet they exercise the right of choosing their own chairman.

"The Solicitor General: It is a question we are anxious to have an opportunity of arguing, and having it decided.

"Mr. Justice Hill: It is manifestly inconvenient to allow a man who is not a magistrate, who becomes mayor for a year, and is a justice of the peace ex officio, to preside over magistrates who have been accustomed for years to deal with most difficult cases.

"The Solicitor General: It is found from inquiry that in nine-tenths of the boroughs the mayor presides without question or challenge.

"Mr. Justice Wightman: That might be; and here the justices of the borough say they are perfectly willing to allow the mayor to preside as a matter of courtesy.

"The Solicitor General: Yes. It is a question arising on the 87th Section, and whatever decision the Court comes to will settle the matter.

"The Lord Chief Justice: I agree in the propriety of the mayor, who is called the chief magistrate, having precedence everywhere, and to preside; but there may be reasons in individual cases why men generally conversant with magisterial functions should preside. All that the Act says is that the mayor shall have precedence, such as the order of going into a room, &c.; but I do not think it means that he shall take precedence in all magisterial duties. It appears from the Act that the Legislature never intended him to do so, or they would have said that he should have precedence of all persons and justices. . . . The terms of the section are plain; it refers to social and not magisterial precedence."

The result was that the Court refused to hear any further argument on the case. The law, then, is perfectly clear. The intention with which the law was framed is perfectly clear. And all that can be effected by this clause is, that when a mayor is not, in the opinion of the justices, competent to preside, the Legislature will force him upon these magistrates as their chairman, induce him to examine in chief with perhaps no knowledge whatever of the law of evidence, and place him in the position of having to announce decisions without the slightest acquaintance with the first principles of the law, and even when there are reasons connected with his personal position that render it highly improper that he should pronounce the decisions of the Court and give their warnings. And for what reason? Merely because a certain number of the mayors of England have, upon solicitation, consented to support the Mayor of Birmingham, whose claim being illegal, was resisted by the magistrates, and this, after the justice of their resistance has been confirmed by the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench. Sir, I move the rejection of this clause from no wish to diminish or impair the dignity of the mayors, and from no disrespect towards our municipal corporations, but because I am perfectly certain that if the clause be agreed to it will produce instances of incompetency which will tend to degrade the position of the mayors, and to bring our municipal institutions into contempt.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR moved the adjournment of the debate. The Bill was most unpalatable in the country, and contained an important principle which ought to have been discussed on the second reading.

MR. ADDERLEY hoped the Government would agree to the Motion for adjournment.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS did not believe the clause had the great importance attributed to it, because, as they well knew, the mayors were persons of respectability. He had no objection to the adjournment.

House resumed.

CRUELTY TO ANIMALS PREVENTION (No. 2) BILL.—SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

VISCOUNT RAYNHAM moved the second reading of this Bill.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. HENNESSY moved that it be read a second time that day six months.

MR. COLLINS moved, as an Amendment, that it be read a second time this day three months.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS doubted whether there was any necessity for the Bill at all.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."

Question, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question," put, and negatived.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Second Reading put off for three months.

UNIVERSITY ELECTIONS BILL.

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE urged that it was too late, at a quarter past two, to proceed with the debate on this Bill. He should move the adjournment of the debate.

MR. DODSON thought the Bill had already received sufficient consideration.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON was of opinion that as the principle of the Bill was somewhat novel, and one in regard to which much might be said on both sides, the discussion could scarcely be taken at that hour.

MR. COLLINS said, it was utterly impossible for any private Member to bring forward a Bill except at that hour.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that his own seat having been made the subject of contest, he had deemed it more becoming to abstain from taking part in the discussion on this subject. There had been discussion on the details, but not on the principle of the Bill. The Bill introduced great novelties into the law, and it could not be discussed at that hour of the morning.

MR. HUNT submitted that if the Chancellor of the Exchequer had intended to oppose the third reading of the Bill, he should have given notice to that effect.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

The House divided:—Ayes 27; Noes 34: Majority 7.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. AYRTON moved the adjournment of the House.

MR. MOWBRAY said, the Bill had been amply discussed, and he hoped it would be now read a third time and passed.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had no intention to move the rejection of the Bill, but he wished to have an opportunity of stating his objection to some of its provisions.

MR. HUNT opposed the Motion for the Adjournment of the House.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, the Bill had been entirely altered in Committee, and it now embraced a principle unknown to the law and practice of the country. He thought, therefore, that an opportunity should be allowed for its discussion on the third reading.

MR. DODSON said, that those who had introduced the measure had great reason to complain of the course taken by the Government in opposing the further progress of the Bill after it had been so long before the House and so often discussed, without giving any notice of their intention. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, who represented one of the Universities, ought to have had his attention particularly directed to the Bill.

MR. BANKS STANHOPE said, that if the Government really wished to discuss the Bill, and not to burke it, they could have no objection to give a day for the discussion.

MR. BONHAM-CARTER pointed out that the point which the Chancellor of the Exchequer wished to raise was disposed of in the Committee by a large majority.

Motion made, and Question put, "That this House do now adjourn."

The House divided:—Ayes 25; Noes 33: Majority 8.

Original Question again proposed,

MR. FREELAND moved the Adjournment of the Debate.

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR expressed his astonishment at the Government not fixing a day on which the discussion might be taken. By doing so, they would at once remove the whole difficulty.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON proposed that the hon. Gentleman should put the Bill down for Wednesday week ["Oh, oh!"] and if he were unsuccessful in bringing it on then the Government would give him an early day. ["No, no!"]

MR. DODSON refused to accept the noble Lord's offer. He would take any clear day the noble Lord could give him before Wednesday week.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

The House divided:—Ayes 24; Noes 32: Majority 8.

Original Question again proposed.

SIR CHARLES DOUGLAS moved the Adjournment of the House.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON then offered Friday next for the third reading of the Bill.

MR. DODSON said, he would accept that day.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Third Reading deferred till Friday.

House adjourned a quarter after Three o'clock.

POOR ASSESSMENTS (SCOTLAND) BILL. SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE, in moving the second reading of the Bill, said, that its object was to simplify the mode of raising the assessment for the relief of the poor in Scotland. It was proposed to abolish the assessment upon "means and substance" in those parishes where it was now in force, and to substitute an assessment upon rental according to the classifications proposed in the 8 & 9 Vict., the Poor Relief (Scotland) Act—the election of classification to be determined by the parochial boards, subject to the approval of the Board of Supervision. He believed that the assessment on "means and substance" was universally condemned. It was levied under an ancient statute which provided no means of ascertaining the income of the persons to be assessed, and no penalty for false returns. The consequence was that the assessment was raised very much at hap-hazard, and while rich manufacturers could make what terms they chose, the burden of the rate fell on persons of limited incomes. It also gave rise to a great deal of gossip about people's private means, which was at times not only an annoyance, but an injury. Some of the parochial boards were in favour of the existing system; but he denied that they represented the ratepayers. There were between 8,000 and 9,000 signatures to the petitions in favour of the Bill presented to the other House, and only 486 to petitions against it. The mode of assessment proposed in the Bill was already in operation in many parts of Scotland, and wherever it had been tried it had been found to work satisfactorily.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^a.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, the Bill affected the assessment of the poor-rate in every parish in Scotland, and proposed to levy the tax in many cases in a manner different from that in which it had hitherto been levied. He had the greatest possible respect for the abilities of his noble Friend who had introduced the Bill into this House, and for the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), who had introduced it into the other House of Parliament; but he thought legislation on a subject of such magnitude should have been at the instance of the Government, as was invariably the case when Bills were brought in which affected the working of the Poor Law in England or Ireland, and not by a private Member of either House. Again, no important change had hitherto been made in the Poor Law of England and Ireland without its having been preceded by careful inquiry, and previous to the great alteration in the Poor Law of Scotland in 1845 the Government of the day appointed a Commission, and after they had taken evidence in every part of the country the Bill which was afterwards passed was introduced, embodying the recommendations made by those gentlemen in their Report. In the present instance, however, no such inquiry had been instituted or asked for. The present mode of assessment in Scotland had been adopted after mature deliberation. Some sixteen or seventeen parishes had not given up the old system of assessment by "means and substance;" but this Bill would make it compulsory on the majority of a parish to give up that principle, although they might be sincerely attached to it. The Bill did not apply any remedy to the defective constitution of the parochial boards, or contain any provision for the more economical collection of the rates. The Bill stood in this unfortunate position in their Lordship's House, that being a money Bill it was impossible to amend it, and he therefore hoped that, on their Lordships refusing to assent to it in its present crude state, the Government would determine to institute proper inquiry into the whole working of the Poor Law in Scotland, which was indeed absolutely necessary after the statements that had been made regarding it by a high authority, before the Irish Poor Law Commissioners. If there was one subject more than another which required the attention of the Government to be directed to it, it was this one of rates, and at all events they ought to pause before dealing with a portion of it by a small Bill containing only a single clause.

THE EARL OF EGLINTON concurred with the noble Earl opposite that the Bill

did not go far enough; but it was no reason because the Bill did not hit every blot in the system that the blot it did hit should not be removed. The noble Earl disapproved of assessing by "means and substance," and thought that there ought to be some inquiry. Inquiry would, however, in his opinion, only prove that "means and substance" ought to be abolished. The boards were, for the most part, not composed of persons of great intelligence, and favouritism and injustice prevailed to a great extent. He knew of one parish where the inhabitants of villa residences and other persons in easy circumstances were not assessed at all, while the artisans were assessed on their hard earnings. At Ayr there was the greatest injustice done. There could be no doubt that the system of assessment on rental had worked extremely well, and although the Bill proposed to leave the classification optional, and, therefore, in his opinion did not go far enough, for he thought there should be one uniform system established all over Scotland—he should give it his support.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he had no personal connection with any parish in which that most unfortunate, and as he deemed it, most unjust assessment, by "means and substance" prevailed; but he strongly objected to it on principle. It was, in fact, an income tax without any machinery for ascertaining the amount of any one's income. The late Lord Campbell having purchased some property in the south of Scotland, had actually had a demand made upon him for a rate, founded not merely upon his property in the parish, but his property in the funds, and even upon his salary as Lord Chief Justice of England. His learned Friend, however, resisted the charge with his usual perseverance, and in the end was successful. It was true that the Bill was not a Government measure, but it had received the sanction of the Board of Supervision, the present and the late Lord Advocate, and he believed every Scottish Member of the other House. The consequence of the present system was that those who possessed the smallest amount of property had the great majority, while those who paid the largest sums were in a minority in the parish. He could not admit that because the Bill was limited to one point it should not receive the sanction of their Lordships—no doubt the Scotch law required amendment in some other particulars. At all events this was an admitted evil, and he had not heard anyone advocate the system of assessment on means and substance, which was in point of fact an assessment on income not derived from the parish. If his noble Friend (the Earl of Airlie) divided the House, he should give him his vote. There were, he understood, some objections to the Bill on points of detail, but he should certainly, on the second reading, support this measure.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE agreed that this mode of rating on means and substance was to a certain extent very objectionable. But the object of the Bill was to give a minority the power of over-riding the decision of a majority in the parish, and that, he thought, was a strange principle to be adopted by their Lordships. The fact was that the mode of assessment now objected to was dying out, and he thought that the parishes in which this system prevailed might be allowed to give it up at their option, as other parishes had done. By the present law there were three modes of assessment which could be adopted by any parish, subject to the Board of Supervision in Edinburgh; but according to this Bill that Board would have not only the power of disallowing the arrangement made in the locality, but the power of taxing the locality in the mode it thought proper, which he thought was a power that ought not to be given to a Board of that description. He confessed that he should be glad to see the Bill postponed, and made a part of some general measure on this subject.

LORD REDESDALE said, a similar principle to that contained in the "means and substance" mode of assessment prevailed in England with regard to the assessment on stock in trade. True that was not carried out in practice; but the principle subsisted and was suspended only by Bills passed periodically for that purpose. And, in like manner, he would suggest that the system should not be given up absolutely in Scotland.

LORD KINNAIRD denied that the Bill proposed to give to the minority the right of over-riding the majority. On the contrary, it would carry out the wishes of the large majority of those who were the real ratepayers. Year after year there had been repeated attempts to get rid of this mode of assessment, and he trusted, therefore, that their Lordships would agree to the second reading of this Bill.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

EAST INDIA COUNCIL, &c., BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, this Bill was one of great importance, for it proposed to make certain alterations in the constitution of the Council of the Governor General when acting in an executive capacity, and also to remodel and greatly to modify the constitution and organization of the Council when assembled for the purpose of framing laws and regulations. The character of our Indian dependencies, if examined, would convince the House of the importance of this measure. He need not remind their Lordships of the extent of the territory of India, the vast population by which it was inhabited, and the various races, religions, and interests that necessarily existed among them. It was sufficient to advert to these circumstances to show that this measure was both necessary and one of great importance. The Government had given the subject its full and complete consideration before submitting the Bill to Parliament, and in dealing with the question it had endeavoured to limit the changes as much as possible, and make only those that experience showed to be absolutely necessary. With regard to the Executive Council, the principal changes were two in number, and the experience of late years had shown that they were required. Under the existing system, by the Act of 1853, the Home Government had the power of appointing, in addition to the three ordinary Members of the Council of the Governor General, drawn from the Civil Service, a fourth ordinary Member, who stood in place of the Legal Member appointed under the Act of 1833. Circumstances occurred which made it a matter of paramount necessity to appoint a Financial Member of the Council, and the Government availed itself of the power they had of appointing such person instead of a Legal Member. It was probable that the presence of a Financial Member would continue to be necessary; but in the despatches which had been laid on the Table, from Lord Canning, he expressed his opinion that it would be desirable that, besides the Financial Member, they should also have the power of sending out another Member of Council from this country, who should be the Legal Member of the Council. One of the changes, therefore, proposed by the Bill was that the Government took power to appoint another Member of the Council, who should belong to the legal profession, in addition to the Member appointed for his practical knowledge of finance. The Governor General had also expressed a desire to have a legal power of carrying into effect a system of division of labour between the Members of the Council. Looking at the vast interests that were under the administration of the Council, and the great increase of business in the last fifteen or twenty years, it was desirable to give each Member of that body a distinct and defined responsibility with respect to the part of the administration under him. The Bill, therefore, gave the Governor General the power of distributing among the Members of the Council particular departments of administration, and giving to the orders of these Members the same authority in respect to their own departments that now attached to acts done by the whole Council. These were the principal changes proposed with regard to the Council as an executive body; they were intended to meet the increased demands upon it, and he trusted they would enable it more fully to discharge its duties. But the more important part of the Bill was that affecting the future constitution of the Council as a legislative body. Before 1833, certain powers of legislation were possessed by the local Governments of Madras and Bombay, as well as by the general Government at Calcutta; but in 1833, a system of centralization was established, by which the powers of the local Government were transferred to the Governor General and his Council. This system continued till 1853, when it was thought, in consequence of the evidence given before the Committees of both Houses that sat previous to the Act of 1853, showing the necessity of strengthening and increasing the Legislative Council, that there should be Members in it representing different parts of the vast territory of India; and it was also considered advisable to increase its qualifications for the preparation and passing of laws by adding two Legal Members. Accordingly, by the Act of 1853, there were added to the Legislative Council one Member from Madras, one from Bengal, one from Bombay, and one from the North-West Provinces, and also the Chief Justice and one Puisne Judge of Calcutta. These Members were only added to the Council which previously existed. They were not a separate Legislative Council. A reference to the debates in Parliament at the time, and to the Act itself, would show that there was no intention to make this Council a little Parliament, with all the powers of a British Parliament, and assuming the rights that naturally belonged to a Parliament. But when the Act was about to come into operation, Lord Dalhousie prepared a set of Standing Orders, no less than 136 in number, framed on the model of the Standing Orders of this and the other House of Parliament, and laid them before the new Legislative Council, which adopted them. These Orders, unquestionably, as far as forms went, gave very much the appearance of a Parliament to the Council. He was inclined to speak with great respect of the administration of so great a statesman as Lord Dalhousie's, but at the same time it did appear to him that this step of his was very unwise and inconvenient. The Legislative Council of India was not a Parliament; it was, therefore, not desirable to give it a set of forms and orders that encouraged the Members to assume to themselves the rights of a representative body. The despatches which had been laid on the Table would show that the Governor General was of opinion that the present system was most mischievous, and the various discussions which had taken place in this and the other House of Parliament showed that that opinion was shared by those who were best able to form a judgment on the subject. These defects were not from the Act of 1853, but from the rules and standing orders which were subsequently adopted. From that time, on various occasions, the Legislative Council has assumed to itself, to a certain extent, the right of a Parliament. Instead of dealing merely with the measure submitted to them, individual Members of the Council brought forward motions which had no reference to the measures then before them. Lord Canning, also, in his despatches, called attention to another circumstance—that if it was desirable to have a local representation of various parts of India, the present system was inadequate for that purpose. There existed, not unnaturally, a degree of jealousy whenever local interests were not sufficiently considered in the only body capable of passing laws affecting those interests. Upon that point Lord Canning said, in his despatch of the 9th of December, 1859—

“There is no doubt that the introduction of a single Member from each local Government has been, as the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal observes, a great advantage; but, although an improvement has thus been made in the system antecedent to 1854, I do not think that it has been carried far enough. I do not think that, the principle of representing the local Governments in the Council being once admitted, the Governments of Madras and Bombay can be reasonably expected to be satisfied with the share which they at present have in any legislation directly concerning their own presidencies; and I believe that by giving them a much larger share in it, useful local measures may be facilitated and expedited, without leading to any interference with measures of a general character, or with the authority and responsibilities of the Governor General in Council.”

There was another circumstance upon which he must touch in passing. Among the Members of the present Council were two of the Judges of the Supreme Court of Calcutta. Admitting, as he fully did, the valuable services rendered by those gentlemen in the legal and technical business of the Council, especially by Sir Barnes Peacock, it was for obvious reasons desirable that the precedent of this country should be followed, and that Judges sitting on the bench should not be admitted into the Legislative Council. Those defects having been proved to exist Her Majesty's Government had to determine what course they could take to render the Legislative Council capable of discharging more adequately and safely the duties entrusted to it. In approaching the subject they were met by two opposite opinions. On the one hand, there were many persons, and among them those of great authority, who urged that the Legislative Council should be altogether abolished, and that a return should be made to the old system of 1833, placing the power of legislation exclusively in the hands of the Governor General and his ordinary Council. There were, no doubt, arguments which could be used in favour of that course; but it must be borne in mind that they were not now constructing for the first time a Legislative Council for India, and they must, therefore, look at the previous legislation upon this subject. When the Government looked at the existing state of things, and considered the authorities against the abolition of the Legislative Council, they did not feel that it would be desirable or expedient to resort to that extreme measure. Upon that point the present Governor General of India must be regarded as a high authority, especially from his experience of the great events of late years. In his despatches Lord Canning never for a moment contemplated the possibility of abolishing the Legislative Council and reverting to the old system, for after stating general grounds against such a step he stated one reason which appeared to be a sufficient answer to the arguments of those who would throw the burden of legislation upon the Executive Council of the Governor General. That reason was that in the present day the Executive Council could not undertake those duties of legislation in addition to those which now devolved upon them. In his despatch of December 9, Lord Canning said—

“Although I am not able to give any help towards a comparison of the two plans, having had no experience of the earlier one, which from 1854 has ceased to be in operation, I entirely agree in the opinion of the Lieutenant Governor that it would be impossible to revert to it. To do so would be to throw back upon the Governor General in Council duties which are increasing in importance and weight, and which will continue so to increase; and the Governor General in Council must not, in fairness or in sound policy, be required to take upon him any addition to the burden which he already bears.”

Thus, the Governor General was of opinion that if those duties were thrown upon the Executive Council the consequence would be either hasty and ill-considered legislation, or that the ordinary administrative duties of the Council would be neglected. In a country like India neither contingency could be risked. There was another opinion upon the subject which could not be entirely overlooked, and which was advocated by many persons in India and by some in this country, but from which he entirely dissented—he meant the opinion of those who thought there should be in India something resembling a Representative Assembly. Those persons, however, who advocated this system, did not intend to give representation to the Natives of India; but, if not, how could they call that a representative system in which in reality the principle of uniting taxation and representation about which they were so fond of talking was disregarded? But what was asked for was something like a representative system for the European inhabitants of India, for the purpose of governing the Natives of India. Against any such a scheme Her Majesty's Government most strongly protested. Such a system would be most injurious to the interests of the Natives, by exposing them to the caprice and selfishness of a class which was wholly irresponsible to the Native community, and they felt that the result of such a system of Government must be ultimately the destruction of our power in India. Now, if it were true that a feeling prevailed in the minds of the European community in India that in the legislation of that country their interests were not sufficiently considered it was not unnatural that complaints should be made. But if legislation were again to be handed over to the Executive Council there would arise in the minds of the European community an apprehension that they would be liable to hasty and ill-considered legislation, and that was a risk which should induce the Legislature of this country to pause before it abandoned the course upon which it had of late years proceeded. Another suggestion that had been made, and which had the high authority of the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Ellenborough) in its favour, was that the Members of the Council should have only a consultative voice in respect to matters of legislation—that they should be consulted by the Governor General—should give their opinion, but should not vote upon any matter that might be brought before them. It was with great diffidence that he opposed anything which fell from the noble Earl; but it was evident from the despatches of Lord Canning that that noble Lord contemplated nothing of that kind, and that what he thought necessary was that these additional Members of his Council should have full legislative functions, and that to make their functions merely consultative must greatly weaken their responsibility. Her Majesty's Government had, therefore, endeavoured to steer their course midway between these opposing opinions; and while they had thought it right to include in this Bill provisions for strengthening the Council of the Governor General and for securing the presence in it of additional Members for legislative purposes, they had on the other hand sought to remove those defects which experience had shown to exist under the present system. With that view they proposed, with reference to his Council in its legislative capacity, that the Governor General should be empowered to call in the aid of not more than twelve and not less than six Members for the discharge of legislative duties, one-half of that number to consist of persons holding

no civil or military employment under the Government. They left the selection entirely to the Governor General, only providing that the persons nominated shall belong in the proportion he had stated to the non-official classes. Thus the non-official classes of India, Native and European, would have persons drawn from their body acting as members—for it should be observed that, under this provision of the Bill, Natives of the country would be eligible for seats in the new Legislative Council. But having thus strengthened the Council they took measures to prevent its assuming again the functions of a little Parliament, to which he believed their Lordships objected as much as the Government did. The 18th Clause provided that the Council, when assembled for legislative purposes, should take under its consideration only the measures submitted to it in the shape of Bills, with the view of their becoming laws. They would be restricted from making any motions except with reference to the measures so brought before them, and also be precluded from introducing any Bills upon certain important political topics without the previous sanction of the Governor General. It would be left to the Governor General to draw up a code of rules and regulations for the proceedings of the Council, to be submitted to the Secretary of State in this country. These regulations would determine the extent to which publicity should be given to the proceedings of the Council, and settle other details connected with the mode of conducting business. There was one power of an entirely novel and very important character which the Bill conferred on the Governor General. It empowered the Governor General in cases of emergency to pass ordinances upon his own authority, and independently of the Council, which should have the effect and force of law for a period of six months. Such a power was urgently required during the late mutiny, and might advantageously be confided to the Governor General under the limitations contained in this Bill. He had omitted from his description of the measure any allusion to the representation of the various provincial Governments of India. That necessity it was proposed to meet, not by enlarging the number of representative Members in the central Legislative Council, but by establishing in the Presidencies of Madras and Bombay, and also in the North Western Provinces, local Councils formed generally on the same principle as the new Council at Calcutta. In Madras and Bombay these Councils would consist of the Executive Council of the Governor of the Presidency, together with a number of other persons to be appointed by the Governor, in number not to be less than four nor more than eight, one-half not to hold official positions under the Crown. Care was taken to prevent the local Councils from dealing with any measures which might interfere with the general policy of the central Government, without obtaining the previous consent of the Governor General. The plan embodied in the Bill, therefore, while it would continue the existence of legislative Members attached to the Council of the Governor General for purposes of legislation, while it would enlarge the sphere from which those Members might be drawn, would, at the same time, render it certain that the Council so constituted could not be led to entertain the false notions of its own duties which had to some extent crept into the present Legislative Council. The new Council would not be a Parliament, or a great inquest of the nation, to use the language of a judicial Member of the existing Council, but it would be confined to its proper duty of discussing and passing laws. The system of local Legislative Councils, though a novel experiment, would, he believed, meet the wants of the different provinces of a country so vast and varied as India, while it would also relieve the Council of the Governor General of a growing burden of work which was now overwhelming. Having gone through the chief features of the measure, he would merely ask their Lordships to remember that it had been framed in accordance with the views and recommendations of the Governor General, that it had received the approval of the Members of the Council of India, and that her Majesty's Government confidently trusted it would be the means of improving the administration and promoting the welfare and prosperity of our Indian Empire.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^d.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH:—My Lords, the noble Earl in moving the second reading of this Bill has adverted to many matters of detail, which I think can be more conveniently considered in Committee. I shall not trouble your Lordships by following him into any of those subjects. I shall confine myself altogether, in the few words which I shall take the liberty of addressing to the House, to the principle of the Bill, which I apprehend to be a very great alteration in the manner of making laws for India. I entirely concur in the urgent expediency of putting an end to the scandal and mischief which have attended the operation of the present Legislative Council of India. I think the action of Parliament was absolutely required for that purpose. There are some provisions in this Bill which I approve. But when I remember the measure of Lord Grey's Government in 1833—a most able Government—which established in the Governor General in Council the exclusive power of making laws and regulations for all India, and placed under him and his Council the sole administration of affairs throughout our dominions in the East—a measure which was highly extolled at the time; when I remember that the Bill of 1853, also proposed by a very able Government—that of Lord Aberdeen—completely remodelled the measure of Lord Grey's Ministry; and when I remember that the Bill of 1853 itself, carried as it was almost unanimously through both Houses of Parliament, is about to undergo very extensive alterations through the medium of the measure now under discussion, I may, I hope, be forgiven if I do not unhesitatingly adopt all the provisions of this Bill, or view them as the expression of absolute wisdom and the production of perfect foresight. The provisions of the Act of 1853 met a difficulty generally acknowledged in the administration of India by the Governor General and Council in their legislative capacity. The Governor General at that time had to make laws for Madras, Bombay, and the whole of India; but he had a Council solely connected with Bengal; and, although he might communicate with Madras, Bombay, and other territories, he had not the advantage of personal intercourse with any one connected with those different Presidencies. It was, therefore, thought expedient to give him the advantage of that personal communication, and four gentlemen were to be selected as the representatives of the Provinces for the purpose of giving him that assistance. I entirely approved of that arrangement. If Parliament had stopped there, and had not done that which Parliament is, on many occasions, too apt to do, gone beyond the necessity of the case, I really believe that at this moment there would have been no complaint with respect to the action of the Governor General in Council in the exercise of his legislative power. Unfortunately, an undoubted error was committed by Parliament in framing that Bill. Where it was most expected that we should find strength we have unfortunately discovered the source of weakness; that is in the large introduction of what is called the judicial element into the composition of that Council. Now it is, I believe, the unanimous opinion of both Houses of Parliament that in that respect at least a decided alteration is absolutely required. But two other and perhaps even greater grievances have arisen out of the operation of that Act, for which Parliament is only so far responsible that it did not prevent their occurrence. Actively Parliament was not instrumental in the creation of these grievances. The first is that which has been touched upon by the noble Earl, and has arisen from the error committed by the Governor General in Council, in converting into the appearance of a Parliament that which was intended by both Houses of Parliament to be no more than an extended Cabinet; and, further, in establishing for the conduct of that extended Cabinet rules which have induced its Members to suppose that they were to act in a manner quite inconsistent with the intention of the Legislature here, and quite inconsistent with the conduct of the Government of India, in matters affecting the interests of the people. There was another and, I think, even a more serious error than this. The Council, even with the addition of the judicial gentleman, was admirably adapted to consider, in confidential intercourse as a Cabinet, any measures which might come before it; but composed as it was it was eminently disqualified for exhibiting in public all its failures to the eyes of any passers-by who might choose to go in and hear its unfortunate discussions, and in many instances, I fear, to gratify their desire to see humiliated the dignity of the Government of India. For these two errors—the greatest errors which were committed, and those which now bring the subject again before the House—the Governor General of that day in council is responsible. I entirely agree with what the noble Earl has said with respect to the character of Lord Dalhousie. He was a really great Governor General, and I have always so esteemed him. As a civil Governor I know no one whom I should place in competition with him. He committed some political errors, but I think so highly of the ability of Lord Dalhousie—I think so highly of his resolution, and of the influence and authority which he had acquired throughout India, that I believe that as long as he remained in that country the effect of his errors could never have been perceived, that the mutiny would never have occurred; nor do I believe that if he had sat at the head of the Council, the members of that Council would ever have conducted themselves in the manner in which they have conducted themselves, by which they have incurred the disapprobation of all persons in this country. That is the opinion which I have always entertained of Lord Dalhousie, and I rejoice to have this opportunity of stating it. But, my Lords, what is that which is proposed in lieu of this condemned Council? I know not what is intended to be the composition of the Council in India under this Bill; Parliament cannot know. Parliament gives to the Governor General the power of having from six to twelve additional members of his Council; but between those numbers lies the whole secret of having a majority or a minority in his Council. As long as the Governor General confines himself to the circle of his Executive Council he has a fair right to expect a general and honourable support. I received such a support, although under most unfortunate circumstances, inasmuch as endeavours were made by persons in authority here to raise an opposition to me in my own Council. The Members of that Council, however, behaved honourably by me, and on all occasions gave me their fair support. As far as his own council goes, the Governor General may almost universally expect that every measure of his which fairly deserves approbation and support will receive them, and that they will not be reluctantly given. But beyond the limits of that Council all is uncertain, uncertain even in persons who occupy some of the highest positions under the Government. That arises from this circumstance: there are among the English in India two parties. One of these parties desires to govern India for the English, and to treat it as if it was a property. There is another party which adheres to the Queen's Proclamation—which desires to govern India in the spirit of that Proclamation, and to do equal justice to the Hindoos and Mussulmans as well as to the English, and that, above all things, to respect the religion of the people. That is by far the smallest party; and its head is necessarily the Governor General. The intensity of party feeling on both sides is such, especially upon the subject of religion, that it overrules all the motives which generally control the conduct of men. That subject of religion is altogether vital. Our empire depends upon our adhering to the Queen's Proclamation in its full spirit with respect to that question. That is my opinion with respect to the Council which it is proposed to establish. Beyond the number of six the Governor General cannot go with safety. Does he obtain a better Council by getting even those six Members? The four gentlemen who represent the four Provinces are certainly among the first men in the country, and the best qualified to advise the Governor General. Who can he obtain in Calcutta—for to Calcutta he is altogether confined? There may be some distinguished persons among the gentlemen holding office under the Government, but he does not want them in the Council. If he wants to consult them he can send for them, and consult them out of the Council just as well as in it. As regards the other gentlemen, among whom, though undoubtedly a Native is eligible, there will be but little room for him—among the few who remain there is not one gentleman who of necessity knows anything of the people of India beyond the Mahratta Ditch, or who has the smallest reputation or influence in India beyond that narrow limit. And that is what you propose to the Governor General as a better Council than the representative Council which he now enjoys. I greatly prefer the Council as it now stands, without the Judges, to that which it is proposed to establish by this measure. But observe how the matter stands under this Bill. If the Governor General commits, as he may, the error of having an enlarged Council, in which he will be in a minority—which is a very great inconvenience, as noble Lords know, in the conduct of public business—if he finds himself in a minority there is no redress. These gentlemen are there for two years. During two years there is no relief for him; he is obliged to go on with them, and has not the power, which ought to reside in every Government, of dissolving an assembly which is acting against the interests of the people. For two years that enlarged number must remain, although it places him in a minority. But if he does that which would be still more mischievous—if he preserves the rule unfortunately adopted with respect to this Council of admitting every one who is going by to hear their debates in Cabinet—do noble Lords opposite think that that would be an advisable measure? If they do, let Her Majesty's Government try it to-morrow or next Saturday, and see how highly convenient they would find it that a confidential discussion of the measures of the Government should be conducted in public. If the Governor General takes that course he has no redress at all. The evil arises in the Council, and it is only through the Council that he can redress it. Of course, therefore, redress there will be none. What can he do? No doubt, if he can get a majority he may pass an ordinance; but he will not be able to do that, because he will be in a minority. He can, if he pleases, adjourn the Council. He may do more—he may direct the Council to meet in another place. That would be a strong measure, and would, in fact, be sending the Council into exile, because the members cannot leave Calcutta; the official men cannot leave their offices, and the non-official men cannot leave their business, or their business would soon leave them. Therefore, to do what the Bill says he may do, remove the Council to any other part of India, would be, in fact, to dissolve it. Under ordinary circumstances, then, the Governor General has no resource if he commits these two errors, and I think that is a very great fault in the Bill. Allow me to say a few words with respect to the other alteration which is to be made in derogation of what was deemed absolute wisdom in the time of Lord Grey, when he and his Government proposed that all legislative authority should be exercised by the Governor General and his Council, to whom the other Presidencies should be altogether subordinate. As the law now stands, the Governments of Madras, Bombay, the North-West Provinces, and the Punjab, may send a draught of any Bill to the Governor General for his consideration, setting forth, of course, reasons and facts on which he may form his own opinion. If the Governor General is satisfied that the Bill is a reasonable one, he can, with the assistance of his Council, at once make it law. There must, no doubt, be some delay in making these communications from one place to the other. This Bill, however, takes from the Governor General the advantage of personal communication with the gentlemen from Madras and Bombay. Does the Bill in any manner diminish the responsibility of the Governor General in respect to legislation for the subordinate Presidencies? Not in the slightest degree. If he is a conscientious man, as I trust the Governor General will always be, he will have exactly the same trouble in that respect as at present, and, indeed, in some cases rather more. These Presidencies are not made independent. On the contrary, on a great many matters of importance, they cannot bring in a Bill without first applying for permission to do so to the Governor General, and sending him a copy of the Bill, in order that he may form an opinion on it. On other less important subjects they may pass a Bill, and send it to the Governor General for his concurrence or rejection. If the Governor General rejects the measure he is bound to give his reasons; and, if he assents, he is, of course, bound also to give his reasons for that decision to the Home Government, who may call it in question. In both cases he is equally bound to make himself master of the subject, and to satisfy himself as to the nature of the measure. He must thus perform two operations instead of one. He must give his opinion before a Bill is brought in, and afterwards, when it has been passed by the local Legislature. I confess that, had I such a task to discharge, I should think I was abandoning my duty if I did not make myself thoroughly acquainted with the subject, and carefully ascertain whether the Bill ought to be rejected or agreed to; and I cannot see how any conscientious man can relieve himself from that sense of responsibility. Therefore, if Parliament pass the Bill as it now stands, the Governor General will not experience in the slightest degree any real relief from the responsibility which he has now to bear. I own, however, that if this Bill pass I expect there will be a good deal of laxity in the manner of dealing with Bills sent up from Madras and Bombay, which will be by no means conducive to the interests of the country. The result, I fear, will be an enormous amount of local taxation, which will not—as it certainly was not in former times—be prudently imposed; and the amount of local taxation will always be made a reason for not bearing a fair share of the Imperial taxation which the Governor General may desire to impose. Madras and Bombay have always been very impatient of taxation, as I know by experience, and as is witnessed by the last speech of Mr. Laing. Yet look at the difference of taxation there and elsewhere. For instance, on salt, a man in Bengal pays three times as much, and in the Punjab and North-West Provinces twice as much, as a man in Madras or Bombay. I recollect the difficulty I had in raising the salt tax in these two Presidencies, and also in collecting the duty on opium in Bombay. A sort of universal insurrection is made by the governing people in these subordinate Presidencies whenever the slightest increase of taxation is proposed; and the pressure is really most serious. I do not expect better legislation for Madras and Bombay under the system now proposed than they have had hitherto; and, as I have said, I feel satisfied that the Governor General, if he does his duty and appreciates his responsibility, will be subject to the same labour and trouble as at present, and sometimes to more. Having promised at the outset of my remarks to confine myself to the principle of the Bill, I do not think I should be justified in going further. I observe with great regret that in framing this measure Her Majesty's Ministers have done that which has been so often done before—have gone beyond the necessity of the case and provided for matters which do not at this moment press for legislation. Speaking from what little experience I have had myself, but chiefly from the experience of others, I must say that of all things the most imprudent in India is to make great and frequent changes, and to disturb the mind of a people who love quiescence, and desire to adhere to that which is. When I recommend that you should go back practically to the state of things which formerly prevailed in regard to the legislation of India, I do not mean that the Governor General should dispense with assistance and advice. I have already expressed, in your Lordships' House, my opinion that the Governor General would do well to recur to the counsel and advice of what would here be called the Privy Council, and which is there termed a Durbar—an assembly of the most distinguished and influential persons of all classes in the country, such as that in which the old Princes used to sit and frame their laws. That would be a consultative Council, in entire accordance with Native feelings and predilections, and, depend on it, it is only by consulting their feelings, by doing that to which they are accustomed—by respecting their prejudices even—that it is possible to reconcile ourselves to the people of that country. In a Durbar constituted as I have described, which might be held by the Governor General at such places as Allahabad and Lahore, he would sit as the representative of Her Majesty. But at present—nor probably will the case be altered by the Bill—the Governor General is excluded from his Council by the proceedings of its members. I observe that Lord Canning is never present in his Council. Could that have been contemplated by Parliament? Certainly not. The Governor General was made President of the Council, and, of course, it was expected that he would sit there, influence the proceedings, and derive advantage from the debates. I do not, however, question the propriety of Lord Canning's decision. I think that the Governor General could not sit in such a Council as Parliament has given him, or, perhaps, in such a one as is now proposed, without lessening the dignity of his position, and detracting from the influence and character of the British Government. Being firmly satisfied that you must govern India primarily for India, and through the people of India, in conformity with their opinions, feelings, prejudices, and customs, instead of blindly following your own, I object altogether to the general principle of this Bill.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL thought that the noble Earl had greatly exaggerated the changes proposed in the Bill and the effect they were likely to produce. The truth was that hardly any change of an important nature was contemplated, except in regard to the constitution of the Council and the nature of the business which would ordinarily be brought before it. In the relations between the Governor General and his Council very little alteration would be effected by the Bill. There could be no question, he thought, that the Council was originally intended by the East India Company as a check on the Governor General; and that idea was maintained by the Regulating Act of 1773. It was under that system that the celebrated quarrel arose in 1784, between Warren Hastings and Sir Philip Francis. Another Act was then passed reducing the members of the Council from four to three. As the Governor General possessed a vote in the Council, the practical effect of the change in the number of members was to give him the power to overrule the Council, although there was no such power given him by the Act. A great change was made by the Act of 1793. In truth, they were now living under the provisions of that statute, and this Bill made very little change in them. The Act of 1793 gave power to the Governor General to overrule the Council in all matters and questions propounded in Council; and, so far, it seemed as if the 51st Clause applied to executive as well as legislative Acts. But the clause went on to say that the power of overruling the Council should not extend to altering or laying down general rules and regulations, or to the power of taxation. That was a near approach to the separation of executive and legislative functions. The Act of 1833 made no change in this respect. It was true the clause in the Act of 1793 was not renewed, but practically the Governor General was supreme in executive matters, though not in matters of legislation. Such was the state of things down to 1853. His noble Friend who moved the second reading had stated, and he (the Duke of Argyll) could personally vouch for the fact, that it was not the intention of Lord Aberdeen's Government to make any change in the powers of the Council or in the relations between the Council and the Governor General by adding to the number of Councillors. The objects of the Act of 1853 were simply to strengthen the legal element in the Council and to give the power of recommendation to the minor Presidencies. But, undoubtedly, owing to the forms of procedure which the late Lord Dalhousie unfortunately adopted, and to the Legislative Council meeting in a separate place from where the Executive Council met they began to assume greater powers than they had enjoyed before that Act passed. The only changes which this Bill was intended to make were alterations in the constitution of the Council, and in the system under which their proceedings had assumed the forms of a Parliamentary assembly. It made no change in the relations between the Governor General and his Councillors, except in one important respect. A clause was inserted giving power to the Governor General, in case he could not pass any law, to pass an ordinance which would have the effect of a general law for six months—the practical effect of which was that when the Governor General was in a minority in his Council he could overrule the decision of the Council for six months. That provision was entirely new, and it put into the hands of the Governor General a powerful and most important weapon, not only with regard to executive, but legislative acts. His noble Friend (the Earl of Ellenborough) had complained that owing to the extra number of Councillors, if the Governor General proceeded to the maximum which this Bill allowed—namely, twenty, of whom twelve would be nominated by him and the remainder made up of existing members and the Lieutenant Governors—he might be placed in a minority in his Council. The noble Earl had drawn an important distinction between two classes of Englishmen in India—those who represented the common feeling of the Presidential cities, that India ought to be governed mainly for the benefit of Europeans, without due regard to the feelings of the Natives, and those who desired to see India governed in the spirit of the Proclamation which had been recently issued by the Crown. But the noble Earl should remember that although it was perfectly true that the Governor General might possibly be in a minority in the Council, as he always might have been, yet the Bill amply secured a majority of that particular class (prominent among which were the Indian Civil Servants) who were for governing India in accordance with the wishes of the Natives; there would be the officials connected with the Governor General, and the members of the Civil Service; and the independent members, representing the commercial community, would always be in a very small minority. He thought that this was a great security for the good government of India, because, whatever might be said of the shortcomings of the Civil Service, he was sure it would be admitted on all hands that the Civil Servants had uniformly desired to consult the feelings of the Native population. They had shown that desire in the manner in which they had treated the indigo question, and opposed the commercial community in their wish to pass a law rendering perpetual a system which practically established slavery in Bengal. He entirely agreed that it would be a most dangerous thing if the Governor General could by any possibility, be overruled by the class which represented the spirit of the commercial community of Bengal, and that, in fact, such a result would be a return to the worst days of the government of India by a commercial company. There was nothing of the sort, however, in this Bill. With regard to the constitution of the Council the commercial element would always be a small minority, and the Governor General would have complete power to overrule their decisions and to carry against their will a decision of his own, which would for a short period have the effect of law. With regard, then, to the relations between the Governor General and the Council the Bill only made the Governor General still more supreme and absolute than at present. With regard to the relations proposed to be set up between the Governor General and the minor Presidencies it was intended to revert to the system which existed between 1807 and 1833, under which those Presidencies had the power to initiate measures and to pass them into laws if they were not vetoed by the Governor General, and he was sure that no one who had read the Despatch of Lord Canning could fail to see that the Governor General had given important and valid reasons for going back to that principle. He thought it was a strained interpretation to say that if the Governor General were conscientious he would have more trouble than he had now. Such questions as the land tax might be discussed by the local Presidencies in detail, and although the Governor General would be responsible for his assent to the measures proposed, no one could doubt that he would give his assent to local Acts, and reserve his veto for matters which involved any important principle. These were the chief objections to the Bill. They were not of any great force, and they did not touch the principle of the measure, which was to simplify the constitution and to divide the duties and functions of the supreme Government at Calcutta while giving greater power to the local Presidencies. There was one very important clause in the Bill, greatly limiting the power of the Council and increasing the power of the Governor General, to which the noble Earl had omitted to refer, and which he (the Duke of Argyll) ought to notice. By the Act of 1793, under which Mr. Pitt and Mr. Dundas intended that the Governor General should be supreme, there was a special proviso that the power of the Governor General in overruling his Council should not go to the extent of preventing any Councillor from originating and propounding any matter which he pleased in his Council. It was provided that the Governor General might adjourn the discussion once or even twice; but beyond twice he could not do it; and he suspected that it was under the operation of that provision, and strictly in accordance with the existing law, that Sir Barnes Peacock had moved resolutions calling in question a merely executive Act with which it was not intended a Councillor should have the power of dealing. To guard against that inconvenience and to limit the power of the Council, and at the same time to increase the power of the Governor General, there was a special clause in this Bill to the effect that no Councillor should propound any question whatever except one touching and concerning some legislative measure before the Council, without the previous sanction of the Governor General. A still further limitation had been introduced, which was borrowed from our own constitution, that no member of the Council should bring in any Bill which touched the revenue and taxation, religion, the military forces, or the relation of the Government with Foreign States, except with the consent of the Governor General. Considering the general provisions of the Bill, he trusted the House would see that the objections raised by the noble Earl opposite were, to a great extent, unfounded, and that the measure would materially improve the system of government in India.

LORD LYVEDEN said, that in spite of what had fallen from the noble Duke he must regard this Bill as one of great importance. It was idle to say that this was merely a recurrence to the Act of 1793, for, looking to the change of circumstances since that time and the manner in which public opinion both in England and India had been awakened to the subject, it would be almost as easy to return to the epoch of 1793 as to the state of the law which prevailed at that date. No doubt, after the declaration of Lord Canning, after the desires expressed in the Indian press, and after what had passed in the House of Commons, it was quite necessary that some steps should be taken by the Government. Though the House of Commons had been actuated by the idea that it was doing something for representative institutions in passing this Bill it would not be difficult to show that it would have no such effect. He regretted very much that the Bill had not been introduced in that House instead of the House of Commons, for, no doubt, such a speech as that of the noble Earl (the Earl of Ellenborough) would have had the effect of creating more discussion in the other House, and the Bill might have been moulded into much better form. He regretted, too, that the report of the Council had not been produced—he never admired the institution of such a Council, but it was scarcely fair to the able men who composed it that they should be treated as a Board of Revenue or some other inferior Board, and not as the advisers of the Secretary of State. It had been often said that it was not the intention of the Act of 1853 to create a local Parliament at Calcutta, and very probably such was not the intention of the Government of the day; but that the Act was so construed by Lord Dalhousie and by the public at large both in India and England there could not be the slightest doubt. The difficulty with which the Government had to deal arose out of the Legislative Council having assumed powers which were not intended to be given to it, having made speeches and gone into discussions which were not convenient. The greatest inconvenience of all, however, was the Chief Justice, and the chief object of this Bill seemed to be to do away with Sir Barnes Peacock. Surely, a simple declaratory Act would have been quite sufficient for that purpose. He could not but regard the alterations proposed by this Bill as prejudicial. By this Bill both representation and publicity would be done away with. There was nothing in the Bill to compel the Governor General to take representatives of the various Presidencies into his Council—he might select all his Council from one Presidency if he chose, and leave the smaller Presidencies totally unrepresented. As to publicity, while it was left in reference to the proceedings of the Councils of Madras and Bombay, it was taken away with regard to the great legislative Council of Calcutta. It was scarcely to be expected that the Indian public would acquiesce in that. You might just as well shut the doors of the House of Commons and tell the people here to be satisfied with having the debates of the Common Council to read. It was idle to attempt to limit the subject to be discussed by the local Councils. While there were men in them of equal rank and ability to those who sat in the Calcutta Council, and felt they were quite as competent to deal with public questions as the gentlemen who sat there, they would break through all rules and would discuss any questions of public interest they chose. He agreed with the noble Earl who had brought in this Bill, that direct representation of the Natives in the Council was impossible, as there were no means by which such representation could be attained; but on the selection of Natives the recommendation of a petition recently presented

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 9 (Contributions to the Common Fund to be calculated according to the annual Value of rateable Property),

Amendment again proposed,

"In page 3, line 12, to leave out after the word 'thereof' to the end of line 14, in order to insert the words 'upon an assessment calculated by adding to the annual value of the lands and hereditaments in each of such parishes, as hereinafter described, a sum equal in pounds sterling to the amount in numbers of the population of such parish, according to the last Census,'—instead thereof.

SIR BROOK BRIDGES expressed the objections he felt to the present clause, and protested against a larger area of rating being adopted than that which now existed. He thought that the parochial system should be encouraged as much as possible. In the rural districts great endeavours had been made to employ the poor, even when their services were not absolutely requisite, in order that they might be dealt with fairly. Facility ought to be given to the poor man to go to any part of the country where his services might be most required—and, indeed, emigration at present proceeded to a considerable extent. He approved of the Amendment proposed by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Sotheron Estcourt); but would reserve to himself the right of opposing the clause in any manner he might think fit. He should be glad if the Home Secretary would postpone the Bill till next Session.

LORD HENLEY said, that he had found that in many unions a great abuse existed in the exemption of what were called close parishes from paying towards the union rating. That abuse was obviated by this clause, and it, therefore, should receive his support. He could not give his assent to the principle of the Amendment—namely, that the parish with the smallest population, though of the same rateable value with another, ought to pay less. That would hold out an inducement to landlords to get rid of the poor out of their parishes in order to escape the charges to the common fund and the general poor rate. One of the greatest wrongs now perpetrated was that landlords availed themselves of the labour of the poor when they were able to work, and turned them out of the parish when their labour was no longer available. This was a wrong so grievous that he would do nothing to encourage it, as the Amendment, by making population an element in the mode of contribution, would be certain to do. He was not in favour of union rating, because he thought there should be some recognition of the merits of parishes which were well managed, but he thought there might be such an extension of the system as was proposed by the present Bill.

MR. ADDERLEY felt compelled to differ from his right hon. Friend near him (Mr. Sotheron Estcourt) on the Amendment he had proposed. He thought his right hon. Friend was right in saying that the Bill would work unfairly; but he anticipated that the check proposed by his right hon. Friend would be as likely to work against his object as for it—for example, when there were two adjoining parishes, one small but composed of rich landlords, the other large but almost solely composed of the poor; in such a case the poor parish would, by the Amendment, have to pay largely; while the rich one, which had a small population, would escape with a very small payment. But though he was opposed to the Amendment of his right hon. Friend he was equally opposed to the 9th Clause. His opinion was that the more they equalized these burdens the better. There was much that was good in the measure, but the first part of the Bill and the second were inconsistent. He suggested to the Home Secretary that he should proceed with the Bill, omitting the present clause.

MR. TOLLEMACHE hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not abandon the 9th Clause. He had, with great reluctance, come to the conclusion to vote against the Amendment, as he thought it would prove injurious rather than otherwise to poor parishes. The more he considered the question, the more he thought that some change of the present system was called for. He strongly deprecated the system of turning the poor out of parishes when their labour was no longer available, and mentioned, as a proof of the power which landlords possessed in this respect, that in his own parish he might, if so inclined, turn every poor person out of it. He would vote for the clause, because he thought it would remedy this evil.

MR. DENT hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not give his assent to the Amendment. The clause as it stood would in his opinion, go far to remedy evils that now existed.

MR. E. BALL accepted the Bill, with the conviction that on the whole it would, be beneficial to the country; and he could not support the Amendment, because he did not believe it would tend to the advantage of poor parishes. Under the present system the strength and vigour of the poor were taken advantage of for the purposes of labour; and then, when old age or infirmity came on, they were left to be supported by those who had not enjoyed the benefit of their labour. He thought the 9th Clause would tend to alleviate this evil, and as he considered it the marrow of the Bill, he would give it his cordial support.

MR. DODSON hoped the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Sotheron Eatcourt) would not press his Amendment to a division. The 9th Clause would, in his opinion, operate most advantageously for the poor. It was proved before the Committee that in York, and other towns, one street was found to be in three, four, or five parishes, and in those cases the poor were turned out of one parish into another without knowing anything about it. The clause would remedy such an evil as that, and, therefore, he gave it his support.

MR. CAYLEY thought that in legislating on this subject they ought to consider present usage, and what were the customary payments. The evil complained of was that which arose from what were called "close parishes." The Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman touched these cases, but dealt tenderly with them. He could not consider this Bill, and especially this clause, as anything but an attempt to get in the thin edge of the wedge of union rating. In the euphonious language of the President of the Poor Law Board, it meant equalization of rates. He was perfectly satisfied that if it were adopted union rating must follow. He had no objection to the former part of the Bill. He had some doubt as to the remedy proposed by his right hon. Friend. He should like before they legislated in the sense of this clause to have returns from every union as it now stood, as it would stand under the alteration proposed by the President of the Poor Law Board, and as it would stand under the Amendment of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Sotheron Eatcourt). He should like to know what Gentlemen meant by a close parish. He knew that under the parochial system the interests of the poor were considered, and the interests of the ratepayers also. If they passed this clause they would give the power into the hands of those who, not having any direct inducement to economize, would pursue a course that must eventually increase the pressure of the rates. He should probably vote in the first instance for the Amendment of his right hon. Friend, but if that were not carried he should vote to leave out Clause 9, which he considered one of the most violent attacks on vested interests that he had ever remembered, and considering that it was a most insidious step taken towards union rating, under which a great check to the increase of the rates would be taken away, he would give it his most determined opposition.

MR. PAGET gave his support to the Bill on the ground that it encouraged the labouring men to live upon the estates upon which they worked.

MR. LYALL thought it would be contrary to the whole course of legislation of that House to give an interest to parishes to discourage the increase of the labouring population, which would be the effect of the Amendment. He thought the clause would operate very fairly in equalising the burdens of parishes, and calling upon those which had hitherto escaped to contribute their share to the support of those in whose services they shared the advantage.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, that by the clause as it stood they would be paving the way for the introduction of union rating, and so soon as they came to that system they would increase the burdens of the Poor Law to the country by 50 per cent. He admitted that some great advantages would be derived from this clause; but on the other hand the disadvantages were so considerable as to justify him in voting for its omission. He should in the first instance support the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman, and if that were rejected he should vote against the clause.

MR. WALTER said, it was always satisfactory to argue with Gentlemen who stated broadly and in an unreserved manner the reasons by which they were guided. The hon. Member for the North Riding (Mr. Cayley) and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Lancashire (Colonel W. Patten) stated that their objection to the clause was that it would introduce union rating. It was for that very reason he supported the clause. Ever since he had been able to pay attention to this question the conviction had been growing stronger and stronger on his mind that union rating was not only the system to which they must arrive, but that it was the only fair and equitable system. Nothing could be more arbitrary than the division of parishes; they were mere ecclesiastical divisions, and no reason could be given a priori why they should be divided in the unequal and arbitrary way in which we now found them. The hon. Member for the North Riding asked what was "a close parish?" He (Mr. Walter) lived in a neighbourhood where there were parishes so "close" that they belonged to two or three persons; and he could point to parishes in which it was not possible for any person to build a cottage—that was to say, parishes in which those who resided in them had the power of preventing the poor from living in those parishes. He could mention a parish in his neighbourhood in which, up to a recent period, the population had not increased one single soul for a century. ["Name, name!"] He could easily name the parish if it was desirable to do so. ["No, no!"] Many Gentlemen could confirm the accuracy of what he had stated. He could confirm from his own knowledge what the hon. Member for South Cheshire (Mr. Tolle-mache) had stated as being the case in his parish—that there were parishes in which landlords had the power of not allowing a single poor person to live in them. Now he asked on what principle of justice they should be exempted from bearing their proper share of the burden of supporting the poor, and so throw the burden on neighbouring parishes? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Lancashire complained that in his part of the country the towns absorbed the labouring population. He should like to know whether there was any deficiency of cottages in the parishes to which the right hon. Gentleman referred? His experience was that wherever cottages were built the population was to be found. They had heard a good deal about the parochial system; but he, for one, was unable to discover what the parochial system consisted of. He had always understood that the new Poor Law system destroyed parochial management. He would give an instance to prove this. He never but once attended a meeting of a Board of Guardians, and he went on that one occasion to look after the case of an old woman seventy years of age, whose allowance had been struck off. He found the meeting attended by guardians from other parishes, and on a division they beat him by a majority of one. He thought it right, however, in these circumstances to avail himself of his privilege as a magistrate, and, getting a brother magistrate to act with him, they exercised the right which the law gave, and made an order that the poor woman should be relieved, to the great surprise and disgust of the guardians assembled. Where was the parochial system there? The guardians of the neighbouring parishes refused the relief to this poor woman; but, if the guardians of neighbouring parishes could control the poor in other parishes than their own, on what principle could they refuse to bear the burden of the poor in those parishes? This state of things had very much influenced him in forming an opinion in favour of union rating. He held that whatever the area of management was that should also be the area of rating. Nothing could be more fair, nothing more logical, than this conclusion; and he did not apprehend that there would be any danger of extending the area of rating beyond what was found necessary for good and economical management.

MR. HENLEY said, the hon. Member for Berkshire supported this Bill because he thought its tendency was towards union rating, and he evidently thought that that was the result to which it would lead. The hon. Member also thought that nothing could be more absurd than the division of parishes; but he (Mr. Henley) would ask, whether anything could be more absurd than the division of unions? There was the greatest possible difference in the size, the population, and the wealth of unions; so that the same objection would apply to them that the hon. Member had raised to parishes. The hon. Member mentioned the case of an old woman of seventy who was denied relief; but that occurred under union management. Fortunately for her, the poor woman found a humane individual in her neighbourhood, who attended to her case; and it would be found that in most cases the poor had the assistance of persons in their own parishes, who went to the union and interposed in their behalf. He believed that if they once extended the area over a large space they would soon have the same state of things that they formerly had in the large parishes. It was likely enough, as the hon. Member for Berkshire observed, that no increase had taken place in the population of some parishes for many years. No doubt that was the case, and he would probably find some which had even less population than they had a century since. That was no argument, however, for or against the claim, for this apparent stagnation was not to be ascribed to pulling down cottages, but was done, in a great degree, to the absorption of small farms into larger ones. There was, of course, a smaller population in the case of large farms than small holdings; because, in addition to the number of labourers employed, there were also the families of the occupiers who lived upon the small holdings. He thought that in the present Bill the House was legislating prematurely in the dark. All the discussion that had taken place on this clause showed that information was wanting as to its precise operation, and in the absence of information it was not very unwise to look to authority. From a comparison of the very conflicting opinions which had been expressed by persons qualified to form an opinion upon the subject, he took the balance of authority to be in favour of the retention of the clause with Amendments. Upon the question immediately before the House he should give his vote for the Amendment.

MR. TOLLEMACHE wished to explain that he had referred to the case of his own parish merely to show the power which landlords possessed of turning the poor out of their parishes—a power which no class of men ought to have.

LORD HARRY VANE said, that as the alteration now proposed was a very mitigated one, and although it would interfere slightly with the incidence of the burden of the poor rates, he would not on that account be deterred from doing what he considered an act of justice, and attempting to remedy an admitted evil. If he were certain that the Bill would be the end of the wedge in favour of union rating, that would be no ground for his declining to support the measure. But he did not think that the Bill went the length of any union rating; while as a tentative measure he considered it deserving of the support of the House.

SIR HARRY VERNEY freely owned that if this 9th Clause were a step towards union rating, that would be no objection to his mind. In close parishes the cottages had decreased, few were built, and the great proportion of the labour came from the open parishes, and he considered, therefore, that there was a necessity for some gradual alteration in the incidence of the rating, and that the close parish should contribute to the support of the poor. But this clause did not go so far as union rating; it introduced no great change, and the change it did introduce would, in his opinion, be very beneficial.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he had been in the habit of attending the meeting of boards of guardians for twenty-six years, and he was bound to say, from all the experience he had gained, that he had not that dread of union rating which was generally entertained on his side of the House. He agreed with the hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter) in thinking that, however excellent parochial rating might be for ecclesiastical purposes, it was not a beneficial system for the relief of the poor. It was their duty to improve as far as they could the position of the labouring classes, and he believed that nothing would tend more to that end than doing away as far as possible with the law of settlement and extending the area of rating. Entertaining these wishes he could not object to the clause. He was ready to admit that it was, to use the phrase of the hon. Member for the North Riding, putting in the thin end of the wedge with regard to union rating. His experience of the working of the Poor Law was that there was no disposition on the part of unions to deal with the common charges in a way different from the parochial charges; and he believed that, if they adopted union rating, the same motives to economy would prevail that existed under parochial rating. He should support the Amendment of his right hon. Friend for the reasons that it would make no material change in the incidents of taxation; that it would very much tend to reconcile the country to the introduction of union rating to this extent, and that it might have some effect in promoting the passage of the Bill elsewhere.

MR. SLANEY, speaking from considerable experience, thought that it would be a great advantage to the poorer and working classes to have a settled residence provided for them, and he, therefore, gave the Bill his hearty support. He believed that if union rating were generally adopted, it would not be for the benefit of the working classes, but thought that the principle of union rating, so far as it was carried in this Bill, would be beneficial to them.

SIR JOHN TROLLOPE was confident that Poor Law charges would be much enhanced by the present Bill. How would this particular clause operate with regard to the poor in future? It would much decrease the interest taken in the poor in the places in which they resided, and they would have the poor more often rendered subject to hardships than now, inasmuch as the Poor Law charge over the whole country would come to be considered as something like a common fund. He objected to this Bill also, because it would tend to break up the parochial system. He should give his support to his right hon. Friend, and if his Amendment was not carried, he should retain to himself the right of opposing the clause.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, his constituents were reconciled to this Bill mainly by the 9th Clause, and he believed, if the Amendment were carried, it would cause very great regret.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT, in reply, repeated his objections to the clause, and replied to the objections urged against his Amendment. He submitted that in coming to a decision in regard to it the Committee had to choose between two points. If they adopted the clause as it stood they would give their votes in favour of union rating, and union rating not confined to the particular clause of this particular Bill; and if on the other hand they voted for the Amendment the results would be small—they would establish a check upon the universal application of the system of union rating, and retain in their hands that which had been hitherto a most wholesome check upon extravagant expenditure by keeping in the knowledge and in the hands of the parishioners of different parishes some hold upon the purse held for the relief of the poor.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS admitted that in its pecuniary result this Amendment was a matter of comparative indifference, but he agreed with those who had said that the right hon. Gentleman's plan did offer a direct premium and inducement to those who held land in small parishes to get rid of their population. There was no evidence given before the Committee respecting the operation of this joint system of assessment, except that of the right hon. Gentleman himself, who afterwards, as a member of the Committee, gave judgment upon his own statements. A great practical injustice had been suffered for the last twelve years, and constant remonstrances had been made as to the mode in which the common fund of the union was charged, and all that the Committee had now to decide was whether this Bill met satisfactorily the long complained of grievance. What it proposed was simply that the poor chargeable upon the unions should be provided for out of the common funds of the union, instead of by the parishes separately. The plan proposed was no new one, and, it was a fact, the same as that brought forward by Mr. Charles Buller twelve years ago. There was already abundant evidence before the Committee to enable them to decide upon the question, and he hoped that there would be no public delay in its settlement.

MR. HENLEY denied that any such propositions as that contained in the Bill had been brought before the House on any occasion.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS begged to refer the right hon. Gentleman to the Reports which had been laid before the House previous to the debates in 1848, and to the discussion itself.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 137; Noes 100: Majority 37.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON proposed the following addition to the clause:—

"Provided also that the contributions of extra-parochial places to the common fund of the unions in which they are comprised, shall, notwithstanding anything herein contained, be calculated as heretofore."

All he asked was that the extra-parochial districts should be treated with justice, and not subjected to extraordinary burdens. He was himself proprietor of an extra-parochial district, and for years it had contained no poor whatever, a state of things which applied to many other extra-parochial districts. Under the system of averages nothing was paid for those places, and all he asked was that they should not be included in the charge now proposed with reference to the common fund.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS could not see on what principle these places which, by Act of Parliament, had ceased to be extra-parochial, should be exempt from this burden, and, therefore, opposed the Amendment.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE explained the nature of the legislation which had taken place four years ago on this subject, and stated that the Act then passed applied only to those extra-parochial places which had no poor. He thought the right hon.

Sir John Trollope

Baronet had a case in favour of the extra-parochial places that had never any poor, and he ought to confine his proposal to those places alone.

LORD LOVALNE could not understand why there should be any ground for exemption in favour of these extra-parochial places.

SIR JOHN TROLLOPE said, the introduction of those extra-parochial places was just one of many hardships that would be imposed by this clause upon property.

MR. PEACOCKE thought it would be a fair and reasonable settlement of the question if those places that had not hitherto been charged for the poor were still to be exempted.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON would agree to alter the terms of his Amendment to the effect that the exemption should apply only to those extra-parochial places which had not hitherto been chargeable for the support of the poor.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM saw a wide distinction between those extra-parochial places that had poor and those that never had them. He thought those places that had never been charged for the poor hitherto should be exempted from the charge under the Bill, and, therefore, he would vote for the Amendment of his right hon. Friend.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS did not look upon the matter as one of very great importance; but they were in the dark as to the numbers and extent of the places which it proposed to exempt. The same claim might, a few years ago, before the late Act was passed, have been put forward by a great number of parishes that could not now be exempted.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that whether the number of places affected was 20 or 100 was immaterial. The question was whether or not it was just that these claims should be considered.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again this day.

ELECTION LAW AMENDMENT BILL, CITY OF GLOUCESTER.

QUESTION.

MR. H. BERKELEY said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it be his intention to move, in Committee on the Election Law Amendment Bill, a Clause for the disfranchisement of Gloucester for five years, and whether that penal sentence is to date from the last election, or to be prospective?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS replied that if the Bill should come on for discussion in the present Session of Parliament, which, from the late period of the Session, he was afraid was somewhat doubtful, it was his intention, in the event of the House agreeing with the clause in the Bill with respect to the mode of dealing with Boroughs as to which corruption should have been reported by a Commission, to move that that proposition should be extended to the Boroughs of Gloucester and Wakefield. Of course, the time which should have elapsed subsequently to the Report of the Commission, and during which the Writs should have been suspended, would be allowed in computing the period of disfranchisement.

MR. H. BERKELEY said, he should withdraw his notice for a new Writ for Gloucester, and would give notice that in the event of the Bill coming before the House he should feel it incumbent on him to move for a new Writ, and in case the Bill should not come on, he should bring the whole case of Gloucester before the House.

MERCANTILE MARINE FUND. QUESTION.

MR. CRAWFORD said, he would beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, In what manner it is intended to deal with the large balance in hand and annual surplus which, as appeared by the Accounts of the Mercantile Marine Fund annually laid before Parliament, now stood to the credit of that fund?

MR. MILNER GIBSON replied that the revenue from the Light Dues in 1860 was £282,300. Taking the average of the last seven years the expenditure for the maintenance of Lights was £207,900, leaving a surplus of £74,400. From that surplus must be deducted the expenditure for life-boats, for rewards for saving life and so forth, amounting to the sum of £6,000, leaving an annual surplus of £68,400. It was proposed to apply this annual surplus to the redemption of the Light Dues in this way. It was proposed to take 15 per cent off coasting voyages, which would cost £12,856 per annum, and 10 per cent additional off both coasting and oversea-voyages, making £54,120, the two sums together making £66,976; in fact, giving a relief to the shipowner of nearly £70,000 a year. Perhaps he might be allowed to show the effect by a few short figures.

After these reductions had had full effect, a shipowner who paid £100 for a single ship in 1854, and who now paid for over sea-voyages £50, and for coasting voyages £65, would pay in future only £40. In this way it was intended to dispose of the surplus of income over expenditure. With regard to the balance in hand, arising from the accumulation of the surplus, it was thought it might be employed, and that it would not be more than sufficient for the erection of new buildings and new Lights, which from time to time were rendered necessary by the requirements of the trade.

INLAND REVENUE BILL.

QUESTION.

MR. HENLEY said, he rose to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he will postpone the Inland Revenue Bill, which stands for Friday at Twelve o'clock, until some day next week. There were important enactments in the Bill, and many hon. Members, as well as himself, wished for time to make themselves fully informed of its contents before it came for discussion. He also thought it would be more agreeable if the Bill was taken at the evening sitting?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, his wish had been to name a day which would give ample time for hon. Members to consider the provisions of the Bill, but he had no objection to fix it for the 19th. He could not name a later period consistently with going forward with Supply. He did not expect that the Bill would take any great length of time, for, although some of its provisions were important, yet in his view they were almost all of them provisions of relaxation and accommodation. If any question should give rise to much controversy he should be inclined to postpone its consideration to a future Session.

ELECTION LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

QUESTION.

MR. HUNT said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department a question of which he had given notice, as Whether it is his intention to proceed with this Bill this Session; and, if so, whether he can state to the House positively on what day there will be an opportunity given for discussing it? His question had already been partly answered; but perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would name a day after which he would not proceed with it.

Mr. Milner Gibson

SIR GEORGE LEWIS replied, that in consequence of the slow progress of Supply and the necessity of giving the Estimates precedence, and seeing that time would be taken in discussion, and that the Bill could not properly be taken in the morning, he was unable at present to name a time after which the Bill would not be taken.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS BILL.

QUESTION.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he intends to proceed with the Municipal Corporations Amendment Bill? On the last occasion it came on at a late hour, and there was a general feeling that that was not the time for discussion; he, therefore, hoped it would not be taken so late again.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, it was true that the House had last night shown an unwillingness to proceed with the Bill; but two hours later the House thought proper to proceed with other business, and they certainly proceeded in a decided and deliberate manner. He was afraid it would not be in his power to bring the Bill on at a morning sitting, and he certainly could not consent to give it precedence over Supply. Therefore, he must ask the House to take it, as a matter of urgency, late at night.

IRREMOVABLE POOR BILL.

QUESTION.

MR. HENLEY said, he wished to ask, Whether the President of the Poor Law Board will name a time after which this Bill shall not come on?

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, all he could say was that it should not be brought on after two o'clock.

MR. HENLEY: Before that time I shall move the adjournment of the House.

THE QUEEN'S BIRTHDAY.—QUESTION.

MR. HENNESSY said, he would beg to inquire, Whether, inasmuch as it has been the invariable practice for thirty-five years for the House of Commons to adjourn over the birthday of the Sovereign, and the Government Offices and the Banks to have a holiday, it was the intention of the Government to persist in their declared intention of not adjourning over to-morrow?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: It is the intention of Her Majesty's Government not to move an adjournment over to-morrow.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS : There are Orders of private Members of considerable importance which the Government are unwilling to postpone.

NAVY (RESERVED LIST CAPTAINS).
RESOLUTION.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, that he was about to ask the House to refer the case of the Captains placed on the Reserved List by Order of Council in 1851 to the Attorney General for his opinion. He felt it necessary to take this step in consequence of the dissatisfaction felt in the Navy with an answer given on a former occasion by the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty. So strong, indeed, was the feeling that a certain class of officers had been treated with injustice that he felt called upon before the House broke up to ask its opinion. He spoke from what he believed to be well-founded information when he said that the late Attorney General had expressed very strong views as regarded the justice of the claims of those gallant captains, and he had no doubt that the opinion of the present Attorney General would be in their favour. Up to 1851 there was promotion by brevet. In that year it was thought advisable by the Board of Admiralty to put an end to that system. It was naturally thought that a great injustice would be done to the officers of the Navy if there were nothing analogous to promotion by brevet; and so strongly was this felt that permission was given to a certain number of captains to have their names placed, not on the Retired List—and this was the point—but on the Reserved List. The stipulation was that they were in every respect to be considered officers on the Active List, with this difference—that they were not to expect active employment except in case of war; but in all other respects—promotion on to the Admiral's List, scale of payment in regard to Greenwich pensions, and so on—they were to be to all intents and purposes on the Active List. Several of these captains afterwards received Greenwich out-pensions, which they could not have done if the view of their position now adopted by the noble Lord were the correct one. After ten years, when they would have been entitled to receive 18s. a day half-pay, they heard all of a sudden from the Board of Admiralty that they were not to receive additional pay because they were not on the "Reserved" but on the "Retired" List. The noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty had admitted in previous debates that the Order in Council was ambiguously worded, and he added that, "whether these officers thought at the time they were to rise pari passu with officers on the Active List was a matter on which he would offer no opinion." But the very question at issue was, "what was the understanding with these officers?" and it would not do to delude them into accepting conditions which were not to be afterwards fulfilled. The noble Lord added, that the Admiralty, "deeming that the Order in Council was rather ambiguously worded, had allowed these officers to count their sea time both as lieutenants and mates." They did not, however, remedy the injustice in a straightforward way, but gave seventy-seven out of ninety-nine a pittance of 1s. 6d. a day; but the remaining seventeen, who were approaching the rank of Admiral, were left without any remuneration at all. He now asked the House to do justice to these men. He should like to ask the noble Lord whether three or four years ago he was not of opinion that these officers had been most unjustly treated? The noble Lord was not only an active and energetic officer, but who had also been very fortunate in the service, was of another opinion then; but a seat on the Treasury Bench appeared to have changed the noble Lord's feelings and opinions. The noble Lord stated that no great services had been performed by these men; but many of them had performed magnificent services. Take, for instance, a brief summary of the services of Captain John Pearse—

"M.—Captain John Pearse.—Lord Hotham's action; wrecked; capture of Nemesis and Sardine; action off Cape St. Vincent; bombardment of Cadiz; Lord Nelson's expedition to Teneriffe; battle of the Nile; capture of Civita Vecchia; bombardment of Alexandria; capture of privateers and gunboats; bombardment and capture of Copenhagen in 1807; numerous captures of privateers and Danish convoy and smuggling vessels; meritorious services in the protection of the revenue. Twice wounded. Active service twenty-three years."

Captain Spencer Smyth's services were also long and distinguished—

"M.—Captain Spencer Smyth.—Sir Robert Calder's action; battle of Trafalgar; destruction of three French frigates, 1806, and of two French frigates and brig in 1812; capture of Le Jason and two French frigates in 1814; operations against Martinique and Guadaloupe; employed in protection of the revenue; battle of Navarino, wounded; inspecting commander of the Coast-guard; supplied plan by which battle of Navarino was fought. Active service twenty-five years."

Captain W. N. Taylor was at the bombardment and surrender of Copenhagen in 1807. Captain Robinson was in Sir Richard Strachan's action. Captain Thompson was at St. Jean d'Acre with Sir Sidney Smith, and with the army on shore, under Sir Ralph Abercrombie, in Egypt. Captain John Hills had been forty years in active service. These officers had been induced by the representations of the Admiralty to accept certain terms offered to them in the belief that they would rise to their flags, and would receive increased pay as if they were on active service. The case of these officers had been laid before an eminent Queen's counsel, and he would, with the permission of the House, read the opinion of Mr. Lush, which was such as to induce him to believe that if the noble Lord would refer the question to the new Attorney General, that hon. and learned Gentleman would be in favour of his view. Mr. Lush's opinion was as follows:—

"I feel some diffidence in offering an opinion upon the construction of the documents in question, as the matter is not one of legal cognizance, the ordinary tribunals of the country having no jurisdiction as between the Admiralty and the officers of the Naval Service. If, however, the Order in Council were embodied in an Act of Parliament, or were the language of a contract between parties, or otherwise were within the province of a Court of law, I should have no hesitation in advising that the claims of the captains on the Reserved List were well founded, and that they would be held entitled to all the advantages belonging to the rank of captain, except the expectation of further employment."

Was it worth while thus to destroy the confidence of the Naval Service in the Admiralty? One by one the Government was taking away from the Navy all the advantages they had formerly enjoyed. This year the increased pay for China and India had been taken away from them. Formerly half the colonial Governorships were given to the Royal Navy, now they had only one or two. He hoped the Admiralty would not add a breach of engagement to the other causes of complaint. He now asked the Government to refer the claims of these captains to the law officers of the Crown, and moved that the case of the captains placed on the Reserved List by Order of Council in 1851 be referred to the Attorney General for his opinion.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT seconded the Motion. He had never held but one opinion, that those officers were entitled to the rank and increase of pay which they claimed, though he had no doubt in his own mind that when the right hon. Baronet the Member for Portsmouth drew up the minute in 1851 it was with the perfect conviction in his mind that it was intended to exclude and did exclude them from these advantages. The right hon. Baronet said so, and no one who knew him would question his veracity. The officers who accepted it were not to receive increase of pay or the rank of Admiral. But still there was an ambiguity in the terms of the minute which had misled these officers, and, therefore, the officers were entitled to the benefit of the doubt. After the statement of his hon. Friend he would not trespass on the time of the House by reciting the gallant actions of these men, neither would he now refer to their advancing years and infirmities; but he would ask the House to recognize, by adopting this Motion, the energy, activity, and fidelity with which they had served their country during the long war. Let it not go abroad that art or science or architecture absorbed all the attention and all the interest of the House, and that they held out a niggard hand to those whose gallantry enabled them now to initiate those ornaments of peace.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he had moved for a Committee in the early period of the Session to investigate the claims of those officers; but that Committee had never yet been able to meet, and as there was no chance of their now concluding their labours this Session, and as many of those officers were between seventy and eighty years of age, and their commissions would so soon drop in in the natural course of events, he thought it very reasonable that the noble Lord should agree to the Motion of his hon. Friend, and refer the question to the Attorney General for his opinion. The Admiralty said it never was their intention that the officers who accepted these terms should rise in the profession. But these gentlemen themselves thought otherwise—they never had a doubt upon the subject—but they learned to their horror and astonishment, when their time for promotion came, that the Admiralty entertained a different opinion. They then referred the case to an eminent counsel, whose opinion had been read by his hon. and learned Friend. He urged the claims of those officers, because it was the spirit of their legislation to give the benefit of a doubt in the claimant's favour. But there was, he thought, more than a doubt in their favour. Let any man read the minute of the Admiralty, and if he did not come to the same conclusion with Mr. Lush he would give up the case. How the Admiralty could suppose that the officers would shut themselves out from every other advantage than that of active employment was to him an extraordinary thing. Here they were about to pass an Act of Parliament to bring masters and mates of the mercantile marine into the Royal Navy, and these men would not with this case before them trust the professions of the Admiralty; no man among them would believe a word that was said without first taking the opinion of counsel. He believed that an extra £2 or £3 a day was all that was required to do justice to these officers. He hoped the House would agree to the Motion of his hon. Friend, and he thought even the Admiralty could not object to refer the case to their own Attorney General.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that the hon. Member had given the best possible reason for not referring this question to the law officer of the Crown, when he read the opinion of the learned gentleman to whom the question had already been referred, and who stated that it was not matter for legal cognizance. He thought, too, that the hon. Member must, on reflection, see that it would be very inadvisable that Her Majesty's Order in Council should be referred for the purpose of having a legal opinion taken on it. The hon. Member was incorrect in his allusion to what had taken place on a former occasion, for he really had not said that the Order in Council of 1851 was ambiguous, but only that in the opinion of these officers it admitted of doubt, and that they claimed the benefit of the doubt. But he never stated in that House that the view which the officers took of their case was correct. The right hon. Baronet the Member for Portsmouth (Sir Francis Baring) had over and over again stated that the intention of the Admiralty of that day was that these Reserved officers should not rise pari passu with the officers on the Active List; and he rested on what that right hon. Gentleman had declared that it was not the intention, and could not possibly be the intention, of the Admiralty to place these Reserved officers on the same footing as officers on the Active List. Any one would see in a minute that it would be fatal to the service to allow officers to accept the Reserved List, and never being called on to go to sea, to have all the benefits of the officers on the Active List. He would not enter into the case further than to say that a very large proportion of the officers of the Reserved List had benefited by the arrangement made by the Admiralty, under which those who had served long and faithfully had got an increase of pay. As the general question of the retirement and promotion of officers in the Navy would come under the consideration of the Select Committee now sitting on the Board of Admiralty, and as the case of the Reserved officers would, no doubt, be also taken into consideration, he trusted that the hon. Member would not press his Motion to a division.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That the case of the Captains placed on the Reserved List by Order of Council in 1851 be referred to Mr. Attorney General for his opinion."

The House divided:—Ayes 33; Noes 60: Majority 27.

NOTICES OF MOTION—RULES OF THE HOUSE.

MR. HENNESSY desired to know whether he might be allowed to propose a Motion, of which he had given Notice, for the adjournment of the House on its rising over to-morrow, when the Queen's birthday was to be kept?

MR. SPEAKER said, the Notice was only given a few minutes before the rising of the House at four o'clock that afternoon; and that was, in point of fact, no notice at all. The rule of the House for the last forty years had been that one day's Notice of a Motion was required; indeed, Mr. Speaker Abbott had declared, that he considered Notice to be an established rule of the House in his day, which it would be his duty to maintain until he should be otherwise directed by the House. He (the Speaker) considered it his duty to maintain a rule supported by uninterrupted usage from that time, and to inform the hon. Member that it would not be in order for him to propose the Motion, of which no sufficient Notice had been given.

COUNTY VOTERS (SCOTLAND) BILL. COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.
House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 23 (Time of holding the Registration Courts), to £1,574, and he wished to know why the country should be taxed with such a charge?

MR. VANCE did not understand why the hon. Member made an annual attack on the Lord Lieutenant's Household. He ventured to say that for one sinecure office of State and dignity in this list there were at least a thousand attached to the Royal Household which never came under the observation of the Committee, and he thought it would be advisable to place those Irish offices on the Consolidated Fund, together with the offices connected with the English Court. The Prince of Wales had recently gone to Ireland, which country was also to be honoured shortly by the presence of Her Majesty, and this was not the time to reduce these offices, which were necessary for receiving the Queen with due state and dignity.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that the Queen of England was also Queen of Ireland, and it would be better for the people of the latter country to be content to be governed by the Queen of Ireland rather than by the sham Royalty of the Lord Lieutenant. There was no such office as "Gentleman at large" in the Queen's Household, and there were many others in the Lord Lieutenant's Household equally unnecessary and inexplicable.

MR. WHITE hoped that an early opportunity would be taken to obtain the opinion of the House on the expediency of abolishing the office of Lord Lieutenant altogether, but as long as it was kept up there was no use quibbling over the expense of his attendants. As the hon. Member for Lambeth had evinced some curiosity to know what the "two Gentlemen at large" had to do, he could inform the hon. Member that he had learned from a friend of one of them that their duty was to water the camellias of the wife of the Lord Lieutenant, and to attend to two or three State balls.

MR. VANCE observed that as there was at present no Lady Lieutenant the watering of the camellias could not be the business of the "Gentlemen at large."

Vote agreed to.

(5.) £10,339, Chief Secretary to Lord Lieutenant.

MR. W. WILLIAMS objected to the allowance of £425 per annum to the Chief Secretary, and of £375 to the Under Secretary, for fuel. He thought it a very objectionable way of adding to the salary of a Minister of State. He did not object to the salaries received by the Secretary and Under Secretary.

MR. CARDWELL explained that the allowance referred to was made not only for fuel but for several items of expense which used to be defrayed by the Chief Secretary and the Under Secretary before their salaries were reduced. The salary of Chief Secretary had been reduced from £7,000 a year to £4,000.

Vote agreed to ; as was also

(6.) £2,508, to complete the sum for Lunatic Asylums (Ireland).

(7.) £21,570, to complete the sum for the Board of Public Works (Ireland).

MR. W. WILLIAMS observed that there was an increase of £1,000 over the Vote of last year.

MR. PEEL explained that certain duties heretofore performed by the Paymaster of Civil Services in Ireland had been transferred to the Board of Public Works, and that occasioned an additional charge.

MR. VANCE said, that the clerks transferred from the Paymaster's Office to the Board of Public Works had suffered some hardship. In the Paymaster's Office they had the opportunity of rising to certain salaries, and of this opportunity they were now deprived by the regulations of the office of Public Works.

Vote agreed to ; as was also

(8.) £33,092, Audit Office.

(9.) £17,029, to complete the sum for the Copyhold, Inclosure, and Tithe Commission.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he thought that the duties of the Tithe Commissioners must have long since ceased, and he was of opinion that the expenses of the Copyhold Commission ought to be paid by those who benefited from their labours.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, a portion of the expenses of the Copyhold Commissioners was defrayed by the parties interested, and the Vote now proposed was for such portion as was not so defrayed.

MR. HENNESSY wished to know why there was an item of £11 6s. for newspapers and railway guides, which did not appear in connection with any other office?

MR. PEEL explained that the charge had reference to advertisements. Papers were certainly not purchased for the clerks to read.

Vote agreed to.

(10.) £12,190, Imprest Expenses under Inclosure and Drainage Acts.

MR. W. WILLIAMS objected to the largeness of the charge.

MR. PEEL said, that the whole of the money would be repaid to the Exchequer.

Vote agreed to, as were also the following :—

(11.) £47,163, General Register Offices in London, Dublin and Edinburgh.

(12.) £10,482, to complete the sum for the National Debt Office.

(13.) £3,120, to complete the sum for Public Works Loan and West India Islands Relief Commissions.

(14.) £6,975, Commissioners in Lunacy.

(15.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £1,223, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Salaries and Expenses of the General Superintendent of County Roads in South Wales, to the 31st day of March, 1862.”

MR. HENNESSY said, in Ireland they paid their own Superintendent, and moved that the charge for the Superintendent be omitted.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £239, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Salary and Expenses of the General Superintendent of County Roads in South Wales, to the 31st day of March, 1862.”

MR. PEEL explained that these roads owed a debt to the Government, and that the Superintendent was appointed by the Government to see that the roads were so managed that the money should be repaid.

MR. H. A. BRUCE and MR. PHILIPPS bore testimony to the excellence of the system that was now practised under the surveyor.

MR. HENNESSY wished to know what was the amount of the debt?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that owing to the “Rebecca riots” which had some years ago taken place in South Wales, in consequence of the system of turnpikes then prevailing there, a re-adjustment of the system had been effected, and arrangements made by which the money advanced for the purpose by the Exchequer Loan Commissioners, which amounted to £250,000, was made re-payable in the shape of a terminable annuity. It was quite obvious, therefore, that the public had an interest in the matter, and it was under those circumstances deemed desirable that a small salary should be paid to a competent Superintendent, whose duty it was to see that the money was duly repaid.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH asked what was the amount of the debt which remained to be paid?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS could not answer the question offhand, but the hon. Gentleman would find all the particulars in the library.

MR. PHILIPPS stated that in fourteen years from the present time the whole of the debt would be paid up.

MR. PEEL said, that a sum of about £11,000 was paid annually.

MR. HENNESSY complained that, for a sum of £11,000 per annum, the country should be called upon to pay £12,000.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn; Vote agreed to.

The following Votes were then agreed to :—

(16.) £2,273, Registrars of Friendly Societies.

(17.) £14,398, to complete the sum for the Charity Commission.

(18.) £5,055, Local Government Act Office.

(19.) £1,192, Agricultural and Emigration Statistics (Ireland).

(20.) £1,118, to complete the sum for the Landed Estates Record Office (Dublin).

(21.) £1,644, Quarantine Expenses.

(22.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £32,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of Her Majesty’s Foreign and other Secret Services, to the 31st day of March, 1862.”

MR. HENNESSY remarked that last year the House voted an equal sum for the same object, and as up to the 31st of December only £23 had been expended by the Government, he wished to know why they now asked for £32,000 more?

MR. PEEL stated that although only £23 had been expended at the end of the year, the balance on hand at the beginning of the present month did not exceed £8,500.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH thought the Vote was excessive, and moved its reduction by £20,000.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON hoped the hon. Member would not press his Amendment. Most of the claims upon the fund arose after the 31st of December. They consisted mainly of pensions for services performed in past times.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH reminded the Committee that in the Civil List there was a further sum of £10,000 for Secret Service, so that the whole amount placed at the disposal of the Government was very large. He would withdraw his previous Amendment, substituting another for the reduction of the Vote by £10,000.

MR. W. WILLIAMS suggested that the pensions paid to spies should be distinguished from the other charges upon the fund.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, it was of course impossible to give an explanation of the manner in which the Secret Service money was applied. He hoped the Committee would not be put to the trouble of a division.

Motion made, and Question,

"That a sum, not exceeding £22,000, be granted to Her Majesty to defray the Charge of Her Majesty's Foreign and other Secret Services, to the 31st day of March, 1862."

Put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(23.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £268,218, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Expense of Stationery, Printing, and Binding, for the several Public Departments, and for Printing, &c. for the two Houses of Parliament, including the Expense of the Stationery Office, to the 31st day of March, 1862."

MR. PEASE expressed an opinion that a searching inquiry ought to be instituted with a view to see whether some reduction might not be effected in this Vote.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS could only say in general terms that the Comptroller of the Stationery Office was well skilled in the business of his department, and was very attentive to all matters which were likely to reduce the expense of providing the public offices with stationery. The great expenses of the Stationery Department arose from the printing for the Houses of Parliament, and that was a matter which depended far more upon the discretion of hon. Members than upon the Comptroller of the Stationery Office. It was occasionally the duty of Members of the Executive Government to remonstrate against very voluminous returns which were moved for to suit the tastes or wishes of individual Members, but which contained very little information of a generally interesting character. Upon that matter the House itself was quite competent to form a judgment, and it was only by an exercise of the discretion of hon. Members that this large item of expense could be kept within moderate limits. During the last two Sessions the practice had been introduced of printing the evidence taken before Committees in double columns and in small type. That change had been made at the suggestion of the Comptroller of the Stationery Office, and it had tended to considerable economy. He might also state that the Executive Government sought, as far as it could, to diminish the bulk of the appendices to the Reports of Commissions, but after those Reports had been presented it often happened that Motions were made in that House for the production of supplementary papers which the Commissioners had omitted from their appendix. There was consequently great difficulty in the Government keeping this item of printing within moderate bounds.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH denied that the enormous amount of this Vote was mainly attributable to the Houses of Parliament. The charge for the War Department alone was £69,000; for the Admiralty, £24,000; Inland Revenue, £40,000; Post Office, £38,000; Patent Office, £24,000; while the increase in the whole amounted to £69,000. They ought to have some explanation of the grounds of that increase.

MR. PEEL observed that if the hon. Gentleman would take the trouble to read the explanatory note of Mr. M'Culloch, Comptroller of the Stationery Department—a very rigid economist—he would see that the increase of charge for the War Department was not so great as might have been expected from the extraordinary development of that branch of the public service.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY thought the Executive Government should themselves decide what ought to be printed and what not, and not throw the reproach or responsibility on private Members.

MR. FREELAND took the liberty of suggesting that if Members who moved for Returns communicated with the department as to the form in which they should be made out, taking extracts instead of documents in extenso, both bulk and expense would be materially diminished.

MR. W. WILLIAMS thought there was a great deal of unnecessary printing for the House. He had, himself, moved lately for two Returns which he had copied in the library, thinking they would not be generally useful, and had paid for the copying of them. He thought there was one item in this Estimate which was very objectionable, and without explanation he should vote against it. He referred to the sum of £1,550 for the Ecclesiastical Department.

MR. M'MAHON suggested that there should be only one uniform edition of the Statutes or, at most two, instead of three, as at present.

MR. BLACK complimented Mr. M'Culloch, the Comptroller of the Stationery Department, as one of the most efficient public servants to be found in any Department. If his advice were always followed this Vote would be considerably reduced. But for his economical exertions, the Vote instead of £416,218 would be £500,000 or more. Upon the recommendation of that gentleman he had placed a notice on the paper for commuting the allowance of penknives and pencils to clerks into a small money payment. He could not exactly state what the saving would be, but he considered it an important measure of administrative reform. He should propose, just to try the question, to reduce the Vote by £218.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH thought there was one Return the Government ought to give—namely, the amount of printing occasioned by particular Members, with their names. The printing for both Houses of Parliament cost only £84,000, while that for the Government offices cost £114,000.

MR. W. WILLIAMS moved that the Vote should be reduced by £1,550 charged for the Ecclesiastical Department.

Whereupon Motion made, and Question,

“That the item of £1,550, for Ecclesiastical Departments, be omitted from the proposed Vote.”

Put, and negatived.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. BLACK moved the reduction of the Vote by £218 for small articles of stationery supplied to the clerks in Government Offices.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY thought that a saving might be effected by diminishing the bulk of the Votes of that House, and not supplying Members with blue books which they never read.

MR. BARROW, said that the expense of printing for that House was unnecessarily increased by putting Bills on the paper on a day on which they could not come on, and thus rendering necessary the printing of Amendments.

MR. PEEL said, that the hon. Member for Edinburgh had made out no case for the reduction which he proposed.

VOL. CLXIV. [THIRD SERIES.]

MR. BLACK had rested himself upon the authority of the Controller of the Stationery Office.

Motion made, and Question,

“That a sum, not exceeding £266,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Expense of Stationery, Printing, and Binding, for the several Public Departments, and for Printing, &c. for the two Houses of Parliament, including the Expense of the Stationery Office, to the 31st day of March, 1862.”

Put, and negatived.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that great injustice was done to Parliament by the way in which the matter was treated that night as well as on other occasions. The amount for Parliamentary printing was not one-fifth of the whole. Hon. Members should be too wise to run at small matters when there were such glaring abuses to be looked after. That valuable public servant, Mr. M'Culloch, said that there was a want of control over this expenditure, and obviously he had no control. The question was who had? The War Department spent £70,000 in printing, the Admiralty £24,000, and the Patent Office nearly the same amount. [SIR GEORGE LEWIS: It is all repaid.] He wished to know who had the check or control over the printing of the various departments? Take for instance the calendering of wills, who authorized the printing of the 250 copies, which cost between £4,000 or £5,000? That was the way those sums rose to the enormous figure of £416,000. Who were responsible for the papers which were said to come there “by command?” He would undertake to say that since he entered the House no waggon would be able to carry away the papers that had been presented on the slave trade.

MR. PEEL said, as regarded the item for the calendering of wills, it was Parliament that was chiefly responsible, because the 20 & 21 Vict. required that a calender of all the grants of probate and administration should be annually printed.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, that he found for the War Office not only £9,000 of increase, but subsequently amongst sums, to make up deficiencies of former Estimates, £10,000 more, so that there was an actual addition of £19,000 for the War Office. He wanted to know whether that increase had arisen from the action of that House and not of the particular Department? He believed that the Stationery Office was admirably managed, but the fact was the House had no control over the Departments which made the expenditure. That rested with the Treasury, which, unfortunately, did not keep strict watch in this matter.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that it was quite impossible that the head of the Stationery Office should control the expenditure of stationery or of the amount of printing, because that was connected with the amount of business. It was very true there had been a great increase in the printing of the War Office; but though there was an actual increase of charge, yet there was a great economy as compared with what would be the increase if writing were substituted for printing. There were a vast number of circulars and Returns which it was far cheaper to print than to copy in writing. He must say that everybody in that House must have discovered that a large amount of Returns were moved for which were really unnecessary. Nothing was more common than this. A Member had got a particular case of some claim on the part of some individual in some branch of the service which, in his opinion, had not been duly attended to, or some hardship which had been inflicted, and in order to bring that case before the House the Member called for Returns of very large range, embracing a large number of matters that had no reference to the particular case. Well, it was said that the Government ought to check that. But it often happened that they did object, and then it was said that the Returns ought to be granted unless there were some good reasons against it; and then up started hon. Members, saying that there must be something behind, some job, or some abuse which the Government wanted to conceal, and the Government were obliged to give the Returns in order to avoid misrepresentation. But if hon. Gentlemen would follow the example of his hon. Friend the Member for Lambeth (Mr. Williams), who had obtained the information which he wanted without putting the public to expense, there would be some diminution of the cost, though but a slight one.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that, with respect to the calendaring of wills, the right hon. Gentleman endeavoured to throw it upon the statute book, but it clearly appeared that it was by Treasury letters that a vast amount of the expense was incurred. Who ordered the back papers of 1856 and 1857, which had added largely to the expense? It was by a Treasury letter. He hoped, then, some explanation would be given whether there was any control over the Departments, or might they spend what they liked?

LORD ALFRED CHURCHILL suggested, that in future Sessions of Parliament there should be a Printing Committee, which should have power to question Members of Parliament as to the reason why the papers they were about to move for were required.

MR. NEWDEGATE thought that there might be very great improvements in the way in which Returns were furnished by the Board of Trade, and that great economy might be effected if they took a leaf from the practice of the Senate of the United States. There they had certain annual Returns affording information to every Member with respect to matters likely to come before the House, and they were presented at the commencement of the Session. If we had our Returns presented at the same period, it would prevent many Motions for Returns by private Members. As to local taxation, which amounted annually to £16,000,000, they would not have the Return for three weeks to come, and there was, in fact, scarcely one of the annual Returns which was presented at the commencement of the Session.

MR. BLACK suggested, that blue books might be printed in smaller type and in double columns, as this would save much expense.

Vote agreed to; as were also the following Votes:—

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(24.) £100,148, Postage (Public Service).

(25.) £32,395, Law Charges.

(26.) £147,000, to complete the sum for Prosecutions at Assizes and Quarter Sessions.

(27.) £224,575, Police, Counties and Boroughs.

(28.) £3,020, Crown Office, Queen's Bench.

(29.) £7,950, to complete the sum for the Admiralty Court, Dublin.

(30.) £6,176, Insolvent Debtors' Court.

(31.) £55,980, to complete the sum for the Court of Probate, &c.

(32.) £140,320, to complete the sum for the County Courts.

(33.) £15,355, to complete the sum for the Police Courts (Metropolis).

(34.) £101,204, to complete the sum for the Metropolitan Police.

Mr. Augustus Smith

- (35.) £3,500, Queen's Prison.
 (36.) £17,850, Revising Barristers (England and Wales).
 (37.) £2,342, to complete the sum for the Lord Advocate and Solicitor General (Scotland).
 (38.) £14,713, to complete the sum for the Court of Session (Scotland).
 (39.) £8,071, to complete the sum for the Court of Justiciary (Scotland).
 (40.) £4,000, Criminal Prosecutions (Scotland).
 (41.) £1,620, Exchequer (Scotland).
 (42.) £25,000, Sheriffs and Procurators Fiscal, &c. (Scotland).
 (43.) £13,935, to complete the sum for the Procurators Fiscal Salaries (Scotland).
 (44.) £11,780, Sheriff Clerks (Scotland).
 (45.) £2,200, Tithes, &c. (Scotland).
 (46.) £14,457, to complete the sum for the General Register House (Edinburgh).
 (47.) £1,025, to complete the sum for the Commissary Clerk (Edinburgh).
 (48.) £1,528, Accountant in Bankruptcy (Scotland).
 (49.) £51,684, to complete the sum for Law Charges (Ireland).
 (50.) £2,863, to complete the sum for the Court of Chancery (Ireland).
 (51.) £18,851, Court of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer (Ireland).
 (52.) £3,932, to complete the sum for the Registrars to Judges, &c. (Ireland).
 (53.) £4,000, Manor Courts (Ireland).
 (54.) £2,319, Registration of Judgments (Ireland).
 (55.) £300, High Court of Delegates.
 (56.) £5,888, to complete the sum for the Court of Bankruptcy and Insolvency (Ireland).
 (57.) £5,380, to complete the sum for the Court of Probate (Ireland).
 (58.) £11,311, Landed Estates Court (Ireland).
 (59.) £1,253, to complete the sum for the Consolidated Office of Writs.
 (60.) £450, Dublin Revising Barristers.
- MR. VANCE asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, whether it was intended to make any change with regard to the remuneration of Revising Barristers?
- MR. CARDWELL thought that a judicial officer should be paid by a fixed salary provided by Act of Parliament rather than by fee. He, therefore, proposed to ask the House for leave to introduce a Bill providing that the revising barristers of Dublin should receive a salary of 200 guineas, which was about equal to the amount they received by fees.

Vote agreed to; as was also the following:—

(61.) £26,051, to complete the sum for Police Justices, Dublin.

(62.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £571,947, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Expense of the Constabulary Force in Ireland, to the 31st day of March, 1862."

MR. CHILDERS moved the omission of the item of £3,400 for postage and stationery. These expenses were provided for in other parts of the Estimate.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That the item of £3,400, for Postage and Stationery, be omitted from the proposed Vote."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 44; Noes 76: Majority 32.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH moved that the Chairman should report Progress, for the purpose of enabling him to remark upon the division that had just taken place. The objection to the item of postage and stationery in the previous Vote was simply this, that it had been already voted at a previous part of the evening, and, therefore, the last was a double Vote of the very identical sums for postage and stationery.

MR. CARDWELL had no doubt that the item was correctly included in the present Estimate. It was exactly the same sum as was voted last year for the same purpose. What was comprised in the item mentioned in the Stationery Office Estimate he did not know, but inquiry should be made before the Report, and if it were found that any portion of the expenditure was voted both on account of the Stationery Office and of the Department the matter should be set right on the Report.

COLONEL SYKES reminded the right hon. Gentleman that the same sum might have been doubly voted last year.

MR. W. WILLIAMS hoped that his hon. Friend would persevere in his Amendment that the Chairman report Progress. It was no use proceeding with the Votes wholesale, as it was utterly impossible for hon. Members to keep pace with the rapid way in which they were being hurried through the House.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

The following Votes were then agreed to:

(63.) £2,717, Four Courts Marshalsea Prison (Dublin).

(64.) £17,695, Inspection, &c., of Prisons.

(65.) £306,879, to complete the sum for Prisons and Convict Establishment.

MR. PEEL said, that since this Estimate was prepared he had read the Report of the Committee of this House on Transportation, and had communicated with the Directors of convict prisons in this country and in Ireland, with the view of seeing whether some reduction might not be made. The Estimate was for 8,100 convicts at present in England, and the average daily number of the last two years had been 7,350. It had always been the practice to allow for a considerable numerical margin. But, as he was informed that the number of persons sentenced to penal servitude was steadily decreasing, it was unnecessary to retain this marginal allowance. He, therefore, proposed to reduce the Estimates for English prisons by the sum of £15,000, and that for prisons in Ireland by £7,000, making in all a reduction of £22,000.

MR. CHILDERS said, the House owed much to the Government, and his hon. Friend who represented them, for the just and equitable manner in which they had come forward to make this deduction. It afforded a striking instance of the beneficial results in an economical point of view which followed from the well-directed labours of a Select Committee.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS acknowledged the meritorious exertions made by the Select Committee; but said the House must not be led away by the idea that a saving had been effected. A diminution in the margin had taken place, but the expenditure which was limited to the actual cost of the prisons would remain exactly the same.

Vote agreed to.

(66.) £191,976, to complete the sum for the Maintenance of Prisoners, &c.

MR. PEEL said, a sum of £14,000 had been hitherto paid for the expense of maintaining convicts in county gaols. Of the 520 cells which they rented, a large proportion could now be dispensed with, and he, therefore, proposed to reduce that item by £2,000.

MR. BUTT said, the cost of prisoners under sentence for felony and misdemeanour in Irish county gaols for the year ending the 31st of March, 1861, was £22,500. In the present year it was only £9,000; and he wished to know to what cause its great decrease was to be attributed?

MR. CARDWELL said, the decrease of crime in Ireland was very satisfactory; but the disparity in the figures was attributable to the fact that the sum taken in the former estimate was meant to cover two years, while the item in the present Vote dealt but with one year.

Vote agreed to.

“That a sum, not exceeding £15,776, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray Expenses connected with the Transportation of Convicts, &c. to the 31st day of March, 1862.”

MR. CHILDERS proposed to reduce the Vote by £6,000. He thought it better to abandon transportation altogether; but the majority of the Committee of the present Session, of which he was a Member, acted on the advice of Mr. Waddington, the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department, who thought it would be safer to continue a very small amount of transportation in respect to the worst men, and that out of the 500 or 600 men every year sentenced to transportation a ship load might be advantageously sent abroad, and could be profitably employed in Western Australia, where they would be gladly received. We had a great convict establishment at Bermuda, where the convicts were employed in the construction of public works to strengthen the fortifications; another at Gibraltar, where the employment was the same; and a third in Western Australia. With the number of convicts discharged every year there would not be enough to keep up these three convict establishments. The Committee, therefore, recommended that for the present the convicts transported should be sent to Western Australia only. He proposed to the Committee to carry out the views of Mr. Waddington and the majority of the Committee; and he, therefore, moved to reduce the Vote by £6,000, so as to provide only for the 250 transports recommended by Mr. Waddington to be sent abroad. The number included in the Estimate was 750.

MR. PEEL said, it was now under the consideration of the Government whether any more convicts would be sent to Bermuda. It was probable that none might be sent there this year; but he believed that if there were any change it would be only in the distribution of the convicts, for Sir Joshua Jebb had assured him that he thought 750 convicts would be transported this year. Under those circumstances he could not consent to a reduction of the Vote.

LORD ALFRED CHURCHILL entirely agreed with the hon. Gentleman who had proposed the reduction of the Vote. As there was unused accommodation in the prisons at home for a great number of convicts, he did not see why the expensive system of transportation should be continued.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That a sum, not exceeding £9,776, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray Expenses connected with the Transportation of Convicts, &c. to the 31st day of March, 1862."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 26; Noes 102: Majority 76.

MR. CONINGHAM wished to put a question to the Home Secretary in reference to the repeated and frightful outbreaks of mutiny at the convict stations. Did it arise from mismanagement, or was Sir Joshua Jebb an incompetent officer?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS did not admit that the outbreaks at Chatham, Portland, and Portsmouth had been frequent or frightful. No doubt some time since there was a formidable riot at Chatham, and there had also been a few escapes from Portland and Portsmouth, but there had been nothing that deserved the description of a general outbreak or mutiny. The mutiny of the convicts at Chatham had been carefully investigated; but it was very difficult to ascertain precisely the causes and origin of outbreaks of this sort. It was not easy to say what were the precise causes of the Indian mutiny. The outbreak at Chatham had been attributed to some laxity of discipline and deficiencies on the part of subordinate officers transferred to the establishment from the hulks—a portion of the prisoners came from the hulks also; but the mutiny was speedily put down. There was no loss of life. Some corporal punishment was necessarily inflicted on the ringleaders; but, all things considered, the outbreak was suppressed with as little difficulty as could be expected under the circumstances. He believed the convict system of England was a very good one, founded on sound principles, and administered with great care. He had the greatest confidence in the judgment of Sir Joshua Jebb and his colleagues, and, without disputing the justness of the praises bestowed on the Irish system and its superintendents, he doubted whether any portion of it could be advantageously transferred to the system adopted in England.

MR. CONINGHAM believed the outbreak at Portland was only suppressed by the aid of the military force, and in the convict establishment at Portsmouth a surgeon was murdered. Sir Joshua Jebb was not the person who ought to have been sent to conduct the inquiry into the mutiny at Chatham, but some one who would have made a searching investigation. It was most unsatisfactory that these outbreaks should only have been suppressed by force and severe flogging.

In answer to Sir JOHN PAKINGTON,

SIR GEORGE LEWIS explained that the number of convicts to be sent to Bermuda this year would be reduced; the number to be sent to Gibraltar and Western Australia would be about 700.

Vote agreed to.

(68.) £145,590, to complete the sum for Convict Establishments (Colonies).

MR. PEELE proposed to reduce the Vote by the sum of £10,000, which would not be required for the establishment at Bermuda.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH asked, what was the cause of the different cost of almost equal numbers of convicts in different colonies? He believed that all the convict labour might be employed at home in completing Portland, and then on the other large public works.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the question involved the distinction between transportation and penal servitude. The convicts sent to Gibraltar were employed, in captivity, on public works, and at the end of their term returned to England. Those sent to Western Australia remained there, and became part of the colonial population; they were disposed of for life, and this country got rid of them. There was that advantage in the system of transportation. It would be difficult to enforce imprisonment for life; men were likely to become desperate under it. It was not advisable to give up the system of transportation altogether.

LORD NAAS had hoped, after the strong statement made in "another place" by the Secretary for the Colonies, that no more convicts would be sent to Bermuda. He trusted that some assurance on this point would be given.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that the noble Lord's statements last Session relative to Bermuda were derived from the testimony of the chaplain. Upon inves-

tigation that testimony was found to be considerably exaggerated, and it appeared that the moral and physical state of the convicts was not so bad as was represented. Nevertheless, it had been considered advisable to suspend the shipment of convicts to Bermuda, and no convicts had accordingly been sent there for some time. With the prisons at home, the convict establishment at Gibraltar, and the opportunity of sending a few convicts to Western Australia, no difficulty was felt in disposing of the present number of convicts.

Voto agreed to.

Clause 2 (Construction of Section 57, of 5 and 6 W. 4, c. 76).

MR. NEWDEGATE renewed his objections to the proposal that the Mayor of a town, who might be inexperienced, should preside ex officio over magistrates of great experience appointed by the Crown. Whenever the Mayor had had magisterial experience, no doubt precedence would be cheerfully accorded to him. He must take the sense of the House against a provision which would not add to the dignity of the Mayor, but which would cast a slur on the municipal administration of justice. He moved that the clause be expunged.

MR. SCHOLEFIELD said, that the hon. Member had spoken as if the Mayor of a borough had nothing to do but preside over petty sessions. But this Bill was to give him precedence, not only at petty sessions, but at meetings of magistrates held for a variety of purposes, such as the licences of public-houses, and at gaol sessions. The gaols were erected and maintained by the borough, and who so fit to preside at such sessions and at licensing sessions as the Mayor? He was the functionary responsible for the peace of the borough, and in times of excitement and disturbance the Government communicated with him on the best mode of preserving the peace. The intention of the Municipal Corporations Act clearly was that the Mayor should have precedence within the borough.

Sir George Lewis

MR. NEWDEGATE would remind the hon. Member for Birmingham that in the borough represented by him the magistrates did not refuse to accept the presidency of the Mayor until a person was elected Mayor to whom the hon. Member knew they had reason to object. A licensed victualler had once been Mayor of that town, and surely the hon. Member would not wish to see such a person Chairman of the licensing sessions on licensing day.

MR. ADDERLEY supported the Amendment, and said he did not see what necessity there was for introducing the Bill at all. So far as Birmingham was concerned, he believed that at great personal inconvenience the justices of that place had opposed the measure. He thought that as there was a strong objection on the one side, while on the other it was a matter only of sentiment and pride, the House ought to have some explanation from the Secretary of State why they should be called on to agree to this clause.

MR. BAINES said, the Bill was only intended to continue a practice that prevailed in every municipal corporation in the kingdom except Birmingham. If the Mayor was not to be ex officio president, they must have the inconvenient system of annual election, else the Mayor, who might only be magistrate for the year of his office, would have no chance of being president at all.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 91; Noes 22: Majority 69.

MR. NEWDEGATE gave notice that as he found many hon. Gentlemen were not aware the division on this clause would be taken to-night, he would move the rejection of the clause on bringing up the Report.

Clause 3 (Amendment of Section 98 of 5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 76.).

MR. FREELAND said, that this clause proposed to alter, in a manner which he thought most objectionable, the provisions of the Municipal Corporations Act with reference to Borough Justices. By that Act it was provided that every person assigned by Her Majesty's Commission to act as a Justice in and for a Borough should reside within the Borough for which he should be so assigned, or within seven miles of the Borough, or some part thereof, during such time as he should act as a Justice of the Peace in and for such Borough. By this Bill it was proposed that every justice should be deemed to reside within such Borough, if he occupied any house, shop, warehouse, or other premises within the same, or within seven miles thereof. A person, therefore, who resided eight, ten, or fifteen miles away from a Borough might, if he occupied a tenement within that Borough, no matter how insignificant its value, be so assigned to act as a Borough Magistrate. He thought that such an alteration would introduce a class of persons not contemplated by the Municipal Corporations Act, and that in a political point of view it was open to very serious objections. He had received a letter from an old and tried friend of the Liberal party as regarded the effect of the change proposed, and with the permission of the Committee he would read a short extract from it, in the spirit of which he entirely concurred—

“As to Section 3, by which a Justice is to be deemed to reside within a borough, if he occupies a house, &c., within seven miles thereof, it would, if I were in Parliament, be opposed by me tooth and nail. Justices are now appointed by the Crown, in other words, by Her Majesty's Ministers, through the medium of the Lord Chancellor. To a certainty, if such a clause becomes law, the great man of the neighbourhood, if he be in favour with the Ministers of the day, will, in reality, have the nomination of Borough Justices. Now, being a magistrate gives, as it ought, a position and an influence—which, if possessed by country gentlemen, will be extraneous and adverse in most instances to Liberal principles. Boroughs have always been the strongholds of Liberalism. I cannot, for my own part, imagine what Her Majesty's present Ministry can (if they really be Liberals) be thinking of. My strong impression is that, if this clause passes, such of Her Majesty's Ministers as are really and truly Liberals will live to regret it.”

He would not trouble the Committee with any further comments, but he would move the omission of the clause.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS certainly had not proposed the clause from any political motive. In some large boroughs various persons resided more than seven miles from the town, but were virtually citizens of it, and came there to their place of business daily. Being, however, at present excluded, whatever their other qualifications, from the magistracy by the present law, this clause was framed to remove their disability. The provision was, he believed, not liable to abuse, and would effect an Amendment in the existing law.

MR. DENMAN suggested that a portion of the proposal of the hon. Member for Chichester should be adopted, and that the words at the end of the clause “or within seven miles thereof” should be omitted.

Clause, as amended, agreed to, as were also Clauses 4 and 5.

Clause 6 (Power to make new Adjustment of Wards in Boroughs).

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he had been informed that the object of this provision was to authorize alterations in the arrangement of wards with a view to party purposes. He, therefore, hoped the Home Secretary would explain whether there was any real necessity for it.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS, as far as he was concerned, was totally unconscious of any party object in proposing the clause. It had been stated to him that since the passing of the Municipal Corporations Act changes had taken place in the population of certain wards, which rendered their boundaries unsuited to their present requirements. The power taken by this clause, if discreetly exercised, would be beneficial; but if any jealousy was entertained on the subject, and the power was shown to be capable of abuse, he should not insist upon the clause.

Clause agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered on Monday next.

House adjourned at half after

FICTITIOUS SAVINGS BANKS BILL.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

SIR FRANCIS BARING, in moving that the House should resolve itself into Committee on this Bill, said its sole object was to determine the law with regard to establishments calling themselves “savings banks.” There were two classes of savings banks, those that had complied with the Government regulations and those which had not. The beneficial operation of savings banks under proper management did not admit of dispute, but great hardships had been entailed on poor and unsuspecting persons, who, having entrusted their money to so-called "savings banks," under the impression that they were under Government regulations, discovered too late that they had been deceived by the assumed name, and had placed confidence in improper quarters. It had been proved before the Committee which investigated the subject that the monetary crisis in Glasgow was aggravated by the suspension of sixteen of these self-styled "savings banks," the law at present allowing any persons who thought proper to do so to associate with a common object under that title. In Southampton there were three establishments of that class, one of which was next door to the real savings bank, and instances were adduced in which it had been mistaken for the bank under Government control. The Committee had also received evidence with regard to similar cases in Brighton, Birmingham, and Manchester, and a circular had been produced which the persons interested in promoting one of these fictitious savings banks had put forward, detailing the advantages of forming a connection with their particular banking agency. The object of the Bill was not to punish such persons for the past, but to prevent them for the future from adopting the name of savings bank. It did not prevent them from proceeding with their business as they pleased; but what it said was that if they adopted the name of savings bank they should come under the savings-banks law, and should not deceive depositors by assuming a title to which they had no claim. He had the sanction of the Government for the measure, which had been most favourably received in the other House of Parliament, and he did not anticipate any opposition to its provisions. He, therefore, begged to move that its consideration in Committee be entered upon.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the House was naturally disposed to receive with favour any measure emanating from the right hon. Baronet, but he thought he had not fully considered the necessary consequences of his present Bill. It proposed to create a new offence, punishable as a misdemeanour, to meet exceptional cases. But the Bill would, likewise, affect a number of institutions which were not merely harmless but positively beneficial; he referred to the "Penny Savings Banks," which had been established under somewhat varying regulations, with the greatest advantage to the working classes, and whose managers, if the Bill were to become law, would be guilty of misdemeanour. They were very numerous in the north of England. They were not started for personal profit, but purely from philanthropic motives. If there were any public reason for compelling them to drop the term savings banks he should not object. But there was not, so far as he knew, any such reason. It must not be supposed that a change of name was a little matter with them. It was a serious thing; and what was more, to require them to remove that name was to cast a slur upon them. He should not have objected to the Bill if it had proposed to carry out all the recommendations of the Committee to which reference had been made. It was true the Committee in their Report referred to the inconvenience arising from institutions not under Government control assuming a similar appellation; but their attention was more especially directed to the advisability of giving guarantees to the present savings banks. When one of these failed, from any cause whatever, and it was found that the prevailing impression that the establishment enjoyed a Government guarantee was unfounded, public faith was shaken, and it was hard to induce them to place confidence in any savings banks whatever. His great objection to the Bill was that, by imposing this severe punishment on the conductors of establishments which were not under the Government regulations, the impression that these latter enjoyed a Government guarantee would be increased. But so far from having any such guarantee, the trustees by recent Acts of Parliament had been relieved from all liability, even in cases of wilful neglect and default, and he regretted to say that flagrant cases of what he must call fraud had taken place in these very Government savings banks. At Rochdale, for instance, it was discovered upon the death of the actuary that he had abstracted some £50,000 or £60,000 from the savings of his neighbours. The principal savings bank in Kendal was conducted in the names of several gentlemen, and the directors for the time being were responsible. As the directorate would probably be good for £500,000 in the aggregate, he would appeal to the House whether that bank was not safer than a Government savings bank, in which the only guarantee on the part of the Government was that they would be responsible for money after it got into their hands, they taking no steps whatever to insure that it ever would get into their possession? In a Welsh district there had been a Government savings bank in which a temporary defalcation took place. After that occurrence the people would not patronize the Government bank, and the proprietors of large ironworks in the district established a savings bank in connection with their own concern, for the benefit of their work-people. Was the House of Commons prepared to make that philanthropic act a penal offence? He thought they ought to postpone legislation on the subject till they were prepared to meet the whole question, and carry out the recommendation of the Committee. Parliament had begun that year to give a Government guarantee by passing the Post Office Savings Bank Bill. Would it not be better to see how that Bill worked before introducing any measure of this kind? He was of opinion that the Bill would interfere with a number of banks which were doing a great deal of good; that it was uncalled for at that time, and that it would strengthen a false impression throughout the country, and thereby prevent that careful inspection and management of savings banks which would take place if it were not generally believed that there was a special guarantee for the money deposited in those establishments. He, therefore, moved as an Amendment that the Bill be committed that day three months.

Amendment proposed,

"To leave out from the word 'That' to the end of the Question, in order to add the words 'this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee.'"

—instead thereof.

MR. BAINES said, he must oppose the Motion for going into Committee on the Bill, as the right hon. Baronet objected to an Amendment of which he had given notice, for the insertion of words which would limit the operation of the measure to banks other than Government established, "for the purpose of profit to the managers or shareholders." The right hon. Baronet said, that if that Amendment were agreed to he would give up the Bill. Under these circumstances, he felt bound to second the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bradford. In its present shape the Bill would strike at hundreds and thousands of institutions which were arising throughout the country, and which he conceived to be attended with great usefulness—he meant the penny savings banks. They were on a small scale, and connected with almost every Sunday school, mechanics' institution, and evening class. They were managed by those who managed those benevolent institutions, by the committees of Sunday schools, and others whose object was purely and absolutely philanthropic. In many cases the object was to collect the pence of the children, and on the approach of winter or spring, to provide them with new clothing, the money was withdrawn. They got a much better interest than they could get if they invested in a Government savings bank. He held in his hand a letter from a friend in his own borough, who, with his wife and family, had established an evening class to teach mill girls to sew. He had established a penny bank in connection with that class, and he had written to him to say that he should give it up if the present Bill passed, as he did not choose to subject himself to be charged with an offence or to be visited by the penalties of the Bill. It might be said that they would only be required to take away the word "savings" from their title; but that word was the charm of the institution, and if they took away that they would be doing a great deal of mischief. The effect of the institutions to which he had referred was to induce children to acquire a habit of saving, which could not but be of the greatest possible value to them in after life. The evil which the right hon. Baronet wished to reach by his Bill was one which he (Mr. Baines) believed could be reached by the ordinary course of law against fraud; and as that Bill would demolish thousands of useful institutions, and as the right hon. Gentleman would not permit him to amend it, he had no course but to oppose the measure by seconding the Motion.

MR. HENLEY said, he was very sorry to hear that the right hon. Baronet the Member for Portsmouth would not consent to the modification of his Bill, because he agreed with the hon. Member for Leeds that the measure as now framed would injuriously affect an infinite number of penny savings banks in connection with schools. Those banks had no rules, but the clergyman of a parish, a schoolmistress, or some other person said to the children, "Put in a penny a week and I will add so much, and at Christmas or Michaelmas the money will be distributed in a particular manner." Now, were they to declare the person who did that to be guilty of a misdemeanour. That was the real question. The right hon. Baronet said, "Why do you not change the name?" He had cast a good deal about for words, but he could not find a word that would express what "savings" did as well as that term itself. Every child understood it. He was very reluctant to vote against the Bill, but if the right hon. Baronet did not modify it he should feel bound to do so.

MR. BAXTER said, he agreed very much with what had fallen from the last three speakers, but his object in rising was to explain the effect which the passing of the Bill would have in Scotland. In many towns in Scotland the only savings banks were those the deposits of which were guaranteed by the great chartered banks in that country. They were purely benevolent institutions, not conducted for profit, but for the benefit of the poor. Every day the money received was placed in the chartered banks with which they were associated, and was guaranteed by those banks the moment it was entered upon the depositors' pass-books. He would put it to the House whether that was not a better guarantee than that which the right hon. Baronet placed so highly? While they all knew that there had been several defalcations in connection with the Government savings banks, there had not been a single instance of defalcation in the banks which he had described. The effect then of passing the Bill in its present shape would be to deprive many of the towns of Scotland of the advantages which they enjoyed from the name of savings banks.

MR. HUBBARD said, the truth was the object of the Bill was to protect those who from their position in society were unable to protect themselves; and what they had heard of the charm in the name savings banks only strengthened the case of those who wished to pass the Bill, because it showed that the very fact of the assumption of the name of savings bank secured confidence and attracted depositors. Some of the most extensive institutions, which had assumed the name were carrying on a most thriving trade so far as regarded the acquisition of deposits, but an exceedingly losing trade so far as regarded their own profits and the security of the depositors. One of these institutions, established a few years back, promised high interest and undoubted security to depositors: while it promised large profits and limited liability to its shareholders. How those conditions were to be harmonized it was not easy to perceive. In the year ending June, 1859, that society by its own account alone made a deficiency for one year of £2,135. Up to September 1859 the liabilities amounted in the whole to £37,000 from the commencement, while the assets amounted to only £24,000, making a deficiency of £13,000. That was an illustration of the mischief which was going on. In one year thirty new branches had been opened, and £37,000 received. While those institutions were managed upon such principles, and since in a few years they must be eaten up by the expenditure, it was not for the Legislature to stand by and say, "Let the public take care of themselves." He submitted, then, that there was a case for the intervention of Parliament to prevent loss to persons who were unable to help themselves.

MR. DENT said, he deprecated too much interference on the part of Parliament in affairs which people should manage for themselves; nor did he see why the Government should adopt the fascinating title of "savings banks" without incurring full responsibility for all money deposited in those institutions, and at the same time deny to others the right to call their banks by that name. In the borough which he represented (Scarborough), and which contained about 18,000 inhabitants, those banks were established since 1850. During that time there were something like 1,100 depositors, and of these about 1,000 were connected with the schools in the town, while the whole amount deposited was only about £500, although the banks were something like the money-boxes given to children, the object being to get them to put in their money and make it difficult for them to take it out again. He should like to see everything connected with the poor self-supporting, but that could not be the case if such security was given as was intended by the Bill. He, therefore, thought it would be safer to reject the Bill, and wait for a more comprehensive measure to carry out the recommendations of the Select Committee.

Mr. Henley

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that it appeared to him that it would be going very far in the direction of penal legislation if, because the Government gave certain assistance to savings banks, but without giving an absolute guarantee, that House were to give them a sort of monopoly in the title "savings bank," and make it a misdemeanour, punishable by fine and imprisonment, for any one else to establish a savings bank and call it by that name. If it would be shown that there was a fraudulent intent; that the object of the party was to create a misunderstanding and to produce an impression that a bank was a Government savings bank, when it was not, the case would be different. Some qualification of that sort might remove the objection which now existed to the Bill. He could not call to mind any instance of a similar prohibition to that contained in the Bill. With regard to any argument that might be drawn from the law relative to the assumption of trade marks, where a trader assumed the trade mark of another firm there was prima facie evidence of fraud; but the case under consideration was a mere assumption of a name which might accurately describe the nature of the business.

SIR FRANCIS BARING said, he must have been labouring under a great delusion. Last year that or a similar Bill was brought into the House of Lords, and the Government expressed approbation of it in that House. That year it was brought into the House of Lords, and the noble Lords who represented the Government then expressed their approbation of it. He had had the honour of communicating on the subject with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and he understood that right hon. Gentleman to wish him to go on with the Bill. He had acted under the conviction that he was proceeding in concert with Her Majesty's Government. However, after the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had declared against the Bill it was hopeless for him to go on with it; but he wished that the Government knew their own minds a little better, and that hon. Members should not be told by one Minister that what he was doing was sanctioned by them, and then, when he came down to the House, find himself thrown over by another. In pronouncing the funeral oration of the Bill, he wished to observe that he was as unwilling as any human being could be to interfere with the privileges of those benevolent institutions which had been referred to in the course of the debate; but he could find no words which would really draw a distinction between what he wanted to stop and what he would allow to go on. He admitted that that was an argument against the Bill itself. He had received communications with respect to what were called penny banks, but these would not have been affected at all by the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by withdrawing his Motion.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, he thought the right hon. Member had exercised a sound discretion in determining not to press his Bill. What was really wanted was that every charitable and benevolent society should be obliged to submit its transactions to an efficient annual audit at the hands of a paid auditor. Frauds were as common in the case of friendly societies as in the case of savings banks. He hoped, therefore, that next year a Bill would be introduced insisting upon an efficient audit in the case of all societies in which the working classes invested their money.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he was not aware, before his right hon. Friend mentioned the circumstance, that this was a Government measure. He never had heard the subject discussed by his Colleagues, and he had given his opinion as an individual Member of the House, without wishing to bring Government influence to bear upon it. He was not before aware of the circumstances to which his right hon. Friend had adverted.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, the Committee that sat on the subject only wished to interfere with institutions that were carried on for profit, and not those that were instituted only for benevolent purposes. He was certainly surprised when the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary rose and threw over the Bill, as he thought it might have been so amended in Committee as to render it a valuable measure.

LORD HARRY VANE said, he considered that, in the case of the small institutions, anything like an efficient audit would be impracticable; and that, even if it were practicable, it would be most distasteful to the depositors.

SIR JERVOISE JERVOISE expressed a hope that in a future Session a comprehensive measure would be introduced on the subject.

CHURCH RATES LAW AMENDMENT

BILL.—[MR. HUBBARD.]

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. HUBBARD thought the present was a favourable opportunity for the dispassionate consideration of the question. The only measure on this subject which of late years had passed through the House was a Bill for the total abolition of church rates, and that Bill had recently received a gradually diminishing support, until, from a commanding majority, it had met with actual rejection. The parties, however, on that last division were so accurately balanced that neither could claim a predominance, and they were so far qualified to consider the subject with reciprocal motives for liberality and conciliation. But why had this decline occurred in the fortunes of the Total Abolition Bill? Because the measure itself was out of all proportion to the grievance alleged by one party of its supporters, and because it proved so truthful an interpreter of the ulterior aims of another, and that the effective party who supported it. The hon. Baronet (Sir John Trelawny) and his friends promoted it as a remedy for a conscientious grievance, and excused its going so far beyond the necessity of their case by urging that it was in the interest of the Church itself that they proposed to abolish church rates. The answer to that plea briefly was—"Churchmen are the best judges of what is for their own advantage, and beg that they may be left free to tax themselves for their own purposes." But the object of the real and effective promoters of total abolition was to denationalise the Church, and for their object the proposition was most admirably contrived. Upon that field the Liberation Society would meet with a resolute resistance, and hon. Gentlemen opposite may be satisfied that this question would never be settled upon the ground of ignoring the nationality of the Church. Neither (would he add to Gentlemen on this side the House) could the question be settled by ignoring the principle of religious liberty. If these facts were mutually recognized, there would be no difficulty on the part of Churchmen in appreciating the position of Dissenters, and granting them all that they could reasonably desire. The Bill which he had brought forward stated in the first place the legitimate objects for which church rates ought to be raised. It proposed to constitute modern ecclesiastical districts into parishes so far as church rates were concerned. It transferred the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts in the case of church rates either to the County Courts, the Quarter Sessions, or the Supreme Common Law Courts. Then it assimilated the mode in which the church rate was to be collected to that followed in the case of poor rate; and it gave power to persons not conforming to the Church of England to claim exemption from the rate. He would not affirm that there was nothing in a name, but he must say that the phrase of ticketing Dissenters had been erected into an unreasonable bugbear. If it were a disgrace to be a Dissenter, it would be natural to shrink from being known as one, but what was the origin of a Dissenter? A Dissenter was one who, taking advantage of the liberty awarded to him, dissented from the Church, and the fact of his doing so proved that he was a man of determination, and that he took the step irrespective of any social consequences that might ensue from it. Why, then, should such a man shrink from being ticketed as a Dissenter? He was sure the Society of Friends could have no such feeling, for they were not only the oldest and most consistent controversialists on behalf of their peculiar views, but they ticketed themselves by the adoption of a peculiar dress, antiquated but convenient, and by adhering to a phraseology which respected the rules of grammar, while it violated the rules of courtesy. A more serious objection to a declaration of Nonconformity was raised by those Churchmen who looked upon schism as so fearful a danger and offence that they deprecated inviting or allowing men to assume the character of Dissenters. Well, if that scruple were generally entertained by the House, he should readily yield to it, for, although he thought the form of claim he had framed a natural and reasonable one, he did not consider the disclaimer of Church Communion to be an essential feature in it. But would that change in the construction of the claim remove the objection, or would it be urged again, as it had been by the learned Member for Plymouth, that any claim to exemption implied Nonconformity, and was, therefore, to be considered as a ticketing? He was really anxious to adopt the form which was most entirely free from a liability to offend the conscience, the scruples, the prejudices even, of Dissenters; but he must frankly say that he saw no prospect of an adjustment if they approached the discussion only in the spirit of the Liberation Society. In one of a series of propositions advertised by that society on the eve of the last division, they objected to the retention by Churchmen of a legal power to levy church rates, and declared that if it were continued Dissenters would be entitled to claim a right to levy "chapel rates." This struck him as a most significant declaration, for it implied that it was the legal status of the Church as bound up in the Constitution which they attacked, and that, rather than leave the Church in the sole possession of a legal power to rate, they would themselves demand the same right, a right be it remembered, which they had decried as a hateful one, and destructive of all true and vital religion. The hon. Member for Birmingham, in a previous debate, had invited them to give up their exclusive prerogative, but, "only upon church rates;" but did the Liberation Society assail the prerogative of the Church only as to church rates? Oh, no! They were explicit enough. Their indictment was sufficiently distinct and ample. The religious compact at the Coronation between the Sovereign and the people—the recognition of the Church in the religious service of the House of Lords, of the House of Commons, and of the Universities—the religious teaching of the destitute in our workhouses—the religious conversion of our very criminals in our prisons, since the religion was that of the Church—the maintenance of the religious endowments of the Church for parochial and educational purposes—all these, and many other facts are boldly designated by the Liberation Society as so many objects of their deliberate and resolute hostility. Now, while he avowed for himself, and for others whose feelings he knew, a desire to meet the consideration of any real grievance on the part of Dissenters with the utmost liberality, he must add that they could have no hope of adjusting these differences with men who shared the extravagant and revolutionary views of the Liberation Society. Let Members on the other side acknowledge and respect the nationality of the Church, and let Members on this side frankly recognize the principle of religious liberty, and he could anticipate a fair and equitable adjustment of this lamentable and prolonged struggle. He did not expect that at this period of the Session it would be possible to pass a Bill of such importance as the present, but he hoped he would be pardoned by the House for the statement he had made, as he had made it with a sincere desire to promote a fair and equitable settlement of this question. As he saw no prospect of being able to carry the Bill this Session, he would move that the order for its second reading be discharged.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, he did not know whether, strictly speaking, he ought to allow the Bill to be withdrawn. However, he would content himself by giving hon. Gentlemen opposite a little advice, in many of whom he saw signs of improvement. He trusted they would make up their minds during the recess on some definite plan they would be prepared to support in the next Session. The hon. Gentleman had put a wrong gloss on the resolution of the Liberation Society, when he said that they were in point of fact asking the House to give them coercive means of obtaining rates the same as Churchmen had. They merely said that if the House adopted these rates, and they were held to be right and proper, then the necessary and logical consequence would be that the same right should be conceded to Dissenters. But they were entirely against any compulsory process whatever.

MR. BANKS STANHOPE said, that the general principle of a compromise must be that the Established Church alone had the right to levy a church rate. Her supporters, however, were willing to give to all who did not belong to the national Church the power of declining to pay church rates. He was opposed to drawing any hard line of demarcation between the Church and those who did not belong to her, and he had reason to know that that sentiment was shared not only by the Dissenters, but by many of the heads of the Church. The Bill of his hon. Friend (Mr. Cross) was fixed for the 24th inst. He could not say whether it would be introduced and discussed this Session, but, looking to the present appearance of the House, and the desirableness of securing a full House on a subject of national importance, his hon. Friend would probably not attempt to proceed with his Bill during the present Session. Next year, however, he trusted that a compromise would be adopted which would give satisfaction not only to both Houses of Parliament, but also to the public out of doors.

MR. J. C. EWART said, that church rates in Liverpool had been practically abolished for years. A sort of rate, how-over was made, which was printed in red ink on the rating paper, with the word "voluntary" against it. If a ratepayer objected to it he had only to strike his pen through it. There were hundreds of Dissenters in Liverpool who formerly objected to pay the rate when it was compulsory who paid the voluntary rate cheerfully. By that method all "ticketing" was avoided, and universal satisfaction was given. The amount was certainly not so great as had been collected previously, but it was amply sufficient for all church purposes.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he wished to bear his testimony to the conciliatory tone of the hon. Baronet the Member for Tavistock. The hon. Baronet was almost as one with himself in thinking that church rates had better be abolished, provided there were an adequate substitute secured to the parishes. The hon. Baronet had used great exertions to induce hon. Members to consider the plan which he (Mr. Newdegate) had the honour of submitting to the House, the plan being to "ticket" no one, but to give an exemption to tenants, if they chose to take it, by private arrangement with the landlords. That plan was practicable. It would be impossible to revive church rates in Birmingham by any compulsory system, and his plan would have left Birmingham exempt from its operation. If some such plan as existed in Liverpool were adopted in Birmingham it would provide the means for maintaining the fabrics of churches in that borough. He deprecated all compromises which would create a demarcation between Churchmen and Dissenters. His principles were ably enunciated by a learned Nonconformist who derived his origin from Birmingham. He claimed that the National Church should be open to every one; that every denomination having the means of providing for its own religious worship with the amplest freedom should never be debarred from returning to the Church of England; that no distinction, whether legal or moral, should be raised against their return; for he held that to establish such demarcation would invalidate the foundation of the National Church, and be calculated to disentitle the Church to the possession of her property, which she used so much to the advantage of the community. Such a demarcation would in short lay the ground for the denationalization of the Church. It was a principle of exclusion to which he would never readily yield his sanction. The principle on which he proposed his plan was the principle of inclusion. He saw no reason why a settlement satisfactory to all parties, not depriving parishes of their right to their property, not depriving them of legal means of maintaining the fabric of the church, should not be adopted.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, that they heard a great deal about compromise within the walls of that House, but he believed that those whom he represented, and the large body of Nonconformists, had not the least intention to come to any compromise. It was only in that House that it was talked of, and they were only deceiving themselves if they believed that any compromise would ever be entered into. The hon. Baronet (Sir John Trelawny) had disclaimed any connection between his measure and the Liberation Society. Why, the Bill was the Bill of the Liberation Society. It was first brought in by Sir William Clay, into whose hands it was placed by the society. The agitation throughout had been the agitation of the Liberation Society, and the question would never have assumed the triumphant importance it had if it had not been for the Liberation Society. It was entirely their doing. Depend upon it they had no intention of compromising the question. But he thought it an unfortunate thing that the hon. Baronet (Sir John Trelawny) had acceded to the invitation of the hon. Member for Wiltshire (Mr. Sotheron Estcourt) who said he had a Bill in preparation for a compromise, and volunteered to delay his measure from the 5th of June to the 20th. He (Mr. Duncombe) believed if he had stuck to the 5th of June he would have carried his Bill, and it would have gone to the House of Lords, and Mr. Speaker would not have been placed in the shameful position of having to give a casting vote. Many hon. Gentlemen threw off on account of that delay. They saw compromise was intended, and they went away. He thought the cause had suffered by the course taken. The Nonconformists had the struggle to begin again. Let them stick to it. It was too late to compromise, and depend on it before many years were over, the rate would be abolished.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that he had contrasted with regret the tone of the language of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) and that of the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. Duncombe). He ventured to say that the

hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Duncombe) had undertaken to do more than he was entitled when he said that he spoke on the part of the body of Nonconformists. [Mr. T. DUNCOMBE: I did not say I spoke for them. I said that I believed it.] He would then express his confident hope that the hon. Gentleman's belief was erroneous. He was much more disposed to agree with the hon. Member for Liverpool in thinking that there was no small proportion of the Nonconformists of England who would not only be glad to see the question amicably settled, but who, if the compulsory payment of church rates were abolished, would gladly contribute to the support of a church open alike to rich and poor. He thought his hon. Friend (Mr. Hubbard) had acted judiciously in withdrawing his Bill. He rose to express his strong and emphatic feeling, which was shared by a very large proportion of hon. Members on both sides, that the time had now arrived when the House might and ought to decide upon some amicable settlement of that long-vexed and disputed question. The course of the agitation ought to have taught both sides alike the necessity of moderation. He would venture to remind the Nonconformists, in the first place, that from the moment the evidence taken before a Committee of the House of Lords established the fact that a certain portion of the Dissenters used the agitation of church rates as a means of attack on the Established Church their majorities had gradually fallen off, until the majority was reversed. The lesson they might learn was this, that so far as they had used church rates as a weapon for injuring and weakening the Established Church, their design had signally failed. No doubt, however, the majority of the Nonconformists were sincere in their conscientious objections to church rates. On the other hand, he would remind the friends of the Church that the question of church rates did not stand in a satisfactory position. They had at length succeeded in defeating a Church Rate Abolition Bill, but it could not be disguised that a large majority of those who voted against it were sincere members of the Church, who desired to put an end to church rates. In many parishes church rates were refused, and the present system could not be said to be working in a satisfactory manner to the Church itself. The Church, for her own interest, was required to make concessions, and he had reason to think that if the subject were approached in a fair and amicable spirit on both sides of the House a satisfactory solution might be arrived at. His opinion was the result of many recent consultations with hon. Members on both sides of the House. He trusted that during the recess hon. Members who had brought in Bills would again devote their minds to the subject, and that, instead of renewing painful conflicts that were a scandal to religion itself, and that created and prolonged ill-feeling between Churchmen and Dissenters, some measure might in the next Session of Parliament receive the consent, if not of the two extreme parties, yet of the great majority of that House.

SIR FREDERICK HEYGATE said, he did not believe that the Bill of his hon. Friend (Mr. Cross) could be urged with any hope of success this Session. It was, however, the only really conciliatory proposal that had been made, and he trusted that either that or some similar measure would receive the assent of Parliament next Session.

MR. CONINGHAM said, he rose to express his concurrence with what had fallen from the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. Duncombe). He was one of those who believed that compromise was out of the question—that there was only one remedy for the evils complained of, and that was abolition. Moreover, he ventured to say that the position of the Church of England was no longer such as to warrant her taking such a high-handed tone. She was no longer the Church of the majority. Within her own bosom there were sects that differed as widely as Rome from Nonconformity. The only way in which the question could be settled was by abolition.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, he would move that the House adjourn, in order—

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Gentleman could not do so. He had already spoken, and it was not competent for him to make a Motion. He might explain.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, a remark had been made that he was for a compromise. Certainly he should not be averse to a compromise, but he did not think the hon. Gentleman below (Mr. Duncombe) had treated him fairly. Why, Mr. Miall, who went as far as any one in these matters, had accepted the compromise which was proposed by Sir George Grey. He (Sir John Trelawny) was not allowed to explain further, but he would take care there was no mistake about the matter.

The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Duncombe) presumed greatly on his past usefulness when he made the statement he had made.

MR. PUGH expressed a hope that in the next Session there would be a permanent settlement of this question; he meant one that would be satisfactory to all parties, for no other could be expected to be permanent. He had heard it said by high authorities in this House, who were themselves opposed to the unconditional abolition of church rates, that Wales was in this matter an exceptional case, differing altogether from England; and it was certain that however great were the evils of the present position of the question there they were still more aggravated in Wales by reason of the prevalence of Dissent. These evils could not be better described than they were in the Second Resolution of the Lords' Report; that church rates are only assessable by a majority of the vestry, and that for the neglect to vote a rate there is no penalty at common law. Thus, on a question which ought above all others to be removed from the arena of controversy; namely, whether the church shall be repaired or not, they saw continually evoked all the stormy passions of the political platform and the hustings; and more envenomed, because there entered into them a religious and sectarian spirit, telling men that they were conscience stricken and persecuted, and proportionably exasperating them. These evils seemed to him far greater than any that could arise from total abolition. In the evenly balanced state of parties in this House it was no disparagement of individual Members, however eminent they might be, to say that a settlement of this question was beyond their powers. He, therefore, wished to see it undertaken by the Government; that of Lord Derby had made an honourable attempt in that direction, and he had always thought that it was more honourable in them to have made the attempt than it was discreditable to have failed. Nec tam, Turpe fuit vinci, quam contendisse decorum est. If they looked back on the legislation of preceding years, they saw that those political settlements which had been made in a large and comprehensive spirit, had given general satisfaction and had been permanent. In such a spirit the Duke of Wellington, by the influence which he possessed, was enabled to achieve Catholic emancipation; and Ireland, which was once the most turbulent and distracted part of the empire, became as peaceable and contented as any other. After years of agitation the free trade controversy was closed. They had made peace with Ireland, they had made peace with the Free-traders, let them now make peace with the Dissenters. Some of them might have expressed ulterior views, some might have even spoken unadvisedly with their lips, but he did not think, he was sure the House did not think, that the great body of them throughout the country were an implacable race who had vowed the destruction of the Church. And if some of them had done so, that was no reason why they should refuse to apply timely remedies to admitted evils, which all deplored; which affected the clergy more than any others. If this question were once settled, and that of education treated in a mild and paternal spirit, he believed that thousands of Dissenters, from being opposed to the Church, would become its friends. Should the Government in the next Session address themselves to it they would, doubtless, be supported on both sides of the Houses of Parliament; and they might feel the satisfaction of having accomplished two great measures—the French Treaty, and the settlement of the church rate question; peace abroad, and peace at home.

SIR CHARLES DOUGLAS did not think the course taken by his hon. Friend the Member for Tavistock was open to the criticisms of his hon. Friend (Mr. T. Duncombe), for they were not founded on fact. He (Sir Charles Douglas), having been a member of the Committee moved for by the Member for Tavistock in 1851, could state that a Bill for the Total Abolition of Church Rates was the consequence of the proceedings before that Committee, was not drawn by the Liberation Society, on the contrary, it was introduced into that House before that society existed. He might add that the hon. Gentleman himself (Mr. T. Duncombe) was one, amongst others, who had originally asked his hon. Friend to bring in the Bill. It was perfectly true that the hon. Member for Tavistock had always expressed his readiness to accept a satisfactory compromise, but those who knew him, well knew that the only compromise which could be proposed as satisfactory to him must be, both in principle and substance, all he had so long contended for. He believed that the opponents of church rates owed much to his hon. Friend for his conduct of this Bill, for he had always endeavoured to promote goodwill, and he (Sir Charles Douglas) was sure he was only expressing the feeling of the House in bearing testimony to the courteous and efficient manner in which his hon. Friend had invariably conducted the opposition to the church rates. He believed that his hon. Friend had acted wisely in giving to Gentlemen opposite full opportunity for proposing a compromise, convinced as he was they could never agree on any plan which would settle the question short of total abolition. For his own part, for the sake both of Churchmen and Dissenters, he was not in favour of any compromise of principle on the question, and he was convinced that no compromise would ever be accepted on any terms which did not involve the voluntary principle.

Order discharged; Bill withdrawn.

VACCINATION BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he rose to move as an Amendment that the Bill be committed that day three months. The measure contained provisions deeply affecting the feelings of the labouring classes of the country, and involved a breach of faith on the part of the Government, as two years ago they had agreed that there should be no compulsory legislation on the subject until after a Parliamentary investigation into it had taken place. With regard to vaccination much good might be done, provided persuasion and not coercion were used. Even at the present day medical men differed in opinion as to the efficacy of vaccination. The rage for it which existed at one time had very much evaporated, and if a Committee were appointed he had authority for saying that many eminent medical authorities, both at home and abroad, would be ready to give that Committee the results of their experience on the subject. Some said that vaccination was altogether useless, but, generally speaking, the opinion was in its favour so long as it was not made compulsory. One party would tell them that vaccination only held good for seven years, while another contended that if it were properly done it would last a man's lifetime. Where vaccination had failed as a protection against smallpox the answer invariably given was, that it was not properly done in the first instance. That, however, was a mistake. There were some constitutions which would not take the cowpox at all, and to which, therefore, it was no defence whatever. Be that, however, as it might, there existed a feeling among the people of the country generally that the authorities had no right, in order to carry out a particular theory, to take polluted matter from one person's arm and place it on that of another. There were medical men who maintained that the matter produced in some instances scrofula, consumption, and venereal diseases. When the lymph was taken from arm to arm it no longer was the cowpox which Jenner recommended, and which was to be taken direct from the cow. At all events, however, if vaccination was desirable it should not be done under Act of Parliament, and he very much inclined to the opinion expressed by the late Sir Robert Peel when he said that

"The proposal to make it compulsory was so contrary to the spirit of the British people, and the independence in which they rightly gloried, that he would be no party to such compulsion."

Under these circumstances he would recommend that the Bill be withdrawn for the present Session, and next Session, when an inquiry had taken place, a measure on the subject might be introduced. The hon. Member concluded by moving that the Bill be committed that day three months.

MR. CONINGHAM seconded the Motion.

Amendment proposed,

"To leave out from the word 'That' to the end of the Question, in order to add the words 'this House will, upon this day three months resolve itself into the said Committee.'"

—instead thereof.

MR. LOWE said, he hoped to have been spared the necessity of going at any length into this question, but the interests involved were of such transcendent importance that he could not refrain, in reply to the hon. Member, from placing a satisfactory and triumphant case before the Committee. The history of the measure was this. In 1853 Parliament passed an Act for compulsory vaccination; and that Act was for a time in operation, but as there was a defect in the Act, arising from the want of a provision by which those who prosecuted under it might obtain their expenses, the Act fell into desuetude. When the present Government was formed in 1859 he introduced a Bill to make what then remained of the Board of Health perpetual, and that Bill contained a clause remedying the defect he had just mentioned, but being pressed by the hon. Member for Finsbury on the subject, he, in order to pass the Bill, gave up the clause. It was a bitter reflection to him that he gave up the clause; but had he not done so he believed that he should have lost the measure altogether; yet he was convinced that the abandonment of the clause had occasioned the loss of many thousands of lives in this country. He was, therefore, determined to attempt to remedy the defect; and if the House would not support him, upon the House must fall the responsibility. He was almost ashamed to take up the time of the House by arguing respecting the efficacy of vaccination. From 1837 to 1840 the deaths from smallpox amounted to 12,000 a year; from 1840 to 1853, during which period vaccination by the Poor Law Boards was established, the annual average of deaths was only 5,200, so that it appeared that the diffusion of vaccination had reduced the mortality by more than one-half. Then came the period when the compulsory law came into operation, and its first effect was remarkable. The number of vaccinations enormously increased, and the deaths diminished. In 1854 they sank to 2,808. In the next year the deaths sank still lower, amounting only to 2,525. Afterwards they gradually increased up to the present time, the Act having, as he had already explained, fallen into desuetude, and thus the efficacy of vaccination was satisfactorily established. In 1859 and 1860, when there was a smallpox epidemic in London, and when the Act of 1853 was found not to work, the Board of Health, doing that which was rather irregular for a public office, set up an agitation to induce the Boards of Guardians to supply the deficiency of the law, and the report of the medical officer confirmed what the Board of Health knew before—that when vaccination fell into neglect the smallpox showed itself to be the same terrible pestilence as before Jenner made his valuable discovery. The first effect of this agitation was that the vaccinations in London were raised to five times their average amount, thus showing the enormous amount of neglect which had existed in respect to the matter. Those engaged in the agitation divided London into two districts, one of which they inspected, and in that district the deaths from smallpox were reduced, after inspection, from 621 to 231. The Committee might, therefore, form some idea of the amount of human life and misery that might be saved by the timely application of the remedy of vaccination, and it was ascertained by those who undertook the duty of inspection that before Jenner's invention, two-thirds of the persons in the blind hospitals had been rendered blind by the smallpox. The disease fell in a fatal form on children under five years of age; and it was a curious fact that children vaccinated, however imperfectly, under five years, scarcely ever had the smallpox under that age. In 1857 a circular was sent from the office of the Board of Health to 539 of the most eminent medical men in the country and in foreign parts, and the answers received from all, with the exception of two, were to the effect that vaccination conferred a very great exemption from the smallpox, an almost absolute security against death from that disease, and rendered people less susceptible of other diseases. The list included the names of Dr. Acland, Dr. Babington, Sir Benjamin Brodie, Sir James Clarke, Mr. Ferguson, Dr. Latham, Dr. Locock. Would the House be doing wisely, then, after being made acquainted with the verdict of so many eminent medical men, now to appoint a Committee of Inquiry on the subject? He had mentioned that the terrible malady of smallpox, whenever it attacked children of tender years, fell heavily upon them, and that vaccination was a protection against it; and now let them consider what a great responsibility they would take upon themselves, if, in the face of the almost unanimous opinion of medical men, to which he had just referred, they left unvaccinated children—who could exercise no discretion of their own on the subject—to perish, and also to communicate a dreadful contagion throughout the country. It would be profaning liberty, self-government, and independence, to say that any man had a right to set up his own sordid or brutal prejudices against such opinions as those he had quoted to the exposure of his child to disease and death. Those were his reasons for advocating compulsory vaccination. As to the alleged objection of the poor of the country to such a proposition, he saw no proofs of it. The Bill had been printed for three weeks, and he had not hitherto observed that any petition against it had been presented from that class, or that any objection had been taken to it in any way. He was assured by his inspectors throughout the country that the unions were glad to see them in every case without exception, and that their advice was cheerfully listened to. He was also informed by them that there was no indisposition on the part of the people to vaccination. Ignorance and apathy were found to exist, but he was quite satisfied that if once the people understood that the law which required children to be vaccinated was to be carried into execution it would not be necessary to enforce the law, for it would be obeyed as a matter of course. Naturally, there existed an enormous difference in the ways in which vaccination was performed, and in asking for compulsory powers the State was bound to give every guarantee that those powers should not be abused; consequently, in different parts of the country educational vaccination institutions had been founded, where persons were vaccinated and pupils taught. The quantity of lymph had been doubled and could be increased with the greatest facility and in perfect efficiency to any extent as required. Rules under the Act had also been issued, requiring boards of guardians to contract with no one but regularly qualified practitioners for the purpose of vaccination, and no deputies except of the medical profession would be allowed. More he would do if he knew how, but he hoped the House was satisfied that as far as they could they had endeavoured to promote the great object of vaccination. There was a theory started that the efficacy of vaccination was wearing out, but the valuable discovery of Mr. Seeley had set any doubts on that point at rest for ever. That gentleman had proved that the virus taken from the human body and introduced into that of the cow produced the cowpox. It was thus evident that they had means of obtaining lymph for the necessary power to any extent. The efficiency of vaccination was becoming greater and greater every day, owing to the beautiful discovery that its security could be increased almost indefinitely by increasing the number of punctures. But if there were no means of improving the effect of vaccination, still, under any circumstances, it was an enormous boon to man, for out of 1,000 persons who took smallpox without being vaccinated, 350 died, while out of 1,000 who, after being badly vaccinated, took the smallpox, only 150 died, and out of 1,000 who were well vaccinated, and afterwards took the smallpox, only five died. The Bill which he wished to pass into law was very simple. All that it enacted was that the Poor Law Boards might appoint persons to prosecute under the Bill those whom the medical officers reported ought to be prosecuted, and to allow the expenses of prosecution to be paid out of the poor rates, unless the magistrates should be of opinion that the information was improperly brought. He confined the power of recovering the expenses to official persons in the next clause, which provided for the appropriation of the penalties, and on these simple provisions turned the whole question whether compulsory vaccination should prevail or not. The subject was one with respect to which he felt the deepest anxiety, and he did not, for the reasons which he had stated, deem it consistent with his duty to accede to the Motion of the hon. Member for Finsbury.

MR. MITFORD said, he was astonished to hear that any educated man could now entertain a doubt of the advantage of vaccination as a preventive to smallpox. In one parish in the union with which he was connected, eighteen births had during the last half-year taken place, and yet only two children had been vaccinated. He hoped, therefore, that Government would succeed in carrying out the measure under discussion, inasmuch as the present system of vaccination was wholly inefficient.

MR. LOWE said, he wished to supply some figures which in the course of his remarks he was unable to lay hands upon. He found that the number of deaths from smallpox was—in 1856, 2,227; in 1857, 3,336; in 1858, 6,460; while in 1859, owing, he believed, mainly to the exertions made in agitating the question, the number had fallen to 3,840.

MR. CONINGHAM said, he was of opinion that the State had no right to interfere in the mode proposed by the Government. No doubt if they could be satisfied that all the assumptions of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) were founded on facts, his argument would be conclusive; but when they had to deal with figures, they knew they might be made to prove anything. The names of medical men of eminence had been quoted by the right hon. Gentleman in support of his views; but the saying, "There is nothing like leather," might be applicable to the medical as well as to other professions. He thought that the right hon. Gentleman had overlooked the great sanitary improvements which had taken place in their towns and cities, and, for his own part, he would rather see that system of sanitary improvement completed. He would rather see the cause of disease removed than a remedy provided, which, after all, was of extremely doubtful effect, and he thought the suggestion of the hon. Member for Finsbury one of a very reasonable character.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 (Expenses of Prosecutions),

MR. AYRTON said, by the provisions of the clause it was sought to be enacted that a number of officers named should be at liberty to institute a prosecution against offenders under the Bill, and that whatever expenses they incurred, unless a justice certified to the contrary, should be payable out of the poor-rates of the parish in which the offending person resided. The system of legislation thus proposed to be carried into effect he could only characterize as perfectly novel, and he hoped that the Government would consent to amend the clause, by providing that the expenses in question should be allowed if the Judge before whom the prosecution was instituted certified that such ought to be the case. Under the operation of the clause as it stood the prosecutor would naturally not ask the Judge for a certificate at all, and expenses might thus be allowed when they ought not to be given.

MR. LOWE said, he was of opinion that the clause as it stood answered the purpose. As a general rule the party was entitled to indemnity for what he did, and it would be hard to deprive him of that indemnity except upon very strong grounds.

MR. HENLEY remarked that the words of the clause were very wide, and might be construed to go beyond the costs actually incurred in a prosecution. The common rule in cases of the kind was to give the costs if they saw fit. He saw no reason why that rule should be departed from on this occasion. The clause gave no discretion to the magistrates, but only gave them the power of refusing the expenses in a special case—namely, if the proceedings had been improperly instituted. He also could have wished that the Government had taken steps to insure that the lymph employed in vaccination was really good lymph. In his county, the people held a notion that the vaccine matter made use of not only did not protect them from smallpox, but induced other diseases.

MR. LOWE said, that what was desired in that case was not costs, but indemnity.

MR. LOCKE said, he thought that the clause required alteration.

MR. CONINGHAM said, it was a gross and arbitrary infringement of the liberty of the subject to empower the police, as the agent of the Government, to go into private families and insist on the performance of an operation to which some parents might have a strong and, perhaps, well-founded objection. For his own part, he declared that he would not obey the law if there were ten Acts of Parliament.

MR. LOWE expressed his readiness to defer to the wish of the Committee, that the justice should certify that expenses were to be paid, and that he should also fix the amount.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. AYRTON said, he also wished to call attention to the last part of the clause, which provided that the costs were to be paid out of the rates of that particular parish in which the offender happened to live. He thought they should come out of the common fund of the union.

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON said, he was afraid that if the charge were to be placed upon the union, and not upon the parish, the parishioners would take no pains to have the law carried into effect.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, that if the parishioners had no control over the matter, which he believed to be the case, the expenses ought in fairness to be charged upon the common fund of the union.

MR. MITFORD said, he believed the parishioners had an indirect control.

MR. HENLEY asserted, on the contrary, that the control rested entirely with the Board of Guardians. The expenses, therefore, should be paid by the union.

MR. LOWE said, he would remind the Committee that the Bill would be the means of lessening the rates of parishes. It was only fair, therefore, that parishes should pay some of the expenses. The clause as it stood would have the effect of enlisting the parishioners on the side of the law.

MR. KENDALL was persuaded that the Bill would not work at all if the expenses were not laid on the common fund of the Union.

MR. AYRTON said, that the Chinese principle of punishing a man with the view of compelling him to make another obey the law had never been acted upon in this country, and he did not think it would be wise to adopt it now. He proposed the insertion of the following words, "payable out of the common fund of the Union." All the original charges for vaccination were paid out of the common fund, and he saw no reason why an exception should be made in this case.

Amendment proposed,

"In page 2, lines 14 and 15, to leave out the words 'rates for relief of the poor of the parish,' in order to insert the words 'common fund of the union.'"

MR. LOWE said, he was ready to defer to the opinion of the Committee, but it struck him that the clause was better as it stood. By placing the expenses on the parish the advantage would be gained of making it the interest of the parishioners to see the law carried into effect.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought that all the charges for vaccination should go together.

MR. BARROW remarked, that boards of guardians were directed to provide for the vaccination of all children born, not in particular parishes, but in the Union. There could be no question, therefore, as to where the costs should come from.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 70; Noes 44: Majority 26.

On the Question that the clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill,

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he objected to parents being held responsible until their children arrived at the age of twenty-one. There ought to be some limit—three or five years.

MR. LOWE said, he thought that so long as a parent might be considered to have a legitimate control over his child, and to be answerable for its conduct, the law should hold him responsible. He did not become more entitled to consideration because he had neglected his duty for a great number of years.

MR. HASSARD inquired whether the Bill was to extend to Ireland?

MR. LOWE replied in the negative.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3 (Application of Penalties),

MR. HENLEY said, he objected to the proposal to give penalties to informers. He could not conceive a greater curse than such a practice. It had been abandoned in a great many cases; and, in fact, the right hon. Gentleman who had charge of the Bill had admitted the principle, because he had placed the power of laying information in the hands of public officers. Now, public officers ought never to have penalties, but should be remunerated for their time in the ordinary way.

MR. LOWE said, he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman, and would consent to strike out the objectionable words of the clause.

Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

House resumed.

Bill reported, as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

METROPOLIS LOCAL MANAGEMENT ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. TITE said, he rose to move the second reading of this Bill.

MR. LOCKE said, he rose to order. When the Bill was last before the House, he was counted out while speaking on the Motion for the second reading. He submitted, therefore, that the debate was an adjourned debate, and that he was in possession of the House.

MR. SPEAKER: If, as the hon. and learned Gentleman states, the House was counted out, that does not make the debate an adjourned debate.

MR. TITE said, he would then proceed to explain the objects of the Bill, which had received the assent of all the local bodies in the Metropolis, and also of the Select Committee to which it was referred last Session. The Bill was originally introduced at the close of the Session of 1859, it was then printed and circulated; after much discussion and many amendments late in the Session of last year he again introduced it, and it virtually passed this House, nothing remaining but the third reading, when, owing to the lateness of the Session, he was obliged to withdraw it. The Bill he now presented was word for word the Bill of last year, and was principally intended to amend the Act of 1855, by which the Metropolitan Board of Works was established, but it would not give to the Board any new powers. Under the old system of the Commissions of Sewers two large sums were borrowed and spent on the drainage of the Metropolis. The first, amounting to £200,000, was to be repaid in 1865. The second amounted to £142,000. Of that sum £42,000 had been paid off, and the remaining £100,000, as the law now stood, was to be paid in certain proportions by certain parishes in the Metropolitan district. Those proportions were felt to be unequal and unjust, but the proper time for discussing that question would be when Bill No. 2 was brought under the consideration of the House. The Bill before them was also intended to give a remedy against any parish which refused to collect the drainage rates made by the Board. As the law now stood the money required for main drainage, or any large arterial drainage, was to be obtained by sending a precept to the vestries or district boards. The precept was sent by them to their overseers; and if they neglected to obey it the Metropolitan Board had no immediate remedy. The parish of St. George's, Hanover Square, had refused to allow its own collector to get in the drainage rates imposed by the Board, and the Board was put to the trouble of having to send their own collector to get in the rates from that parish. The Metropolitan Board of Works had been charged with neglect of its duties. What were the facts? The Board had seventy miles of drainage to construct, of which forty-five had been commenced. No less a sum than about £500,000 had been expended, and he had the authority of the engineer of the Board for stating that in two years the Metropolis would be relieved from the greater portion of the drainage which now fell into the Thames. Another great work intrusted to them was the making of a new street from the vicinity of the terminus of the South-Eastern Railway to Stamford Street. It was a work of enormous difficulty; but it was now nearly finished; and the street had been constructed with a subway over the sewer so as entirely to obviate the necessity of taking up the pavements. He believed that so extensive a business had never been conducted in so short a time by any public body either in the City of London or in Paris. Besides this, there were other streets they had to make, one in connection with Victoria Park, and another from St. Martin's Lane towards the Strand. These works involved an immense amount of labour, and it could not, therefore, be justly alleged that the Metropolitan Board had neglected their duties. The new offices, which had been called a palace, had cost only £14,000, and were really less expensive in the nett than the alterations which must have been made at Greek Street, and when also there was not sufficient space for the wants of the public. The Bill before the House, as he had said, gave them no new powers; it simply sought to explain and amend the powers they possessed. The provisions were really intended for the benefit of the whole Metropolis, and not to oppress the ratepayers in any particular. He begged to move that the Bill be read a second time.

Mr. LOCKE complained that a Bill of such magnitude, comprising 116 clauses, and involving the interests of 3,000,000 of Her Majesty's subjects, should be brought forward at so late a period of the Session, to be discussed in so thin a House. He would not say it was monstrous as regarded the Metropolis, but as concerned his own constituents it was most inconvenient. Such a measure demanded a full and scrutinizing consideration. The constitution of the Board of Works was eminently vicious, and before they came to that House for extended powers they ought to have reformed their own constitution. They could not enjoy the confidence of the Metropolis unless they were elected directly by the ratepayers. In the Select Committee upon the local taxation of the Metropolis the Chairman of the Board, Mr. Thwaites, had been asked whether he thought any alteration should take place in the mode of electing its members—whether they should not be elected directly by the ratepayers rather than by the vestries, who, in nineteen cases out of twenty, selected their own members to represent them, but he had declined to give any opinion on the subject. Other members, however, were examined, and their opinion decidedly was that the Board would be more efficient, and enjoy greater confidence if directly elected by the ratepayers. Constituted as the Board now was, he had no confidence in it. The Bill as it went before the Select Committee last Session consisted of the two Bills, No. 1 and No. 2; but the Committee had struck out the clauses which now constituted No. 2 Bill; and the hon. Member for Bath, not satisfied with the decision of the Select Committee, had revived those rejected clauses and constituted them into a second Bill. What was called the Rock Loan and other loans by the 118th Section of the Metropolis

Local Management Act, had been settled on the same principle as under the General Sewers Act, the 13 & 14 Vict., certain burdens being imposed on particular parishes; but the Metropolitan Board of Works, actuated by the trumpery spirit of the select vestries from which they sprang, sought unfairly, unjustly, and contrary to the law to double the liabilities of his constituents. That was the real object of No. 2 Bill. He would, therefore, oppose both Bills. The hon. Member for Bath was, in that respect, running directly counter to the decision of the Select Committee of last Session; and the borough of Southwark did not choose to suffer their interests to be compromised by this trick.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

THE MERCANTILE MARINE.

EXPLANATION.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE said, he thought it but due to himself to make an explanation with respect to some remarks which fell from him a few nights ago in the course of a discussion upon the Naval Reserve Force Bill. He had received from the Mercantile Marine Association of Liverpool a letter protesting against an expression used by him, to the effect that the merchant seamen were not true sailors, but that they were merely persons who understood the propulsion of vessels by steam. He would substitute the word "seaman" for "sailor;" but with that qualification he must adhere to his opinion. All men who were engaged in navigation were sailors; but seamen were men who were perfect in their profession as it was understood under the old system. At the time that he made the observations which were complained of their Lordships were discussing a proposition which he had made, that the officers of the Mercantile Marine should undergo an examination before they took charge of Her Majesty's ships. His reason for making that proposition was that the officers obtained from the merchant service would come principally from the vessels of the large steamship companies, which performed long voyages, and in which steam, instead of being as it was in Her Majesty's ships only an auxiliary, was the principal motive power, and they would, therefore, not have so complete a knowledge of the use of masts and sails as would be required for the efficient management of one of Her Majesty's ships. He did not mean to give any offence; on the contrary, he had a high opinion of the officers of the merchant service; but he had commanded a line-of-battle ship, and had had under his command officers who, having served mainly or exclusively in steamships, did not seem to be aware what could be done with a vessel trusting solely to her masts and sails. Moreover, he believed that in the merchant service the ships were completely rigged and fitted before the officers went on board; and, therefore, he felt himself justified in saying that the officers in that service did not obtain so complete a knowledge of practical seamanship as was possessed by the officers of Her Majesty's Navy. He made this statement because, as he had been misunderstood by the public, he might have been misunderstood by some of their Lordships; and in conclusion he begged to say that he entertained great respect for the officers of the Mercantile Marine.

THE TURNER GALLERY—WILL OF MR. TURNER, R.A.

MOTION FOR COPY OF WILL.

LORD ST. LEONARDS said, that owing to the absence, through indisposition, of a noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne) who took a deep interest in the subject, he wished to postpone the Motion of which he had given notice relative to the establishment of a Gallery in which to exhibit the pictures bequeathed to the nation by the late Mr. Turner. As he thought it desirable that their Lordships should have before them the materials by which to form a judgment upon his Resolutions, he begged to move—

“Copies of the Will and Codicils of the late Mr. Turner, R.A., and of the Decree of Vice Chancellor Kindersley, establishing the Right of the Nation to the Pictures of Mr. Turner given by him to the Public and also of the Representations lately made by the Trustees of the National Gallery to the Treasury upon the Subject of Mr. Turner's Gift of his Pictures to the Nation.”

LORD OVERSTONE regretted that it should be found necessary to postpone the discussion, because he thought the matter was one of pressing importance; but he was glad that the noble and learned Lord had moved for the production of further papers. He hoped the subject would receive the careful consideration of their Lordships, for he felt the more the question was looked into the more would it be acknowledged that the present arrangement for the display of these pictures was utterly improper and unsatisfactory, and that their continuance in their present position was inconsistent with good faith to the testamentary directions of the man who had devoted to the use of his country so noble a bequest.

EARL GRANVILLE said, the indisposition of the noble Marquess was one of a merely slight character, and gave no cause for alarm. There would be no objection to the production of the papers now moved for.

After a few words from Lord MONTEAGLE, Motion agreed to.

TRAMWAYS (IRELAND) ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—SECOND READING.

Order of the day for the Second Reading read.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE, in moving the second reading of the Bill, said, its object was to amend an Act passed in the last Session of Parliament, containing so many stringent provisions that the measure had become a perfect nullity. The Act required that parties desirous of making tramways should go twice before the grand jury, then appear before the Board of Works, and afterwards appear before the Lord Lieutenant in Council, and afterwards have an Act of Parliament. These cumbrous formalities were necessarily attended with an amount of expense greatly disproportioned to the advantages to be derived from making the tramways; and the intention of this Bill, therefore, was to render it necessary for the parties to go before the grand jury once only, and to enable the Lord Lieutenant to finally sanction the work. This Bill proposed to repeal a clause which was inserted in the Act of last year, providing that there should be no deviation of more than thirty feet from a highway; but, as it was necessary that a tramway should be carried on the level, that provision rendered the measure valueless wherever a hill or valley occurred. The Bill would afford many advantages, and he, therefore, hoped their Lordships would read it a second time.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^a.

THE EARL OF LUCAN opposed the second reading, considering the provisions of the Bill to be very objectionable. The Bill of last Session was carefully considered by a Select Committee, and the principal clause in it, which empowered any company, with the consent of the grand jury, to pass over any man's estate was rejected without even a division. It was proposed by this Bill to restore that clause, and to restore it without many of the securities which were then offered. He challenged the noble Marquess to name any company which had attempted to carry out works under the Act of last Session. He considered the Bill most objectionable, and, therefore, moved that it be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment moved, to leave out (“now”) and insert (“this Day Six Months.”)

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, that it was found to be absurd to do anything under the Act of last Session, and no one had attempted to carry out works under its provisions. That was the reason why an Amendment of the Act was sought by this Bill, and it was not likely that any works would be sanctioned by the Lord Lieutenant in Council, by the grand jury, and by a jury of assizes, which were open to sound objections. The Bill gave sufficient protection to landowners, and he hoped that at least their Lordships would consent to examine it in Committee.

EARL GRANVILLE thought that as the Bill would confer great advantages it was desirable to give it a second reading, and if, on consideration in Committee any further checks were required, they could be then inserted.

LORD REDESDALE said, that if by the repeal of the clause inserted in the Act of last year it was intended that power should be given to take land not within thirty yards of a highway the result would be that a tramway would be first laid down, and then a short Act obtained to turn it into a locomotive line. Practically, it would allow grand juries instead of Parliament to sanction railways in Ireland; and, without wishing to say more about grand juries than they deserved, he must say they were a body easily influenced to do anything, whether right or wrong. The Act last year was carefully considered by a Select Committee, and before a year's trial had been given this Bill was brought in to alter it. It would be far better to have a longer experience of the Act passed last Session before proceeding further with this Bill.

After a few words from Lord MONTEAGLE and the Earl of WICKLOW,

THE EARL OF DERBY asked the noble Marquess whether he would have any objection to expunge from the Bill in Committee that clause which repealed the 42nd Clause of the Act of last year, and which consequently gave power to take property without the owner's consent beyond the limits assigned by the Bill of last year? If the noble Marquess would give that assurance, he should have no objection to going on with the Bill, and considering the other clauses in Committee; otherwise he should vote for the Amendment.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, he had no objection to give that assurance, on which understanding Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Then the original Motion was agreed to.

Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

POOR ASSESSMENTS (SCOTLAND) BILL. COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to order).

Clause 1 (Means and Substance Mode of Assessment abolished),

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, that on reading the Bill he found that it did not, as he at first supposed was the case, abolish this mode of assessment in every parish throughout Scotland, but exempted parishes in which the rate was levied according to established usage. In several places, therefore, means and substance would still continue to be the mode of assessment; and he, therefore, moved an Amendment extending the operation of the Bill in these cases also.

Amendment moved,

"After ("Ireland") to insert ("and also so much of the Thirty-fifth Section of the said recited Act as makes it lawful for the Parochial Board of any Parish or Parishes to assess such Parish or Parishes according to Local Act or Usage, so far as such Local Act or Usage authorizes the assessment of Means and Substance.")

THE EARL OF EGLINTON opposed the Amendment. Moreover, the Bill was a Money Bill, and if any Amendment were made in it the other House would reject it altogether. Now their Lordships appeared to be agreed upon the principle of the Bill, and against this objectionable mode of assessment on means and substance. A very few parishes, for the most part rural, where the assessment was now made by private arrangement or by local Act of Parliament, would be exempted from the operation of the Bill, and the slight objection taken by the noble Earl on this score would not, he hoped, induce their Lordships to defeat this measure.

VISCOUNT MELVILLE supported the Amendment, on the ground that the Bill was a wrong way of doing a right thing.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL was far from asserting that this House ought to refrain from amending a Bill because it was a Money Bill, if it contained provisions which were seriously objectionable; but, on the other hand, he thought their Lordships ought not to take advantage of an incidental Amendment moved for the mere purpose of defeating such a measure. Greenock was one of the parishes where the assessment was under a local Act, and he did not think it right in such cases to disturb the assessment existing there. The Amendment was objectionable in itself; its avowed object was to defeat the Bill altogether, and he should, therefore, give his Vote against it.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN complained that the noble Duke had the other evening said that the Bill would be read a second time subject to Amendments in Committee; whereas now he was told that to press an Amendment in Committee would be to defeat the Bill altogether. The Bill as it stood at present was partial in its operation, and he could not understand why what was considered fair for Dundee should not be considered equally fair for Greenock. Believing that, with a view to secure uniformity, it was desirable that the Bill should apply to the whole country, he should certainly press his Amendment.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL explained his meaning the other night to be that if any part of the Bill were objectionable in itself their Lordships ought not to be prevented from amending it, but he did not think this was the case here. On the occasion in question he alluded, not to the Amendment of his noble Friend, but to that of a noble Lord now absent from the House, upon a totally different part of the Bill.

THE DUKE OF MONTROSE supported the Amendment, and expressed his surprise that the Bill should omit certain parishes, while its operation was enforced in others.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE said, the Amendment proposed by his noble Friend had been suggested during the progress of the Bill in the other House; but after careful consideration it was thought better that the clause should continue in its present shape.

LORD POLWARTH suggested the postponement of the Bill until next Session, when, he hoped, the whole Poor Law system of Scotland would undergo careful consideration.

Amendment negatived.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN proposed another Amendment: After ("is thereby") to leave out ("repealed"), and insert ("Suspended until the 1st day of October, 1862, and to the end of the then next Session of Parliament"). The effect of the Amendment would be to suspend instead of repealing the rating of stock in trade. According to the English law the power of rating stock-in-trade was suspended and not wholly repealed, and his object was to assimilate the law of the two countries in this respect.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE said, the power of rating stock in trade in England was practically abolished, and thought it not worth while to defeat the Bill altogether for the purpose of carrying out the object which his noble Friend had in view.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL also opposed the Amendment.

On Question, their Lordships divided:—Contents 9; Not Contents 29: Majority 20.

Amendment negatived.

Bill reported, without Amendment; and to be read 3^d on Monday next.

HARBOURS BILL.—COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY said, he had not opposed the second reading of this Bill, but on that occasion he thought it necessary to say a few words on the special injustice with which he thought the town of Whitby was treated. These dues had been levied there for a century and a half, and by an Act of Parliament passed in 1827 they were made perpetual. By the present Bill these dues were abolished without any compensation whatever. He objected to this as a peculiar hardship on the town of Whitby. It had been stated that the harbour of Whitby was useless, but that statement was not consistent with the fact. No doubt that owing to the increased size in the tonnage of ships, some of the harbours referred to in the Act no longer fulfilled the purpose for which they were adapted when the tolls were granted; but as regards Whitby he was enabled to state that within the last six years upwards of 3,000 colliers had taken refuge in that harbour during storms. He did not seek for any special indulgence for Whitby, but he felt it to be his duty towards his neighbours to correct the misrepresentations if it had been made.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, the people of Whitby could not complain of being taken by surprise by the Bill as the subject had been before Parliament for several years. Their Lordships should bear in mind that it was ships passing the harbour that paid these tolls, and not those entering the harbour. In the case of Whitby the levying of these tolls was far more objectionable than in any of the other three harbours referred to in the Bill; for its harbour was dry at low water, and had only twelve feet of water over the bar in ordinary tides, with sixteen or seventeen in spring tides. Whitby was now no longer noted for blubber boiling, but had become a fashionable watering-place, for which purpose it was better adapted than a harbour. He did not think the town had been harshly treated, as sufficient tolls would remain to keep the harbour in repair.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY repeated that he thought Whitby had been treated harshly.

Amendments made; the Report thereof to be received on Monday next, and Bill to be printed as amended. [No. 187.] —

LEICESTER SQUARE.—QUESTION.

LORD REDESDALE inquired, Whether the Attention of the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Works or of the Metropolitan Board of Works has been directed to the manner in which the Garden in Leicester Square, in the City of Westminster, is now and may be hereafter occupied? The noble Lord said he had thought it right to call their Lordships attention to the subject, because some facts had come under his notice in his official capacity which he thought ought to be generally known. Their Lordships would remember that some years ago the centre of this square was a garden—certainly a very neglected one, but still a good open space. About ten years back there arose up in the middle of it a building for the exhibition of what was called "the Great Globe," but no one knew by whose authority. However, very little inquiry was made about it, and the building was erected without any opposition. It was said that the place had become a nuisance, and that it would be greatly improved by what was being done. In 1852 a private Bill was introduced into Parliament entitled "Leicester Square Improvement and Ownership of Square or Garden Bill." It provided for the improvement of Leicester Square, and secured to "James Wyld the unconditional enjoyment of the enclosed garden or area of the said square." It was set forth in the preamble that Mr. Wyld had purchased the fee simple of the ground, and that the same was duly conveyed to him, but that "nevertheless divers persons claimed to be entitled to some right over the same." The Bill provided that Mr. Wyld should have power to maintain or pull down the existing building, and to erect another for a literary institution, or a bazaar, or for other purposes connected with science and art, public instruction, or public amusement. This Bill was introduced, but proceeded no further, and was dropped; but it proved distinctly that Mr. Wyld, whatever limited right of possession he might have acquired, did not possess a right or title to do that which he had done upon the property. Two years afterwards another Bill was introduced, to enable the "Cosmos Institute" to purchase Mr. Wyld's interests in the area of Leicester Square. This Bill in like manner was dropped; but during the present year another Bill was introduced, called the "Leicester Square Gardens Company Bill," enabling the "Owners of Leicester Square Gardens to place them in the hands of Commissioners who should have the power of erecting a museum or other exhibition buildings on the site." This Bill was also withdrawn. These private Bills showed that the parties in the occupation of the centre of Leicester Square felt that they had no title to the property, or at any rate that they were conscious of some defect in their title. It was for the public interest that the square should be cleared, as it was the only open space between Hyde Park and Lincoln's Inn Fields. It was of the utmost importance that where there were open spaces in densely populated neighbourhoods, as was the case of Leicester Square, the enjoyment of them should be secured to the public. The parties resident in the locality were not indifferent to what was going on, for since his notice appeared upon the paper he had received several communications on the subject. He yesterday received a letter signed by what appeared to be a majority of residents in the square, thanking him for having taken up the subject, and mentioning that the encroachments on the enclosure had long been felt to be an injustice by the surrounding inhabitants, and that the state of the building in the centre was a disgrace to the locality. They also expressed a hope that his timely intervention might be the means of restoring the square to its unencumbered state. He understood that some years back the property in question was the subject of litigation in Chancery, and was divided among various claimants. He was unable to give any positive information on the matter, but he had no doubt that the residents were practically, though, perhaps, not with sufficient precision, secured in their right to the enjoyment of the gardens under the original covenant when the houses were built, and that nothing had occurred to deprive them of that right. By one of the clauses of the Metropolis Local Management Act persons were not permitted, without the sanction of the Board, to encroach with buildings upon their own gardens when they were within a short distance of the highway, and there ought certainly to be some means of preserving open spaces, such as these gardens. He did not know what power the Government had of interfering in the matter, but he begged to ask the noble Earl the President of the Council whether the attention of the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Works or of the Metropolitan Board of Works had been directed to the manner in which Leicester Square was now or might be occupied?

EARL GRANVILLE said, that the public were much indebted to the noble Lord for calling attention to this subject, which was really of some importance. He was sure their Lordships must all agree with the noble Lord in holding that it was very desirable that open spaces in the Metropolis should be secured against encroachment and occupation as much as possible. The state of Leicester Square had been for some time under the consideration of the Chief Commissioner of Works; but it had not yet been decided whether the Board could interfere in the matter, or what measures it was necessary to take. He had no doubt, however, that some decision would be arrived at before long.

LORD OVERSTONE said, that as one of the churchwardens of the parish of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, in which two sides of Leicester Square were situated, he had that morning been waited on by his brother churchwarden and several respectable inhabitants of the Square, who had requested him to render any assistance which he could to the noble Lord opposite in regard to this matter. Leicester Square was becoming every day more of a public thoroughfare, and, in addition to the unsightliness of the structure which had been erected in the centre, and the accumulation of everything that was filthy, unseemly, and improper which existed in the enclosure, scenes took place there at a late hour which were most discreditable to the Metropolis, and for the prevention of which it was absolutely necessary that some measures should be adopted.

RAILWAY ACCIDENTS.

QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF WESTMEATH inquired of Her Majesty's Government, in consequence of what had transpired by the recent Verdict of a Coroner's Inquest respecting the Death of an Individual employed upon the North Staffordshire Railway in conducting a Locomotive Engine, and which the Jury found was occasioned by undue Speed, whether it may be in their Contemplation to propose any Amendment of the Law to control the Speed of Railway Engines in future within reasonable Limits?

EARL GRANVILLE said, that it was not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce any such measure as that referred to by the noble Marquess, and they had been strengthened in that determination by the fact that the Committee on Railway Accidents had declined to recommend any direct interference by Parliament as to the extreme speed at which railway trains should be permitted to travel.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON said, that railway accidents often occurred through reckless driving, with a view to make up for lost time. The matter, however, was one with which, under all the circumstances, it was not very easy to deal by legislation.

THE WARRIOR, BLACK PRINCE, &c.

QUESTION.

MR. HORSFALL said, he rose to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether the Admiralty have enforced the penalties against the builders of the Warrior, Black Prince, Resistance, and Defence, amounting to £50,000 each for the Warrior and Black Prince, and £40,000 each for the Resistance and Defence, as stated in the Parliamentary Return ordered by the House of Commons to be printed on the 21st day of June, 1861; and, if they have not yet enforced these penalties, whether it is their intention to do so; and, whether the Admiralty have already given further orders for building iron-cased ships to any of the builders of the above-named vessels; and if they have not, whether it is their intention to do so until the contracts they have in hand are completed?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, in answer to the question of the hon. Member, he had to state that the penalties against the builders of the Warrior, the Black Prince, the Resistance, and the Defence, had not been enforced. The penalties had reference to two distinct things—the one being time, and the other workmanship and material. With regard to time reasons existed why it was not thought advisable that the penalties should be imposed, especially on account of various alterations being necessary, and having by so much retarded the works. But with regard to workmanship and material it was still open to the Admiralty to inflict the whole or any part of the penalties if they should not turn out according to order. With regard to the second part of the question two builders who had already contracts had been employed to build other vessels. Their tenders were low, and the work they had done was satisfactorily performed.

MR. ROBERTS'S IRON TARGETS.

QUESTION.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he wished to inquire, When the Admiralty intend to test the targets constructed by Mr. Roberts at their request?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that Mr. Roberts's target had been reported to be ready, and it was the intention of the Admiralty to give him an opportunity of having it tested. He might state that many gentlemen who had invented improved targets expected that the Admiralty should find the means of testing them immediately they were ready. The fact was that the Admiralty had a vast number of targets brought under their consideration, and he was not able at that time to say when Mr. Roberts's target would be tested.

THE GALWAY SUBSIDY.—QUESTION.

MR. KER said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, as a Select Committee has been appointed, and is now sitting, to inquire into the circumstances attending the termination by the Postmaster General of the Postal Contract with the Royal Atlantic Steam Navigation Company, it can be correctly stated that the subsidy had been withdrawn, and that the Contract will not be renewed, under any circumstances, by Her Majesty's Government?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, as is well known to hon. Members, the Post Office authorities have intimated to the Galway Company that the Contract is at an end. What may be the result of the labours of the Committee which has been appointed to inquire into the circumstances of the case, of course, I am unable to state.

THE ENGLISH AMBASSADOR AT VIENNA.—QUESTION.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If it is true that the English Ambassador at Vienna recommended the Emperor of Austria not to receive the Hungarian Address agreed to by the Diet at Pesth, unless such Address fully recognized his sovereignty and title as King of Hungary; and, if so, whether the British Ambassador was acting under instructions from the Government at home?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he had not seen the report to which his hon. Friend alluded, but he had no hesitation in saying that there was not the slightest foundation for any such report. It was highly improbable that the Austrian Government would ask the advice of any foreign Minister with regard to their internal arrangements. All foreign Ministers accredited to Vienna know too well the habits and feelings of the Austrian Government to intrude their advice without its being asked for.

THE CRIMINAL LAW AND THE BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILLS. QUESTION.

MR. HADFIELD said, he wished to ask Mr. Attorney General, When it was intended to proceed with the Consolidation of the Criminal Law Bill, Offences against the Person Bill, and the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Bill (Lords' Amendments)?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the Offences against the Person Bill stood second in the Orders of the Day for Monday next, and it was proposed to report Progress in Committee of Supply between eleven and twelve o'clock, to give an opportunity of discussing the only clause in the Bill that remained to be considered. It was most important that no delay should take place, inasmuch as the further progress of the other Consolidation Bills in the other House was delayed, in consequence of this Bill not being sent forward. It was the intention of the Government to bring on the discussion of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Bill on Thursday next.

LORD HOTHAM said, he would beg to ask the noble Lord at the head of the Government, Whether he will, as a matter of general convenience to all parties concerned—and to none, perhaps, more than to Her Majesty's Government themselves—give notice beforehand how the Government proposed to deal with the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Bill? The House had just been informed that it was not intended to proceed with it on Monday, but that it was to come on Thursday next. Perhaps the noble Lord, without giving reasons for the course which the Government intend to pursue, will say whether he cannot on Monday give notice of the intentions of the Government with respect to that measure.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: The suggestion of the noble Lord is not unreasonable, and I hope by Monday I shall be able to state to the House the manner in which we shall propose to deal with the main Amendment.

EDUCATION COMMISSION.

OBSERVATIONS.

Order for Committee (Supply) read;

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he rose to call the attention of the House to the Report of the Education Commission. He was quite aware of the value of the time of the House in the existing state of public business; and, therefore, he did not now intend to enter into any extended argument on the subject to which he wished to direct attention. But, considering the important Report which had been laid upon the table by the Education Commissioners, considering the great ability of that Report, considering the interesting and comprehensive nature of its contents, considering also that that Report bore upon questions which he had felt it his duty, in the course of the last few years, on more than one occasion to bring before the House, he hoped hon. Members would not consider him unduly intruding on their time if he requested permission to draw their attention to some portions of that Report, and to the considerations which the Report suggested on the subject of the present system of the education of the poor in England. He wished, in the first instance, to remind the House of the circumstances that led to the appointment of the Commission. It would be recollected that for several years, extending from 1853 to 1858, the question of public education excited considerable attention in Parliament and a strong feeling of interest in the country. The first measure on the subject to which he would call attention was one for local objects, but involving at the same time a general principle—he meant the Bill for the extension of education in Manchester and Salford. That Bill proposed an entirely new mode of providing funds for educational purposes, and also a new mode of carrying on religious teaching in schools. The principles laid down in that Bill were deemed so important that it was referred to a Select Committee, and the evidence taken before that Committee constituted the most valuable public document existing on that interesting subject, with the exception of the Report of the Commission which he held in his hand. In 1855 he (Sir John Pakington) himself introduced a Bill by which he proposed an entirely new mode of conducting the public education of the country. The discussion of that Bill occupied a considerable time. The principle which he advocated met with great opposition, and the Bill was not allowed to pass, but the protracted debates to which it gave rise tended to the increase of information on the subject, and to the formation of a strong opinion both in and out of doors. In 1856 the noble Lord, then Secretary of State for the Home Department, submitted a series of Resolutions on the subject of education. Those Resolutions were founded on exactly the same principles on which he had based his Bill the previous year; but they were much opposed in the House, especially by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley), and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carlisle (Sir James Graham), and after a long discussion they were rejected by a large majority. In the following year, 1857, he (Sir John Pakington) introduced a Bill not identical, but involving similar principles with his previous measure; but he was prevented from proceeding with it by a dissolution of Parliament. Those were the circumstances in which the advocates of some alteration in the system of education found themselves at the commencement of 1858; and in the commencement of that year a difference of opinion on both sides of the House was expressed upon the question, whether the present system of education was sufficient for the complete education of the people. Seeing the difficulty of the House of Commons deciding whether any and what changes were desirable, he brought forward a Motion for the appointment of a Commission to inquire into the subject of education. That proposal was resisted. He was told the information he sought was not required; that all the facts

the friends of education could desire could be obtained from the annual reports of the inspectors employed by the Privy Council. He was told that all was going on well; that there was no need of a change; that the progress of education in England was greater during the present century than it had ever been in any other country during the same period of time; that the friends of education had only to rest content with the law as it stood, and that in time every reasonable requirement of the country in respect to education would be provided. The reasons assigned by the noble Lord opposite (Lord John Russell) and himself to prove the necessity for legislation, or to inquiry with a view to legislation, were— Firstly, that, notwithstanding the Privy Council system, large masses of the people of this country were in a state of the most deplorable ignorance. They next urged that large districts of the country were supplied either with very inefficient schools or with no schools at all. They urged, thirdly, the early age at which the children left school, thereby preventing them from receiving the full benefit of the instruction. They urged, fourthly, that which they were now also strongly prepared to recommend, and which he was glad to find had been taken up in the last Report—namely, the indispensable necessity for some local agency in aid of the central educational establishment. Fifthly and lastly, they urged the impossibility of the system now administered by the Privy Council ever becoming so extended as to meet the requirements of the country. Those opinions were warmly combated, and by none more than by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Henley); but on a division on which his Motion was carried the Education Commission was appointed which had lately reported. One circumstance gave the Report of the Commission peculiar weight and an unusual title to respect. His Motion was made under the Administration of the noble Viscount opposite (Lord Palmerston). It happened, however, that within a few days after that Motion was carried a change of Government took place, and the Earl of Derby's Government came into office. It, therefore, devolved upon the Government of the Earl of Derby to nominate and appoint the members of the Committee. He was sorry to say that no one more strongly dissented from the views he expressed than his right hon. Friend the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley). They were both Members of the Government of the Earl of Derby, and, as it devolved upon the Marquess of Salisbury, as President of the Privy Council, to nominate that Committee, he came to the resolution to consult neither his right hon. Friend nor himself, but to take upon himself the responsibility of nominating the members of that Commission without communication with either of them. That was, he thought, a wise discretion on the part of the Marquess of Salisbury; and thus it happened that, although he was a Member of the Government by which the Commission was appointed, he had no more voice in the nomination of the Commission than any other Member of that House. He was, therefore, free to confess that the Marquess of Salisbury had exercised the soundest possible judgment in the selection of persons to be members of that Commission, and above all in the choice of the noble Duke (the Duke of Newcastle) who filled the dignified and responsible duty of Chairman of the Commission. That noble Duke was a statesman who held no extreme views on the subject of education, and was well entitled by his ability, and by his freedom from bias or prejudice, to enter upon such an inquiry in the best possible spirit, and to conduct it in the calm and dispassionate temper which he was bound to say characterized every line of that Report. The noble Duke and every gentleman upon the Commission were entitled to the gratitude of the country for the manner in which that difficult duty was discharged; nor had there ever been laid on the table any document upon the question so well qualified to give increased information or to lead to a sound and safe conclusion as the Report of the Commissioners. It was, of course, satisfactory to him to find that every one of the five grounds that had induced the noble Lord opposite and himself to urge some change in our educational system had been fully and completely confirmed by the Report of the Education Commissioners. He would more particularly refer to the doubts he had expressed in regard to the Privy Council system ever being so far extended as to meet the requirements of the country, and the necessity of some local agency for supplementing the present system. The Commissioners stated their gratification at the advance which had taken place in the proportion of children actually at school. The earliest Report on that subject gave the number of children at school as 1 in 17 of the population. The next return, in 1833, gave the number as 1 in 11. It was now stated by the Commissioners to have risen to 1 in 7 and a fraction. That was as high a proportion as almost any country in Europe could show at the present time. Perhaps Switzerland might be rather higher; but it was impossible to deny that it was a very satisfactory proportion of the population at school. The Commissioners, however, went on to remark that a very delusive estimate of the state of education must result from exclusive attention to the mere amount of numbers at school. In the first place, there were schools that were too poor to comply with the conditions required, and thus assistance was withheld in those districts where there was the greatest need of it. From poverty and from other causes it appeared that there were schools in which 573,000 children were educated that did not share in the national grant, and though it might be assumed that the unassisted schools were, to some extent, stimulated by the improvements effected and the higher standard set by the assisted, yet the Commissioners held that this system did not effect, and was not adapted to effect, the diffusion of a sound system of education among all classes of the country. He hoped that that last sentence would not escape attention, because it was impossible to have a more distinct assurance that the present system was not adapted to effect that diffusion of education which was desirable. Then the Commissioners referred to another subject, the importance of which no one could deny—namely, the nature of the teaching given even in the inspected schools. On that subject they stated that they had received with respect to inspected schools overwhelming evidence from the inspectors, proving that not one-fourth of the children received good education; that the education given was too ambitious, and too superficial in its character, and that, except in the best schools, it was too exclusively adapted to the elder scholars to the neglect of the young. The next subject to which he should advert was the absolute necessity of local superintendence and care, without which he did not believe that they should ever have an effective system of education. The Commissioners said that the want of local interest and support was a leading defect in the present system, and would render its permanent establishment throughout the country a very questionable benefit. Here was a distinct admission on the part of the Commissioners of the principle for which he and others had all along contended, that local aid and superintendence were indispensable, and that they were entirely wanting under the present system; so that even its extension over the whole country would be a very questionable benefit. The Commissioners stated further that it was a fallacy to say that the present system helped those who helped themselves, for the poor could not help themselves in districts where the rich would not help them; and that if it should be urged, in spite of these disadvantages, the system would work its way through the country, they contended that its progress would be slow; and that, if it should be successful, it would be unwise and unjust to establish it permanently as a national system, because it was mainly supported by excessive individual sacrifices on the part of the clergy. In that paragraph reference was made, among other things, to the amount of cost which, under the present system, the clergy were obliged to bear in order to enable the system, such as it was, to be carried on at all; and he could not help reminding the House of the language which had recently fallen from the lips of the noble Duke who acted as the Chairman of the Commission, and who declared that the reason why the Commission were compelled to recommend some resort to a system of rating was because this so-called National System was by no means national in extent, large districts being left unprovided for, and the schools not receiving aid being more numerous than those receiving aid. He would for a moment refer to a remarkable illustration given in the Report of the undue share of the cost of the system which was cast on the clergy. Mr. Fraser, the assistant-commissioner, endeavoured to obtain some information as to the sources from which the voluntary subscriptions towards the expenses of the system came. He selected a district with 168 schools, and it appeared that 169 clergymen contributed £1,782, or £10 10s. each; 399 landowners contributed £2,127, or £5 6s. each; 217 occupiers contributed £200, or 18s. 6d. each; 102 householders contributed £181, or £1 15s. 6d. each; 141 other persons contributed £228. It, therefore, appeared that the clergymen contributed eleven times as much as the farmer, six times as much as the householder, and, though with probably not half his income, twice as much as the squire. That afforded a most honourable proof of the immense exertions made by the clergy of the Established Church in order to support the present system of education, and he firmly believed that if it were not for their disproportioned exertions it would be impossible for the existing system to be even so effectual as it was. In one other passage from the concluding part of the Report the Commissioners gave a summary of their recommendations, with the view of correcting what they considered the evils of the present system, and they said that they proposed to combine with the existing system a local system, which would enable schools in the country to participate in the benefit of pecuniary aid. The House could not fail to perceive that there was not in those statements a single word which was not in the closest accordance with that which he and the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary on former occasions had ventured to urge on the subject. He, and those who advocated the same views, had never denied the merits of the present system. It would, indeed, be absurd to contend that all the machinery of a Government department, a body of sixty inspectors, and an annual grant of £800,000, all brought to bear upon the encouragement of education throughout the country, could be in operation for upwards of twenty years without having produced important effects and done great good. He thought, however, that he had succeeded in showing the House, by evidence drawn from the most impartial quarter, that, whatever might be the merits of the existing system, it was not adapted to the complete education of the people, or to the diffusion of the means of education to the widest possible extent. The very word which he himself had used in the course of the speech to which he had already referred was that we stood in need of a "supplementary" system; and the adoption of such a system had, he found, been recommended by the Commissioners. They, it was true, suggested that recourse should be had to a county rate, whereas he, on more than one occasion, had expressed himself in favour of a parochial rate. Which of the two it was most desirable to adopt he should not at that moment stop to discuss; suffice it to say, that the principle involved was the same—local inspection and control, and the assistance of local funds.

He would next advert to the position in which the grant stood which was annually made for the support of the existing system. Those who doubted the efficiency of that system had always predicted that the expense of its maintenance would become larger than the House of Commons would be disposed to bear, and too large for the purposes of adequate control and management. That prediction had already been fulfilled, even sooner than he had expected; for, beginning with the year 1839, he found that while the sum granted in that year was only £30,000 it had progressively increased until, in the year 1859, it had reached the large sum of £836,000. From that time that which he and others had foreseen would be the result of the distrust of local action, and the adherence to the principle of centralization, had come about. When the present Government came into office the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the first time proposed that the fund provided by the State should not be increased, and he was sorry to say it had since been considerably reduced, although the population of the country was increasing and the educational necessities were not diminished. For the last two years the Vote had been reduced. He was aware that the sum proposed for the present year was above that of last year, but it was less by £30,000 or £40,000 than the sum voted for 1859. This reduction was not accidental; it arose out of the systematic determination of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to reduce the amount even for educational purposes. Of this they had several proofs. One was that the grant for buildings was placed on a reduced scale. In the next place, notice had been given that those schools known as refuges, which dealt with the most destitute class in the country, and rendered the most valuable aid in rescuing from ruin the thousands of poor children who swarmed in our towns, must not, after the close of the current year, expect to obtain the assistance which they had hitherto received. In his humble opinion no economy could be more unwise or injudicious than that. Then the decrease in the Vote for reformatories he found to be £8,200, and that, too, he could not help regarding as a most unfortunate retrenchment, looking upon it even merely as a question of pounds, shillings, and pence, and the economy which was to be attained by the saving of those children to whom he adverted from crime. Now, he might just observe, while dealing with that part of the subject, that although an appeal he had made to the Government for an increase to these schools was sternly refused by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the House was that evening to be asked to vote, under the head of national education, a sum of £100,000 for the cultivation and improvement of science and art. To the granting of public money for that purpose he had no objection, but then he was opposed to the Vote being accompanied by a virtual declaration that we could no longer afford the necessary amount for the instruction of those among our fellow-countrymen who were too poor to educate themselves. In order to illustrate his meaning, and to show how the present system worked, he might mention a case which came within his own knowledge. Under the superintendence of the department of science and art, examinations were held in various parts of the country, and one took place in December last in Brighton, where it happened that his youngest son was at school at the time. Having a considerable taste for drawing the boy determined to become a competitor at an examination in that accomplishment, under the auspices of the department to which he was referring, and had the good fortune to obtain a prize, a first cousin of his, who also competed, being then equally lucky. Now, those prizes were paid for out of the grant given by that House. He was very glad, of course, that his son should be successful, but he could not understand with what consistency Parliament could vote a large sum of money for prizes which might be competed for by the sons of Members of that House when it appeared from the Report on the table that there were 15,000 schools in England languishing for want of funds, and unable to give to the poor that elementary training of which they stood so much in need, and when, at the same time, it was said that no aid whatever could be given to the most destitute and most helpless class of all—namely, these Arabs of our great towns who were educated in ragged schools. He would not detain the House further than to say that he held the Report of the Commissioners to be most important, as bearing upon the business in which the House was about to engage—making the annual grant for education. He believed he was now justified in saying, with a degree of confidence, greater than that with which he had ever said it before, that whatever might be the merits of the existing system—and he, for one, had never denied them—it was impossible to expect that the educational requirements of England could be adequately met by that system alone. The able Report of the Commissioners, for which the country could not be too grateful, had proved to demonstration that the system under which education was now superintended should be enlarged. He had given notice that he would address an inquiry to the Government upon this subject, but he wished to state that he had no desire to press the Government to announce any definite decision; on the contrary, he should be sorry if they were to do so. He had often urged the importance of the subject, but he had never denied its difficulty. The Report of the Commissioners was a very voluminous and a very complicated document; the evidence by which it was sustained was still more voluminous; and he thought it would be most unreasonable to expect that any Government could, in the few months which had elapsed since the Report was presented—and those months occupied by the incessant business of a Parliamentary Session—have made up their minds as to the precise course which they ought to pursue. He thought, however, it was not unreasonable to ask the Government to tell the House whether they would seriously consider the contents of the Report with a view to legislation at no distant date. The circumstances of the present moment were peculiarly favourable. In the first place the noble Lord the Member for the City of London, who had long been a consistent and warm Friend of education, and whose views were in entire harmony with those of the Commissioners, was now a Member of the Government. The noble Duke who presided over the Commission had also a seat in the Cabinet. Circumstances, therefore, were most favourable, and made him sanguine that the Government would approach the consideration of the Report with an earnest desire to found upon it some measure which might supply those deficiencies in the present system which could hardly be disputed or denied. Every one who had perused the Report must have observed the fairness with which it was compiled, the research by which it was characterized, and the great ability with which the whole investigation had evidently been conducted, and it was impossible to refuse assent to conclusions which had been arrived at after long, careful, and impartial inquiry, and which were stated in a tone at once temperate and judicious. He hoped, therefore, that he should receive from the Government an assurance that they were aware of the deep importance of the Report; that, although the House could not now expect from them any detailed information as to the precise character of the measure which they might deem it their duty to prepare, the subject dealt with in the Report would receive their serious attention, and that at no distant day—he hoped in the next Session of Parliament—they would be ready to propose such legislation as after mature deliberation they might think the case required.

MR. HENLEY said, he cordially joined with his right hon. Friend in advising the Government to give the long and able Report of the Commissioners their most serious consideration during the recess. He was willing to believe that no one would be more satisfied than he would be with the mode in which, in all human probability, the Government would deal with that Report. At the same time he was not surprised that his right hon. Friend should have congratulated himself upon some of the contents of the Report. There was much in the Report which seemed to give some sanction to the opinions which his right hon. Friend had often and strongly expressed in that House and elsewhere, and which, unfortunately, appeared to give still stronger sanction to a system which had many staunch supporters in the country, and to which his right hon. Friend himself was almost a consenting party in his second Education Bill—the system, namely, of secular education. His right hon. Friend had read to the House a passage in which he said the recommendations of the Commissioners were identical in principle with his own. What were those recommendations? The Commissioners discussed the merits of what was known as the Manchester School Bill, and, after bestowing some praise upon those by whom that measure was framed, they stated that it failed partly because the ratepayers would not accept the burden which it imposed, and partly because it appeared to endanger the religious character of the teaching. Precisely the same objections were urged against the three Bills of 1855, including the two brought forward by his right hon. Friend himself. The Commissioners did not give any opinion one way or the other; but after expressing their approval of one of the leading principles upon which those measures were founded—namely, that of calling forth local action, as essentially requisite in any national system—they added the following proviso:—

“But even this advantage would be dearly bought if it produced a negligent management, or injured the religious character of the schools.”

He thought the gratification of his right hon. Friend should be somewhat qualified by that observation of the Commissioners. His right hon. Friend expressed the opinion that what he was pleased to call the enormous expense of the existing system should be supplemented in some way or other. So said the Commissioners; but what was the wonderful addition which the Commissioners proposed to make to the present system? It was the most curious addition which had ever been suggested, and might as well be done by the Privy Council as by Parliament itself. All that was wanted was a little more money. The plan was simply to pay so much a head for every child who could read and write. Such was the great supplemental scheme of the Commissioners and his right hon. Friend. The inquiries were to be conducted by the county boards and by certain local examiners consisting of schoolmasters, and every child who came up, he supposed, to a certain mark in reading and writing was to get 21s. or 22s. out of the county rates. If that wonderful discovery was to convert the present system from an absolute failure into a perfect plan of national education, making good all its deficiencies, why could it not be acted upon at once? The Privy Council could do all that was wanted just as well as if the money were to be taken out of the county rates. He suspected that they had discovered a mare's nest, if he might use the expression. If that was a right principle the Privy Council could carry it out as well as the counties, and a great deal better. The Report of the Commissioners was a very remarkable one in many respects. It was clear from their own statements that there was great division of opinion among them. On the most important points they seemed to be equally divided. The Report on every subject gave balanced opinions, so that hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House might, if so disposed, quote from it passages in support of the most contradictory views. The Commissioners themselves spoke of the advantages of the existing system. They said they thought the existing plan was the only one by which it would be possible to secure the religious character of popular education. That was something in favour of the system on which, to say the least of it, his right hon. Friend had tried to throw cold water. They said it was unnecessary for them to enter on any proof of that assertion; it was enough for their purpose to say that there was strong evidence that it was the deliberate opinion of the people of the country that religious education was desirable. The Commissioners next said that their inquiries had impressed them with the conviction that no other system was practicable in the present state of religious feeling. He begged the House to observe that form of words "the present state of religious feeling," because it was quite clear, from other matters to which he would call attention, that the Commissioners at all events thought it possible there might be considerable change attempted in that respect. The Commissioners said—

"Not only does it seem certain to us that the members of all religious bodies would be dissatisfied with any change, but the fact that religious education had been working with success on the basis of the present system during the last twenty years, has given such a position to that principle that any attempt to dislodge it would give a dangerous shock to the principle of religious education."

The next point was to see on what conditions the Commissioners judged that public assistance should be given to schools. He confessed he was rather surprised to hear his right hon. Friend throw it out as a matter of reproach that there were 15,000 schools in this country educating something like 1,200,000 or 1,300,000 children without touching a farthing of public money. He could not understand why people should not educate themselves and their neighbours if they thought fit. Why should they take public money if they could do without it? He had always been an advocate for assisting people that could not do without that assistance, but he was at a loss to understand why it should be made matter of reproach that a great number of schools were trying to educate the larger number of the people, and did not come to that House for a farthing of public money to help them. His right hon. Friend said, "See how everything I have been wanting is coming about." Six or seven years ago his right hon. Friend was utterly dissatisfied with the number of children educated. Now he confessed himself satisfied on that point.

He had got the numbers; but he could not be satisfied without some further change to improve the quality. Now, his firm opinion was that, long before his right hon. Friend got the change, the quality would improve itself. That was the course of the English people. Show them a road, let them alone, and they would arrive at the end of it without any Royal road or State interference. Now, as to the recommendations of the Commissioners—on which his right hon. Friend recommended the Government to legislate—the House would find that not one single word was said about religious teaching. It was not mentioned as any part of their scheme. Public assistance was to be given on these conditions—that schools were properly drained and ventilated; that they should afford accommodation of at least eight square feet for every child; that they should be open to inspection and that they should not be unfavourably reported on. Bearing in mind what the Commissioners had said of the existing system in regard to religious teaching—bearing in mind that the existing system dealt with something like 1,000,000 children, and that between 1,200,000 and 1,300,000 children were being educated outside of this system, what did the Commissioners recommend? Let him go through the different grades. The Commissioners began, as might be expected, with infant schools, which they defined for children about seven years of age. They said the infants were not to be examined at all; but 20s. a head was to be paid for each. In the day schools, 22s. 6d. was to be paid for every child who had attended 140 days, and passed an examination in reading, writing, and arithmetic; girls being examined in plain work. Then came the Privy Council grants, which were to be 5s. 6d., 4s. 6d., and 2s. 6d. a head, according as the children were taught by certificated or uncertificated masters, or by pupil teachers, at the rate of thirty children to each pupil teacher. Not a single word was said of the necessity of any religious teaching—they might all be Manchester or secular schools for anything the Commissioners said. Was that all? The Commissioners gave them some insight as to how they thought education was to go on in these schools. They said—

"The differences of religious belief could hardly arise in respect of such infant schools as formed independent establishments. It is scarcely conceivable that the instruction of children under seven years of age should ever be dogmatic."

Now, this was a very serious opinion to be put forward by gentlemen of such high standing and character. What was dogmatic teaching? Was the Belief dogmatic? Did the Commissioners mean that the children were not to learn the Belief till after they were seven years of age? Were not the Ten Commandments dogmatic, and were not the children to be taught God's law till after they were seven years of age? If they were taught nothing dogmatic before seven and had to quit school between ten and eleven they would not have much time to learn. With regard to inspection, the Commissioners were evenly divided, though the majority thought that the rule should be uniform, and that inquiries should be confined in all cases to secular instruction. They went on to represent that, in the opinion of the minority,

"To separate the inspection from the religious teaching would, under present circumstances, be attended with serious evils, and would tend to injure the religious teaching of the schools."

If such were their opinion, why did they not recommend that things should remain as at present? Was he presumptuous in addressing those observations to the House? Since the publication of the Report, two important societies met, and they were far from remaining silent on the matter. Of one of these associations he did not know the exact title, but in a printed paper which had been largely circulated it was called — "The Committee appointed to watch proceedings in Parliament with reference to grants for National Education." It was no light-body, for it included the names of the Duke of Marlborough, Chairman; Mr. Colquhoun, Deputy-Chairman; the Earl of Shaftesbury, the Bishop of Durham, the Bishop of Lichfield, the Venerable Archdeacon Sinclair, the Rev. Mr. Burgess, the Rev. J. Scott, Principal of the Wesleyan Training Institution; Mr. Hanbury, M.P., Mr. Horsfall, M.P., Mr. Long, M.P., Mr. Puller, M.P., Mr. Ker Seymour, M.P., Mr. Martin, and Mr. Reynolds. Consisting, as it did, of men of all sides and of all views, it was not an unimportant body, and the gentlemen of whom it was composed publicly declared that, in their opinion, if the recommendations contained in the Report of the Commissioners were carried out they would be destructive of the present system. The Commissioners admitted that in the opinion of the great body of the population religion and education must be closely connected; but the Committee declared that—

"The Commissioners propose to make a radical change in that system, which by making the future education of the country in a great degree dependent on the county and borough rates, dispensed by the county board, would prepare the way for bringing the schools at no distant period under the control of the ratepayers, and thus speedily extinguish the religious element altogether."

His right hon. Friend had felt that the religious difficulty thus created would be insuperable, but the Commissioners got rid of the question by ignoring it altogether. The old National Society had likewise met, and in the concluding part of their Report they said, "they feel bound to state that in parts of the recommendations of the Commissioners they see grave danger to the maintenance of religious teaching in schools." It should be recollected that those bodies were composed of grave men, who were not apt to commit themselves to hasty opinions; that many of the Bishops were present when those expressions were adopted at the meeting of the National Society without dissent or difference of opinion; and, therefore, he could not be blamed for directing attention in a similar spirit to the recommendations of the Commissioners. His right hon. Friend had alluded to the very great share borne by the clergy in the education of the country, and his observations in that respect were perfectly just, but though it was right to give the clergy their due, it was not right to run the luty down by making unjust statements respecting them. His right hon. Friend stood godfather to a statement which ought to have been a little more considered before the Commissioners came to a conclusion upon it, and they seemed to have done so in general terms. The Commissioners, in order to obtain information, very properly selected certain unions in one or two counties; but deductions which were sound with regard to a particular area might be perfectly unsound if widely extended to the whole country, and, in his opinion, calculations affecting the whole of England could not safely be based on evidence drawn merely from 178 parishes. He fancied that he traced a little animus in that part of the Report of the Commissioners which his right hon. Friend said condemned the landlords. The Commissioners did not speak of landlords but of "landowners," and they assumed that an assessment of £508,000, to which they added an arbitrary sum of one-third, bringing the total amount up to £850,000, was the landowners income. Why they made no deductions for the house property in towns or for the tithes, he was at a loss to understand. But in estimating the means of landowners, as they were called, it seemed to him but reasonable also to remember that, generally speaking, there were such things as mortgages, and outgoings of various kinds, which must be taken into account as somewhat reducing that arbitrary gross estimated income. It was impossible for any one to close his eyes to the great pecuniary sacrifices which the clergy made in maintaining the schools; but it would have been quite possible for the Commissioners to give them the full credit to which they were entitled without building up a case, which he believed to be exaggerated, against the landowners. He would ask the Government to consider, but certainly he warned them that if they legislated in the direction of the Commissioners' Report, they would not have a very easy task, for they would find rocks ahead.

In the first place, it appeared that they paid £500,000 for the instruction of the 900,000 children in what were called the assisted schools. That was the amount paid to schoolmasters and teachers in capitation grants; yet the Commissioners stated that there was overwhelming evidence that not more than one-fourth of the whole 900,000 children received a good education. That, considering the amount paid, was not very satisfactory. The Commissioners further stated that they were obliged to come to the conclusion that the instruction given was commonly too ambitious. They then went on to say that it was superficial in its character, and had been too exclusively adapted to the elder, to the neglect of the younger children. Their conclusion was this—that “the children do not, in fact, receive the kind of education which they require.” That was a most important matter. If the system was as defective as the Commissioners described it became a pure matter for the right hon. Gentleman the Vice-President of the Committee of Council to declare “Aye” or “No” whether the Government did or did not approve of it. The Committee alluded to the difficulty of keeping children in those schools up beyond the age of ten or eleven years, and then asked whether it was not possible to give them a good education prior to that age—one such as was absolutely necessary for the minds of common men, and such as would form an invaluable substratum for later teaching. They went on pointing out the insufficiency of what was now being done, and said still that the system was a bad one because it wanted something. If the Committee of the Privy Council believed that the Commissioners were justified from their small examinations in drawing general conclusions, it was in their power to rectify much of what they complained of by means of their own examinations. The Commissioners observed that the children remained long enough to read, write, and cipher; but they followed up that with the remark that a large proportion of them neither wrote well nor read well. Then followed the remark that trained teachers often neglected an important part of their duty. Four or five or more years ago, when he quitted the Privy Council, Canon Moseley reported, that unless the children could be kept longer at school that the masters were too high, and that if we could not keep children at school beyond ten or eleven years of age we ought to have an humbler class of teachers. There was another report which was wholly conflicting and contradictory. He held in his hand a Report of the Inspectors of the Committee of Council; and it and the Report of the Commissioners were as conflicting as light with darkness. The inspectors stated, with reference to catechism teaching, that out of 5,647 of the schools inspected for that class of instruction, 5,112 were deserving of being placed in the column headed “excellently, well, or fairly.” Then came their report on schools inspected for “reading.” The whole number was 7,500, out of which 6,679 were reported in the column “excellently, well, or fairly.” In both these cases there was a most distinct difference from the Report of the Commissioners. It was for the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Committee to tell the House who were right—the Commissioners or the inspectors. Then came writing. It appeared they were better at writing than reading, for 6,782 good reports were given under that head out of 7,186 schools inspected, and there was also a good account given of the progress made in arithmetic, for out of 7,469 schools 6,235 were reported as good. Looking at the Report of the Commissioners one would not suppose that these children who were so bad at reading could have made much progress in grammar; but curiously enough grammar was one of the points on which the Privy Council Report was favourable. Out of 5,800 cases which had been inspected 4,300 were marked "excellently well," and "very well." Now, he was unable to reconcile that statement with the facts mentioned in the Report of the Commissioners. He wished to know the truth upon these matters, whether, as stated by the Commissioners, we were only getting a fourth part of the 900,000 children in the schools taught, or whether the glowing language of the Privy Council Report was throwing dust into the eyes of the community, and leading them to believe that a better state of things existed with regard to education than actually did? He thought the Privy Council should turn their attention to the matter during the recess, and see if it would not be better to teach the children to read, write, and cipher, and let alone some of the higher matters to which their attention was turned. They might also give something like a fair statement of what the children were actually doing. The Commissioners made one very curious recommendation to which he could not help calling the attention of the House. Speaking of the training schools, they said there was one omission—and a curious one it was—which had left on their minds a painful impression. We had always been taught that cleanliness was next to godliness, but the Commissioners had discovered that the very first thing next to godliness was political economy. It was, in their estimation, a most important thing that these children of ten and eleven years of age should be taught political economy, and it was a capital defect in the training masters that they did not teach political economy, and, next to that, sanitary science. His right hon. Friend opposite was at the head of education and of sanitary science also, and he would have ample time during the recess to inoculate, not to vaccinate, the training masters with political economy and sanitary science. The Report said—

"The omission of one subject from the syllabus has left on our minds a painful impression. Next to religion the knowledge most important to a labouring man is that of the causes which regulate the amount of his wages, the hours of his work, the regularity of his employment, and the price of what he consumes."

The marginal note was "Omission of political economy." One of the Commissioners, he believed, was formerly a professor of political economy, though how much that had to do with the recommendation in the Report he was unable to say. There was, however, one short sentence in the Report of the Commissioners which, if all the rest were done away with would entitle them to the thanks of the country, and that was, their description of what a schoolmaster ought to be, and what he ought not to be. That passage bore pointedly on the great object they were aiming at—the training of men qualified to teach the children of this country. They said:—

"The occupation of an elementary schoolmaster is not well suited to a young man of an adventurous, stirring, or ambitious character, and it is rather a misfortune than otherwise when persons of that temper of mind are led into it by the prospect which its earlier stages appear to afford of rising in the world socially as well as intellectually. It is a life which requires a quiet, even temper, patience, sympathy, fondness for children, and habitual cheerfulness."

A more beautiful description of what was necessary in a man whose duty it was to instruct children was, he believed, to be met with nowhere. But the Report proceeded—

"It wants rather good sense and great intelligence than a very inquisitive mind or very brilliant talents, and the prospects which it affords appear well calculated to attract the class of persons best fitted for it."

In reference to that, however, he thought the right hon. Gentleman the Vice-President of the Board of Education would excuse him if he asked him, and asked the House, whether the means practised for raising up schoolmasters were likely to secure men that would come within the first or last of these descriptions? They took the quickest child in a school, one possessing the greatest energy, and forced him up by artificial means in what he might call a kind of hotbed. When the boy went into the training school, the same process of forcing was continued. The Commissioners used the word "crammed." He did not wish to employ strong language; but it was impossible to read their valuable Report—valuable taken as a whole though he differed from their conclusions—without seeing that it was almost demonstrated that the system of training pursued would not produce the class of persons who were best calculated to teach the humbler branches of education. These humble branches, the Commissioners said, were the principal things to be taught; but in every page of the Report they found it stated that the teachers preferred employing themselves in the higher classes, and that the grinding work of teaching reading and writing to the small children was positively distasteful to men whose minds and intellects had been sharpened up to a high standard. The article they produced was higher than was wanted, but if these training schools produced teachers that would suit the 15,000 schools that required elementary education, depend upon it it would not be necessary to come to that House for £100,000 for training schools. If, however, these institutions would have Oxford and Cambridge men at the head of them; if they would train men by examination papers of so high a character that half the Members of that House would turn their backs upon them; and if such men were to teach children of ten or eleven years of age, it behoved those who had the charge of this grant to look more closely into this matter, and tell the House next year how far they agreed, and how far they disagreed, with the statements of the Commissioners. It would be well also if they would tell the House whether they thought that the addition of political economy and sanitary science would make these learned masters buckle down to the difficult and distasteful task of teaching these young children to read and write. Whether the forcing system for pupil teachers would produce these men of cheerfulness, of fondness for children, and of patient mind was a matter in regard to which he had no experience that would enable him to give an opinion. He merely stated these things. He had looked very closely through the Report, and had read every page of it; and the evidence which the Commissioners took did not bring him quite to the same conclusion that they had drawn. He was only sorry to have occupied so much of the time of the House. But a strong appeal having been made by the recommendations of Commissioners to the Government to act in the direction indicated, he could not help rising to offer his opinion.

MR. LOWE said, he would suggest that the House should go into Committee, when in one address, he could make his statement and answer the remarks of the two right hon. Gentlemen who had spoken.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

House in Committee.

MR. MASSEY in the Chair.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

Mr. Henley

MR. LOWE: Sir, the Estimate for this year was necessarily forwarded to the Treasury before the Report of the Commissioners was received, and the consequence is that there will be found no trace of any opinion or any measure which the Government might have adopted in consequence of that Report. The Estimate is of a very ordinary character, being only £5,000 in excess of the Estimate of last year. I will first, with the permission of the Committee, confine myself to a very short statement of the contents of the Estimate, and I will then pass on to those topics raised by the right hon. Gentleman, which are of such great and overwhelming interest. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Droitwich has stated that the Estimates of this department reached on one occasion the sum of £836,000. That was an error in fact, although I attach no blame to the right hon. Gentleman for falling into it. The Estimate to which he referred was that of 1859-60, which was the first that I had the honour of moving. That Estimate was increased by the deficiency of three former years, amounting to £75,000. The real Estimate of that year was £761,000. In that year the number of children found in schools under inspection was £821,000. In 1860-1 the number of children was increased to 880,000—that is, an increase in round numbers of 60,000, and the Estimate was £798,000, an increase of £37,000. In the present year the Estimate is £803,000, and the number of children 962,000. I trust, considering what we have heard of the vast increase of these Estimates, the Committee will not consider this an unsatisfactory Estimate. Within the three years during which I have moved these Estimates the number of children has increased by 141,000, while the Estimate has only increased by £42,000. Considering that during the three or four preceding years the increase in these Estimates was at the rate of £100,000 a year, I think there is some cause for congratulation that the advance has been so small; and I do not think I deserved the rebuke of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Droitwich, who first complained of the large amount of this Vote, and then reprimanded me for having endeavoured to practise some ecomony in it. I have done very little in that way, for during the whole time I have been connected with this Department this matter has been under the consideration of the Commission, and every change has been hung up until their Report was made. The reduction that has been made has been attributable, I believe, to two causes—one the reduction in the number of pupil teachers, which was effected by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Staffordshire, and the other the reduction in the building grants, which was effected by the Lord President and myself, reducing them by three-eighths, which did not diminish the number of applications. And I cannot, I confess, join in the regret that some £40,000 a year have been saved to the public without any apparent damage to the progress of education.

I will now pass on to the criticism which the Commissioners have made on the working of the department, and upon which I have been challenged so keenly by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire to plead guilty or not guilty. As I have taken down the charges brought against us, they are four in number:—First, the great expense of the present system; secondly, the defective instruction given under it; thirdly, its complexity; and fourthly, its inability to reach remote rural districts and the lower parts of towns. The expense, the Commissioners compute, will, if it goes on at the present rate, amount in the course of time to £2,100,000 annually. They say truly that is an enormous expenditure. When I look at the criticism of the Commissioners I endeavour to discriminate how much of the fault is that of the system on which we are working, and how much is to be attributed to its imperfect administration. Now, I am perfectly satisfied that, whatever may be the merits or demerits of the present system, it can never be a very economical system; and for this reason—if people are spending their own money, or spending money under local control, they may be forced to economise; but all that a central body, such as the Privy Council, can do is to require that certain conditions shall be complied with in return for these grants. There is no doubt that those who are richest and best able to pay are those who are best able to conform to these conditions. Therefore, there is always a tendency in a central system to aid those who can best afford to spend their own money. The income of schools is drawn from two sources; first, the private charity of the local managers and the pence of the parents, and next, the money of the Privy Council. When you have two independent sources of income of this kind, it is very difficult, if not impossible, to adapt one to the other so as to avoid all unnecessary outlay. No doubt there are expenses in this system that may be, in some degree, diminished, and I shall, when I recur to that subject, endeavour to point out the means of reducing them. I admit the present system is expensive, but it is the duty of those who have charge of the system, as faithful guardians not only of the system but of the money that is spent on it, to make the administration as economical as they can, and thus give it a chance of vitality; nothing is so likely to bring a system to the ground as making it needlessly burdensome and expensive. I, therefore, regret that I cannot kiss the rod which the right hon. Gentleman has held out to me. I do wish to economise this grant, and to make it go as far as possible.

Another charge brought by the Commissioners is that our instruction is deficient. They say it is too ambitious and too superficial; that not one-fourth of our children are properly taught, that the younger and lower boys are neglected for the sake of the upper classes, and that each child ought to be able to read, write, and cipher in an intelligent manner when he leaves school. I am asked whether those charges are true, and I am called upon to compare these statements with those of the Inspectors, and decide between them. All that I am responsible for in the reports of the Inspectors is for collecting and tabulating them. I think it probable that this criticism is in some degree well founded, because I never saw a public school in England where too much attention was not given to the upper classes, and to the clever and forward boys who repaid by their advancement in learning the care and attention they received, in comparison with those modest, unassuming, and patient characters who have enlisted on their side the sympathy of the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire. I can see no reason why the schools intended for the poorer classes should not be subject to the same influences, and there ought, besides, to be taken into consideration the great number of children who leave school at too early an age to receive the instruction which they ought to have. I am, therefore, quite willing to admit and believe that there is some justice in the statement, and, though I hope that the system is capable of great improvement in this matter, I do not expect to see the time when the same thing may not be said, with more or less justice, of the public education of the country.

There are also clauses which are not inherent in the system itself, but which arise in the working of the system, and which tend to aggravate this evil. The right hon. Gentleman has spoken of the high teaching of the schoolmasters. I do not say whether it is too high or too low, but this I will say, that it is not quite fair to represent the schoolmaster as a person who is always to teach children not more than ten or eleven years old. If that were so, nothing would be more absurd than the amount of training the schoolmasters receive; but they are called on to perform double duty, and to teach not only children in the schools, but also to instruct pupil teachers, out of whom future schoolmasters are to be made. Therefore, their capacity must be such as will enable them to instruct ordinary children, and also to teach up to the age of eighteen years those who are to be teachers themselves. Of course, had the original plan been carried out, of placing the training colleges in the hands of the Government, I should have felt a more direct responsibility on this point; but it was thought fit to work them on the same plan as the ordinary schools, and though they are in the hands of most excellent persons throughout the country, it is not always in our power to enforce upon them exactly what we wish. With respect to what has fallen from the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire, I really think that the schoolmaster should be taught some political economy in these days of strikes; so that the person who is looked up to as an authority next to the clergyman in his village should be able to give some sensible opinion on those melancholy contests about wages; and if he knows a little less of the wars of the Roses, or of the history of the heresies in the early Church, and more of the principles which regulate the price of labour, and should be able to impress on his hearers the doctrine that wages do not depend on the will of a master, but have a law of their own to regulate them, I think his ability in that respect would be very serviceable. And, further, I should not regret if a little of what the right hon. Gentleman calls sanitary science were added to his instruction. I do not think that it would be amiss if the schoolmaster in a village were able to demonstrate the advantage of good drains and sewers in preventing disease and death; and if he were instructed in vaccination, so that he might avoid the errors of the hon. Member for Finsbury. Neither should I think it amiss if he were able to teach the people that they would do wisely to throw open their windows and promote ventilation; and particularly when their families were weakly to select situations for living in which were healthy. Such knowledge as that may appear ridiculous when called by a grand name, but it is, nevertheless, extremely useful. I have already said that we in some degree aggravate the evil of imperfect instruction. The object of the Privy Council mainly was to create and maintain a proper standard of popular education, and to insure attendance. With these views we gave capitation grants on the attendance of scholars, and by augmentations of salary we have created a very high class of schoolmasters; but we have not, perhaps, taken so much care as we ought of ascertaining the work done; and in looking back to the system we think it quite possible that we have erred in not devising some machinery for testing more particularly the results. So far we may have something to answer for, if reading, writing, and arithmetic have not so much attention paid to them as they ought.

Of the next charge we cannot deny the truth—namely, that the system is one of great complication. The principle on which the Privy Council has gone has been that whenever they wished a thing to be done they paid for it, and they paid the person by whom it should be done. For instance, we wanted to have schoolmasters of a particular class, and for the purpose of obtaining them we augmented the salary, as they passed through the three grades of certificates; and in the same way, increased payments were made to the pupil-teachers at certain periods during their apprenticeship of five years. The number of certified teachers is about 7,500, that of pupil-teachers about 15,500, so that the two classes together amount to 23,000; and we pay every one of them by Post Office order sent direct to his address. We keep a registry and a biographical notice of them all, so as to be aware of their character. No doubt, this system is in this advantageous, that we reach these persons directly and they communicate directly with the Government, and we have security that what money we spend is applied as we wish; but it entails enormous expense and labour. We have also to correspond with 6,000 managers of schools. I have now adverted to the faults which the Commissioners find with the system, and I am bound to say that I have no means of judging how far they or our inspectors are right, and how far it is possible to reconcile any conflicting statements. Probably all the statements on both sides have some foundation, and are entitled to the serious attention of those who wish to make the department as perfect as possible.

I perceive that, notwithstanding the faults which the Commissioners find, they recommend the continuance of the present system. It would not become me in my situation to enter into a question so large as that, but this I will venture to say—that in making that recommendation, the Commissioners, so far as I can understand the case, express, I will not say the opinion of the whole country, or of philosophers, or of persons of great powers of abstract thought, but they express the opinion of those to whom education in this country owes almost its existence—of those who gave both time and money to promote education before the present system was called into being. If we have spent £4,800,000 in educating the people, private liberality has spent double that sum. In fact, the question as to what system of education is to prevail will be regulated by the opinion of those whose hands maintain it. So long as it is the opinion of those who contribute to the maintenance of the schools that the present system is the right and the best one so long will the present system continue. It would be merely wasting the time of the House to debate the matter. As I am anxious in addressing the House to economize time, I will merely now say that it is not the intention of Government to infringe on the organic principles of the present system—namely, its denominational character, its foundation on a broad religious basis, its teaching religion, and the practice of giving grants from the central office in aid of local subscriptions, the propriety of those grants to be ascertained by inspection. I do not require to wait until next Session to make this declaration.

The next question for consideration is how can the faults pointed out by the Commissioners be remedied consistently with the preservation of the system itself. I looked into their Report to see if I could find a remedy for the evils which the Commissioners have pointed out. Their diagnosis I admit is good, but I was anxious to ascertain whether they applied a cure for the disease. Before I go further, however, I may mention that one of the objections raised by the Commissioners against our system is that it does not and cannot cover the whole of the country. Now, the truth of that charge I at once admit, but I am afraid the evil is a necessary concomitant of a Government grant based upon voluntary efforts. The existing system presupposes voluntary subscriptions, which are naturally not found to be forthcoming in the remote rural districts, nor to a sufficient extent in the lower and poorer parts of towns, and, therefore, it is quite clear that unless we establish a mongrel system by lending Government aid in particular cases, where voluntary subscriptions do not exist, and in other cases refusing to give it except where such subscriptions are afforded—a mode of proceeding which would, in all probability, be found to end in the one system supplanting the other—the evil complained of cannot, although it may be mitigated, be, under present circumstances, obviated. I now come to the recommendation of the Commissioners, and I would ask the Committee to consider how far they point out a remedy for the evils to which they advert.

They, in the first place, in dealing with the question of expense, confine their reductions to the abolition of the book grant; the rest of their scheme consists in transferring the payment of part of the money from the central authority to the county rates, and as far as economy is concerned must be looked upon as something like the joke of Mr. Liston, who used to fine himself by transferring money from his right hand pocket to his left. I am of opinion, therefore, that the suggestion of the Commissioners does not do much to help us in this respect, because, although we may, by acting upon it, diminish the amount of these estimates, yet the expense must in another shape come out of the pockets of the public. The Commissioners further propose, with a view, I believe, to remedy the complexity which they point out in our arrangements—the defects in our teaching, and also the imperfect development of the present system throughout the country—an elaborate plan. They say there should be two kinds of grants made to our schools—the one to be paid out of the funds at the disposal of the Government; the other out of the county rates. The fund at the disposal of the Government they recommend should be paid in the shape of a capitation grant on each attendance of children attending a certain number of times at these schools, and paid in proportions which it is not easy to understand, according as they happen to be under certificated masters or pupil teachers. That is the plan suggested in the case of the one grant; while in the case of the other the proposal is that there should be county boards appointed; that they should appoint schoolmasters who should examine the children, and that for each child who satisfied the examiners in reading, writing, and arithmetic, a certain sum should be paid. The same plan with the necessary modifications is to be applied to boroughs.

Now, the question has been asked whether the Government are prepared to take this scheme into their consideration, and to introduce a Bill next Session for the purpose of carrying it into effect. Before, however, I answer that question, let us pause for a moment to see to what the proposal amounts. The duties to be thrown on the county boards, the Committee will observe, are of a character purely ministerial. They will have to appoint the schoolmasters who are to examine the children, and upon the representation of those examiners the county boards will have to pay a certain sum. That being so no discretion will, so far as I can see, be vested in the county boards. Indeed, the only discretion which it appears to me will be left to any one is that which will rest with the schoolmasters, who may make a favourable report or otherwise, as they please, and thus influence the amount to be paid out of the county rates. In the case of local government, you have a good and an evil. The good is superintendence on the spot of funds raised on the spot, and greater economy and closeness of management. The evil is placing the tax on a smaller fund, and entrusting it to bodies less intelligent than central authorities chosen for the purpose. In this instance, however, we are called upon to reject the good and retain the evil. You are asked to make those county boards mere paying machines, withholding from them that control over the payments which they are to make, without which it would, in my opinion, be hardly reasonable to ask them to undertake the duty, and in the absence of which, I quite concur with the right hon. Gentleman opposite, local management is of little avail. That being so, I am not, I confess, without my doubts as to the figure I should make if I were to come down to the House and propose to impose this burden on the county rates, and I should, I must admit, much prefer that the task devolved on some one else.

There is also another matter in connection with this scheme to which I wish to allude. It is proposed that grants, in the cases in which a satisfactory examination has been passed in reading, writing, and arithmetic, should be given not merely to those schools which are under certificated masters and pupil teachers, but to every school indiscriminately. Now, we may, it seems to me, learn a lesson in this matter from the history of the present capitation grant. That grant was originally imposed with the view of assisting small rural schools, but as soon as it was established great difficulty arose in defining what were rural schools; much correspondence took place on the subject, and the result was the grant, which at the outset was intended for the small rural schools, was absorbed in our large towns by schools for the benefit of which it was never designed. Let us take a lesson from this. We are asked to make certain payments, based on the results of certain examinations. Who will get the largest proportion of that grant? Will it be the small rural schools which have certificated no master and no pupil teachers, and which may be kept by old soldiers or sailors, or will it not rather be those schools which possess all the means of providing a better description of education? We should have broken down a principle without giving effectual aid. I trust the Committee will not deem me guilty of presumption in making these observations with respect to the scheme in question. The fact is, I have been obliged to direct my attention to it, with the view of considering whether it was one which it would be desirable to adopt; but, while I entertain the utmost respect for the Commissioners, and while I admit the justice of their representations even in those instances in which they are in some degree unfavourable to ourselves, I should not feel justified in proposing their plan for the adoption of the House. It is recommended that we should give aid to private adventure schools, but I cannot acquiesce in the expediency of acting on that recommendation. Those schools are mere commercial speculations. We should in their case have no responsible person to deal with, no guarantee that the moral teaching, the discipline, and the tone of the school were what they should be, such as we obtain by the presence there of a master regularly trained to his occupation whose character and antecedents are known to us. Besides, nothing could be more injurious to the present system than, having set up a high standard, to go, as it were, in opposition to ourselves, in order to meet the case of those who cannot come up to that standard—a course which we are perpetually solicited to take in the case of the ragged schools.

I now come to that part of the recommendations of the Commissioners which might be met by a Minute of the Privy Council. It is proposed that in those cases in which there are thirty children under a pupil teacher there should be paid annually half-a-crown a piece capitation, making thirty half-crowns, or a few shillings short of £4. Now, the average pay of a pupil teacher at the present moment is £15, so that if we were to adopt this suggestion we should be striking off £11 from this salary, and thus doing that which would tend to break up the present system, although it is quite clear that the Commissioners had no such intention. The main difference between a pupil teacher and a monitor is, that while the latter is engaged by the job, that is to say for a week, a month, or a year, the pupil teacher is apprenticed, with an engagement for five years. During the first two of these five years he may be of little importance, but during the last three he becomes a valuable junior master, and if you were to replace him by a monitor, you would be dispensing with his services just at the moment when they were becoming really useful. The plan of the Commissioners does not, as far as I can see, provide for the long engagement which lies at the root of the pupil teacher system.

Therefore, Sir, having considered these recommendations, I come, I am sorry to say, to the conclusion that the Commissioners have found very grievous faults with us, and have left us with a set of recommendations which do not enable us to remedy those faults. They point out our imperfections, and leave us “with all our imperfections on our head,” without giving the means to remove any one of them. It is for us to consider whether, admitting the justice of the criticism we have undergone, we can hit on some remedy, and I think it possible to do so. As to the matter of expense, there are certain reductions, with an enumeration of which I will not trouble the Committee—excrescences of the system, the removal of which will not impair its efficiency. I think it very proper to make those reductions, and I hope in a few days to lay a Minute upon the table in which those reductions will be made. We have not hitherto been able to make them, because they refer to matters which have been before the Commissioners. I think we are bound to do what we can in that way. The reductions work no change of a fundamental character, and I, therefore, prefer to leave them to be enumerated in the Minute.

There is one subject upon which I am not prepared to make any proposition, but to which I am anxious to call the attention of hon. Members. I do it in the most conciliatory spirit, wishing to say nothing which can annoy any one. But it is a point upon which I feel it to be my duty no longer to keep silence. I have never spoken of it before, because I have been waiting for the Report of the Commissioners, and now I only mention it for the purpose of making an appeal to those with whom the remedy rests. I allude to the position of the National Society with reference to the Privy Council. I give every credit to the National Society. It is an older body than the Committee of the Privy Council. It has done great service to the cause of education, and it would ill-become me to speak of it in any terms except terms of respect. But the position which I occupy in relation to the National Society is hardly tolerable, and I think it cannot appear to the society in the way it strikes me, or they would be ready to apply a remedy. The National Society was founded for the education of children in the doctrine and Liturgy of the Church of England. Whenever a school is founded by that society, part of the trust declared in the deed consists of the terms of union. Those terms say in substance that the children—meaning all the children, although the word “all” has disappeared—shall be taught the Catechism and Liturgy, and shall attend Divine worship according to the rites of the Church of England, unless the managers shall remit that duty.

MR. HENLEY: Not the managers—the clergyman.

MR. LOWE: I beg pardon if I am wrong, and it is the clergyman, and not the manager, as the right hon. Gentleman says, but my memory is otherwise. But I think it must be quite evident to any one who is a lawyer, that applying the maxim expressio unius exclusio alterius, the right construction of those words is that one thing being left to the discretion of the clergyman or manager there is no discretion left with regard to the other two. That is the true construction of the terms of the National Society, and, no doubt, they are before the eyes of many when they subscribe to its funds. For retaining these terms of union, I have no fault to find with the society. We entered into a concordat with them with full knowledge of those terms, and if they adhere to them we have no right to complain. But what I do complain of is that the National Society have written to us a letter—and, indeed, I believe they make no secret of it—in which they say they leave to the managers of the schools the option whether they shall enforce this clause or not.

MR. HENLEY: Not the managers—the clergyman.

MR. LOWE: I state the managers. I may be wrong, but it makes no difference to my argument. With some one or another it is left optional. What I want to put to the Committee is the position in which I am placed in managing a public department. I am obliged to be a joint founder of a school in whose deed of foundation express trusts are declared, and before I become a party to the transaction I am told that those trusts will not be enforced, but that a contradictory system of action may be substituted. I am asked to grant money upon certain trusts, and, as I say, the manager, and as the right hon. Gentleman says, the clergyman may dispense with the accomplishment of those trusts. The National Society I contend should make their election. If they found schools upon an exclusive deed, though I should regret it, let them adhere to the trusts declared. If they relax the system let them relax the trusts of the deed, but do not let them force me to do that which I always do with shame—namely, to enter into a series of trusts with a distinct understanding that the terms may be violated. As a matter of economy, I think it is exceedingly desirable that the National Society should reconsider this question. Among all the difficulties—and they are many—this is the greatest difficulty in administering this grant. I am bound to the strictest impartiality. No one sect is to be preferred to another. The National Society come and ask for a school. The school comprehends a parish in which half are members of the Established Church and half are Dissenters. If I grant a school for the whole parish I run the risk that the managers will act on the trust deed, instead of on the licence of the National Society; and if they act on the deed, the flagrant injustice is done of saying to the Dissenters, “We are granting public money to which you contribute for a school, on the assumption that you will send your children there, although they cannot attend without learning a formula which is contrary to your religious views.” The next thing is, the Dissenters get together and say, “We will not have our children sent to a school where these tests are enforced.” They apply for another school, and make out a case which is irresistible. We grant another school, and thus the public funds are applied to establish two miserable schools where the children are ill taught, instead of one flourishing school which we might have, and which I should wish to see under the management of the clergy, teaching the doctrines of the Church of England, and only exempting those whose parents have conscientious scruples against their children learning her formulas. That is a great cause of expense, and a great reason why we do not penetrate into the country as we ought. It is a cause of untold mischief and heartburning in Wales, which I much regret, and I do hope the National Society will listen to my appeal to take the matter into consideration and to see whether they cannot alter the terms of union in such a manner as to meet the difficulty. I think that while leaving intact the objects of the Society they might respect the conscientious scruples of Dissenters, as the Bishops of the Church of England did when they agreed to the Endowed Schools Bill. I hope it will not be supposed that I have been at all offensive. I am only influenced by a strong sense of duty, and in what I have said I am fortified by a pamphlet recently written by the Bishop of St. David's, who, himself a strong and leading member of the National Society, gives it as his opinion that all the purposes of religious instruction would be well answered if the National Society would be content with the teaching of the Ten Commandments, the Lord's Prayer, and the Apostles' Creed—to which no Dissenter, excepting an Unitarian, has any objection—leaving the doctrinal parts in the Catechism and those parts which refer to the Holy Sacraments to the time when the child is prepared for confirmation. I have read that expression of opinion with much pleasure, and I hope it will have weight with the National Society in considering this subject.

Passing over the economies which we mean to effect, I come to the question—in what manner are we to deal with the defects which have been pointed out by the Commissioners? There are three faults found:—First, that we teach superficially, ambitiously, and imperfectly; secondly, that we do not spread our schools as widely over the country as we should; and, thirdly, that our system is full of complications. It seems to me that it is quite possible to suggest a system which may do something towards remedying all these defects. What we propose to do will be embodied in a Minute which will be laid on the Table as soon as possible. I will merely state the outline of the Minute, prefacing it with the assurance that the Committee need not be afraid that we contemplate any coup d'état, because the nature of the grant is such that we cannot make any innovations until the end of the next financial year. It appears to me that the complexity resolves itself into this, that not content with giving the grants on the performance of particular conditions, which I think is a right principle, we have also insisted on paying those grants to the persons for whom they were designed. It might be necessary before the system were organized to do this. But now we are in communication with between 6,000 and 7,000 managers of schools of the highest character, and have no reason to doubt that money paid for a particular purpose would find its way to its destination. If the payments are made direct to the managers, that will be an enormous advantage, even if the payments remain the same as now. This is a recommendation of the Commissioners, and it is also a recommendation of the Commissioners that the present separate payments shall be discontinued, and that, instead of graduated payments of the complicated nature which I have described, augmentation allowances to teachers, varying from £15 to £30, and allowances to pupil-teachers, varying from £12 to £20—payments in the nature of capitation grants shall be substituted. We think it will give great simplicity to the system, and much facilitate its working. But then comes the question, on what conditions shall the capitation grants be given? We think that at present the capitation grant is not given on sufficiently stringent conditions. We think we ought to be satisfied not only that the children have attended a proper number of times and that they have been taught by properly qualified teachers; but that something has been done worthy of the attendance and of the teaching powers of the masters. At the same time we must not be understood as proposing to base our payments upon results simply and by themselves. We think it would be rash and imprudent to sweep away a machinery which has been constructed with great labour, care, and dexterity—which, although it may be complicated and difficult to work, has answered many of the purposes for which it was designed—in order to substitute the new and untried plan of trusting merely to the results of examinations. What we mean to do is to take care that the capitation grant, when paid, shall be paid only upon our being reasonably satisfied that the desired results have been attained. We propose, therefore, to give the capitation grant on the number of attendances of a child above a certain number, provided always that the school is certified by the inspector to be in a fit state, and provided, also, that there is a certified master. These are the conditions necessary for the payment of the capitation grant; but, in order to spread the system more widely, we propose to create a fourth kind of certificate, which will be lower than the present certificates, which may be taken by a younger person, and which will probably be more available for the purposes of rural schools. Having thus secured attendances we propose to go a step further. We propose that an inspector shall examine the children in reading, writing, and arithmetic. If a child pass in the whole the full capitation grant will be given; but if he fail in writing, for instance, one-third of the grant will be withdrawn; if he fail in both reading and writing two-thirds will be withheld; while if he fail in reading, writing, and arithmetic, no portion of the grant will be paid. Thus, the Committee will see that we shall never pay anything for a child unless we have been satisfied—First, that he has attended above a certain number of times; secondly, that he has attended a school which is under a certified master; and, thirdly, that he has satisfied an inspector of his capacity in reading, writing, and arithmetic. I hope the change we propose may have some effect in correcting the evils in the teaching which have been complained of. Our object is to secure, as far as possible, that the attention of the master shall not be confined to the upper class of his school, but shall be given to the whole, and we endeavour to effect that object by making the payment of the capitation grant depend upon the manner in which he has instructed each child. I may add that we do not intend to break in upon the system of pupil teachers as now existing. I can hardly hope that I have made myself intelligible. The matter is one of considerable complexity, and I may be allowed to recapitulate the main features of our plan. We propose to give capitation grants on each attendance above a certain number—say above 100—the object being that we shall not be paying money for a child who has been taught by another master, and who is brought to the school merely for the purpose of earning the grant. We also require that there shall be a certified master, in order to secure good order, discipline, morality, and competent teaching. Lastly, the grants will be subject to reduction upon failure in reading, writing, or arithmetic. It will be seen, therefore, that when a grant is paid, we shall have secured, as far as we can, not only the presence of a competent teacher, not only the attendance of the child, but also some knowledge of the actual results of the teaching.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Will the capitation grants be given in all cases on a smaller number of attendances than at present?

MR. LOWE: I have not committed myself upon that point; but my impression is that the grants will be paid on a smaller number of attendances than at present, because there are other conditions which will make the capitation more difficult to obtain than at present. We intend to preserve the interests of all pupil teachers now under engagement, and to take care that all future pupil teachers shall serve as now for a period of five years.

I shall now briefly state some of the advantages which I think will arise from our plan. It leaves the whole system of the Privy Council intact. It merely substitutes one kind of payment for another, and that a much more simple and convenient one. It will be attended by a considerable diminution of trouble. It leaves to the managers of schools greater freedom of management than they have at present, and it has always appeared to me that, so long as certain indispensable conditions are complied with, you ought to minimize your interference with the management of schools. Heretofore we have endeavoured to provide the means. We are now extending our view, so as not only to provide the means, but also to see that those means when provided are used to the best advantage. That, I think, is a decided step in advance, because what is the good of attendances and of teachers unless they lead to real instruction and knowledge in the children? We also give the master a much stronger motive for exertion than he has at present. If his children do not pass the examination he will fall into disgrace with his managers; while, if they do pass, he will naturally be highly esteemed, and will have an opportunity of rising in his profession. Our plan, in short, will give an impulse to the profession of schoolmasters, and to the laudable ambition of men who wish to raise themselves in life. At present our schoolmasters are treated upon the principle which Mr. George Potter and his friends desire to apply to the case of all workmen. We first ascertain the capacity of a teacher, and then we pay him a certain sum whether he works or not, just as Mr. Potter contends that a man who is lazy and inefficient should be paid as much as a man who is active, industrious, and skilled in his trade. For that system we propose to substitute the wholesome stimulus which must be afforded by an inquiry into the actual results of the teaching in a school, testing the exertion which the master has used in teaching, not the upper class only, but all the children under his charge. Hitherto we have been living under a system of bounties and protection; now we propose to have a little free trade. Our plan carries out the idea of the Report, though free, I trust, from many of its objections. The Report suggests the propriety of our being satisfied that the children possess the elementary accomplishments of reading and writing. I think that suggestion is a valuable one, and we have acted upon it. What we propose to do is built upon the present system of the Privy Council. No attempt has been made to introduce any change. The schools will continue to be denominational, and religious teaching must be the foundation of all. The inspectors will still conduct a religious examination where they conduct one now; in short, there is no proposal to make any change in the religious character of the schools.

It only remains that I should point out the evils of the proposal. As the system spreads we must increase the number of inspectors. I am afraid that is unavoidable. We have considered the recommendation of the Commissioners that we should employ schoolmasters instead of inspectors; but it appears to us that, considering the delicate and difficult duties which inspectors have to discharge, and the social position of those with whom they come in contact, we ought to retain for their discharge persons of the same class as we have now. We believe the work will be more efficiently done by them than it would be by schoolmasters. They will, as I have said, increase with the extension of the system, but I hope not very rapidly. We must recollect that inspection and the increase of inspectors are evils inseparable from a central system. We grant money; it is necessary we should ascertain it has been properly applied, and we know not how we can get that information except through persons appointed to examine and report. But let me say that if the number of inspectors should become too large the Government and the House have the remedy in their own hands. The number of inspectors is far larger than it need be at this moment, because each denomination has its own inspectors, and it often happens that three or four gentlemen are sent to the same town to inspect the schools in it. That, of course, involves an enormous waste of time and money, and some good might be effected by making the same gentleman inspect all classes of schools, with the exception, perhaps, of those belonging to the Roman Catholics. However, we propose nothing of that kind; I merely point out what might be done. Another evil is that we shall pay over the money to the managers of a school, instead of to the person who is to receive it; and, therefore, we are not quite so sure that the money will reach the hands for which it is designed. That, however, is more a theoretical than a practical objection, and I have no doubt that the charitable and religious persons who manage schools will be found in every respect qualified to discharge this trust. I have now laid before the House, I am afraid at too great length, the views and intentions of the Government with respect to the Report of the Education Commission. I hope that, whatever hon. Gentlemen may think of our proposition—upon which, of course, I cannot expect them to deliver a judgment until they have seen the details—they will, at least, believe that we have honestly endeavoured to do our best under circumstances of great difficulty. We have endeavoured to meet the case as well as we could; and we hope, by the kind assistance of the House, to succeed in giving greater efficiency to the present system. The Committee must not expect from us impossibilities. We cannot combine in the same system the advantages of the voluntary principle with those of the system of local rating. We want to carry out the present system under present circumstances as far as we can. So far as we can elevate it, so far as we can make it more comprehensive, more efficient and more economical, we are most anxious to do so.

MR. ADDERLEY said, he was sure the Committee felt, as he did, much indebted to the right hon. Gentleman for his most lucid and satisfactory statement. He entirely agreed with him in the general scheme of his remarks, and particularly with those made towards the conclusion of his speech. To a certain extent also he agreed with the remarks made by the Commissioners in their Report upon the existing system; they considered it to have worked well, and to deserve continuance; there were, however, blots and defects in the system which required alteration. But, at the same time, he considered that the recommendations made by the Royal Commissioners, however perfect they might be in theory, were wholly impracticable. He had no doubt that the changes adopted from their recommendation and those also proposed by the right hon. Gentleman, which were to be embodied in a Minute and laid on the Table, would remedy some of the most serious defects in the present system. He entirely coincided with what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman with reference to the National Society. In his appeal to the National Society he did not ask them in any way to alter their terms of union. What was asked was strictly within their existing terms, and required no alteration whatever. He believed if the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman were adopted the effect would be to place the Church, especially in Wales, in a much better position in reference to the education of the country population. The changes to be embodied in the Minute were directly addressed to the main defects of the existing system and would go far to remedy them. The modified application in extenso of the capitation grant, would be a means of the grant reaching, as originally intended, the rural districts. It would also simplify, not only the correspondence and business of the Privy Council, but would very much better the internal arrangements of the schools themselves. He also approved of the proposal to grant a fourth and lower certificate. It was a gratifying fact that the labours of the Royal Commission had been brought to an end, for during the pendency of their proceedings all improvements were necessarily suspended, but now they had a Report of a most interesting character, and their hands were untied to act as they pleased. He believed the Report would give general satisfaction from its most material feature, namely, that after most mature inquiry into the subject, extending over a period of three years, conducted by several eminent and able men selected for the purpose, with a large staff of very able assistants and an unlimited command of money, they had come to the conclusion that the existing system should be maintained, and that any changes which could be proposed were not to destroy the system, or in any way to strike at its roots, but merely to supplement it where it was found deficient. That must be satisfactory, for it would set at rest many suggested alterations and great uncertainty which had hung over the present system. Henceforth alterations would be addressed to detail, not to the essence of the system. The Commissioners had certainly in them proposed a supplemental system, made a suggestion which appeared to him to be wholly impracticable; he referred to the proposal to supplement the Treasury grants by payments out of county and borough rates. There were four objections to that proposal. Firstly, it was a needlessly complicated system to have two purses from which to draw; secondly, no Bill would ever be allowed to pass through the House of Commons that proposed to throw additional cost upon the county rates, but if such a Bill did pass it would be found that in the formation of the local boards religious questions would arise and render it perfectly impossible to obtain sufficient unanimity of feeling; thirdly, it was simply a proposal to relieve the bulk of the people for the purpose of casting expense upon special kinds of property; fourthly, it was suggested to open the grants to pupils of all classes of schools, no matter what their religion and so, for the first time, public money would go to secular schools. It would be absolutely turning the flank of the religious position which had always been maintained on this subject. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) seemed to take a very favourable view of this proposal, and had referred to previous propositions of his own and of the noble Lord opposite (Lord John Russell), which were similar in their nature—as far as the proposition of local rates in aid—congratulating himself upon the fact that at last the House was recommended by a body of Royal Commissioners to carry out those suggestions. But the Committee would remember that he (Mr. Adderley) had also before made similar suggestions, and that some years ago he introduced a local rate Bill for Manchester. Upon that Bill a longer discussion arose than any private Bill had ever received; but the result of it was to prevent everybody from attempting to introduce a similar measure. It was comparatively hopeless, even though the proposition was only local; but if it was impossible to carry a local Bill for an educational rate, how much more impossible would it be to carry such a measure for all parts of the kingdom. The reduction of the Vote, on which the right hon. Gentleman had dwelt as an indication of failure or relapse, was to his mind a most signal proof of the success of the system, and the best promise of its permanency. When the Government aid grew so much out of proportion as to check voluntary contribution it was but proper that it should be reduced, and these reductions were generally followed by an increase of voluntary subscriptions. The right hon. Baronet said that the present system pressed heavily on the clergy, but that was no argument against the system. It was not the fault of the system but of the owners of wealth who allowed the pressure to fall on the clergy, and it would be most detrimental to the system, as a voluntary system, to attempt to relieve any special pressure out of the public purse. In the recent Report of the Commissioners it was stated that the system did not sufficiently meet the wants of the rural districts, and instances were mentioned, especially in the rural districts, where there were a great number of schools which did not obtain Privy Council aid. But it was not the system which did not meet the cases, but these cases which did not meet the system. For what was meant by the poorer districts? They were poor only in the sense that the owners of wealth impoverished them of the voluntary efforts which it was their duty to make for them. It was said this was a system which helped the rich; but that was a fallacy. It was a system which only helped the rich to help the poor. That the present system did not reach the poorer schools was because the managers of these schools objected to bringing them under Government control. That arose, no doubt, from the aversion to centralized authority and to receiving Government aid which was the characteristic of the English people, but at the same time if the managers of these small rural schools would bring them within the sphere of the Privy Council grant, instead of a miserable, wretched school, they might have a first-class school and a superior class of masters without spending a shilling more than at present, so large was the aid offered to good management. With regard to ragged schools, as the subject was now before a Select Committee, he would only say that it was not a little disappointing to find that those persons who had recommended a Royal Commission, and who had moved the Address to Her Majesty for its appointment, should be the first to find fault with it on a point where it did not exactly square with their views. If the Select Committee now sitting in judgment on the Commissioners reported in the same direction as the Royal Commissioners he hoped those Gentlemen would not ask for a third inquiry upon the report of the Select Committee on destitute children.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: It is evident, I think, that the majority of the Committee is agreed that the system of instruction for the poor should be supported from some public fund. For some years the fund has been provided by this House, and large and increasing grants have been placed at the disposal of the Privy Council for the purpose. The main question which the late Commission were appointed to investigate was whether it was expedient that that system should be continued either wholly or in part, or whether it should be superseded by some other system of public assistance for the instruction of the poor. The conclusion of the Commissioners was substantially to uphold the existing system, but to recommend in addition a system of rating. I quite admit that the advocates of the voluntary system are represented in this House, but they do not form a majority here. Setting aside, then, those who think there should be no assistance from any public fund for the instruction of the poor, I can understand those who say, "Let there be no grant from Parliament, and let the whole of the elementary schools be maintained out of local rates. Let those rates be parochial as in Scotland. Let some parochial authority regulate and distribute the fund, and organize and control the schools. By that means you get the advantage of local management, of local knowledge, and of local inspection, and you save that which is a necessary concomitant and an undoubted evil of a central system—namely, the expense of inspection." These are the advantages of a parochial system of rating and of management. The disadvantages are that in the first place you necessarily confine your taxation to real property, which excludes a large number of wealthy persons who might in fairness be called upon to contribute to the expense of instructing the poor, but who, if you found your system exclusively upon local taxation, of course, escape. That is one disadvantage attending the system of local educational management. But there is another which I conceive to be the great practical obstacle to such a system, which is the impossibility that a parochial system should be denominational. You cannot have a variety of schools belonging to different religious sects in each parish, because the expense would be too great, and if you do not introduce the denominational system then you have to encounter a series of difficulties similar to those which arise in the case of church rates. The religious difficulty arises and must be contended with, and this has been proved to be insuperable by the advocates of the system of management by parochial rating. If these principles are admitted we seem to be thrown back upon an exclusive system of Parliamentary grants like the present, or we may have recourse to some system like that recommended by the Commissioners. I rise merely for the purpose of making a few observations upon the system which they have recommended, because it is important that the Committee should correctly appreciate the exact nature of that recommendation. What the Commissioners suggest is that there shall be a county board and a borough board for counties and for boroughs, and that these boards shall elect examiners of schools, who in all cases are to be schoolmasters. The boards have no other duty than to provide the necessary funds out of the county or the borough rates, and to select these examiners, and they are to have no control whatever over any class of schools in the county or in the borough. This system clearly no more affords the advantages of local management, of local control, and local inspection, than the Privy Council system. The duty of the examiners elected by these boards is to examine the children in all the schools within the county or the borough as to their efficiency in reading, writing, and arithmetic; to give a certificate to each child according to the standard which, I presume, would be prescribed by the Privy Council; and upon the certificate so given it will be the duty of those boards to pay out of the county rates or out of the borough fund a certain sum in respect of each child who has received the certificate, which sum will be payable towards the expenses of the school. Now, the Committee will see that the county and the borough boards have purely Ministerial duties to perform, and, therefore, it is, in point of fact, a mere contrivance by which you obtain certain payments from the county or borough rate, instead of obtaining payments out of the public Exchequer. You have none of the advantages which belong to a system of local rating and of local action, and whatever arguments may be urged in favour of a system of parochial rating and management, and of local action and administration in respect of schools, are altogether wanting in the system of county and borough rating which is recommended by the Commissioners.

MR. PULLER said, he rose to vindicate the National Society, of which he was a member, from the very serious charge which had that evening been brought against it by the Vice President of the Committee of Council. It had been said, that while the society required their terms of union to be inserted in the trust deeds of their schools, there was a sub-understanding that those terms should be violated. He denied the justice of that accusation. It was quite true that by the terms of union, as originally drawn up, it was expressly required that "all" the children should be taught the Catechism and Liturgy of the Church of England. Even if the rule so expressed had remained unaltered, there must, from the necessity of the case have been vested somewhere a discretionary power of determining how the rule should be applied, and what exceptions should be made, while probably no parent would object to his child learning some parts of the Catechism and Liturgy. It was in the nature of things impossible that every child should learn the whole of those formularies; and, in point of fact, it had not at any time been the practice to teach them in the infant schools of the society. But the argument did not rest there. In the year 1839 the society had altered its terms of union, by omitting the word "all," which might seem to prohibit all exceptions, and the rule as it stood now simply required in general terms, that "the children should be taught the Catechism and Liturgy." Now, surely, the fair inference from that alteration was that the society recognized the necessity that existed for allowing reasonable exceptions to be made. The society did not say what exceptions might be made or under what circumstances, but their terms of union pointed to the clergyman of the parish as the proper person to determine questions of that kind. In substance the terms of union provided that the children should be taught the Liturgy and Catechism, that the religious teaching should be under the control of the clergyman of the parish with an appeal, if necessary to the Bishop of the diocese, and that the question whether the children should be compelled to go to church or not should be at the discretion of the managers. The Commissioners in their late Report declared that the importance of the religious difficulty had been very much over-rated, and, speaking generally, said there was no great objection on the part of Dissenting parents to their children learning the Church Catechism, but that they were tenacious about attendance at church. In that respect he confessed he sympathized with them, for he thought it would be intolerable that the children of Dissenters should be compelled to attend a place of worship different from that to which the parents were in the habit of going. With regard to learning the formularies of the Church he believed that, in nineteen cases out of twenty, when a parent conscientiously objected it was not insisted upon, but the proposal that the clergyman should be under a legal obligation to exempt the children of parents who objected from learning those formularies was quite a different thing. If the managers of national schools came under a legal obligation not to teach the Catechism and Liturgy to a particular class of children they could not stop there. They must fulfil such an obligation in the spirit as well as in the letter. They must abstain from teaching not merely the formularies themselves, but the doctrines contained in those formularies, and in the end they would be driven to say that they could not give such children any religious instruction at all. He believed, therefore, the society would be compelled to withhold their assent from the propositions of the right hon. Gentleman. His right hon. Friend the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) had commented upon the character of the certificated masters, and had told the Committee that they were educated above their work, and that the result of their high training was that the children left the schools without having learnt even to read intelligently. But could the children taught by uncertificated masters read and write better? On the contrary, it appeared from the reports of the Inspectors that the children who were under the certificated stood, in respect of those very items of reading and writing, 50 per cent higher than those who were under the certificated masters. As to the expense of the present system, there could be no doubt that it was high. To secure the advantage of religious instruction the system had been more denominational; and this must cost more than a system of mere secular instruction. But if the public expenditure was £800,000 a year, it cost the supporters of the schools twice as much, and if the House did not expend that sum on education now they might, perhaps, have to spend still larger sums upon these children hereafter, for maintaining them in gaol. He should be glad to see the public expenditure on schools increase, and that upon schools decrease. The great objection to the present system was that it did not cover the whole surface of the country, and that the poorest parishes contributed as much in proportion as the wealthiest without receiving the same benefits. But a good system of education must grow up by degrees. The first element was to obtain a good staff of masters, and they could not be got all at once. He thought the present system had been and still was advancing in the estimation of the country, and would in the end be highly approved of. Was it not the fact that there were about 2,000 young men and women in the training schools, of whom one-half went out every year, and found employment without difficulty? That fact alone would prove that the system was extending itself as rapidly as they could reasonably hope or expect. No large district of the country could long be without its school; and he was glad to notice that a change as to the importance of education was coming over the minds of the employers of labour. Depend upon it, if they only gave the system a fair trial, it would gradually extend itself over the whole surface of the country.

MR. BAINES could not help expressing his regret that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) had not seen his way to making more important alterations in the present system, with a view of throwing the people more upon their own resources, which became the more certain the more they were appealed to, and which he believed would do more than anything else to make them morally stronger. With regard to capitation grants—in his opinion the worst feature of the present system, and which the right hon. Gentleman appeared to him to be intending to extend—he (Mr. Lowe) left all the vices of the system untouched. By it a rule was made for poor districts, which they found themselves afterwards obliged to apply to the wealthy districts. In 1854 the plan was adopted for the rural districts, and now in wealthy communities, such as London, Manchester, Liverpool, and Leeds, they were almost compelling people to receive the money for their schools. He knew cases of the schools of manufacturers, millionaires, and wealthy congregations in his own borough, who were perfectly able and willing to support their own systems of education, but who were now taking the public money. It was a scandalous waste of the public funds—and he denounced it to the House. He sympathized more with the remarks of the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) than with those of the right hon. Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington), especially on two points. Stress had been laid on the question of religious education. It appeared to him that the right hon. Member for Droitwich was compelled by the bent of his argument to slight religious education—a point to which the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire attached much importance. He (Mr. Baines) felt most strongly that unless they gave a sound moral training, based on the principles of Christianity, they grossly neglected education. All the teaching of arts and sciences would be nothing without a religious education—not as to particular dogmas, but in the grand fundamental principles of Christianity. In that very fact, however, lay the difficulty of connecting popular education with the Government; and it was this difficulty, rather than any insensibility to the importance of religious education, that had driven the right hon. Baronet to his system of local rating, which he (Mr. Baines) thought would not work, and would prove injurious to the interests of religion. In the first place, it would have to encounter the opposition of persons who, like himself, were voluntarists, and who did not believe that the Founder of our faith intended that His doctrines should be inculcated by compulsory taxation. Then see the point to which the present system brought them. They had to provide religious education, and to that end had agreed to pay all alike out of the public purse. Civil justice required it should be so. But the fact that they were manifestly paying for the propagation of opposite opinions, and, therefore, necessarily of error, as much as for the propagation of truth, really threw grave doubts on the propriety of a system by which civil justice required them to take such a course. Then with regard to State interference, he was of opinion with Mr. Henley that the State interfered too much, but he went further. Those who supported State interference overlooked the facts of history and of their own day, and almost set light by the religious zeal of the community and the common sense as well as the sense of duty of parents. He believed the Government system of education had been introduced under great misconceptions. The first of these was the small amount of education assumed to exist in this country in comparison with other countries of Europe and America. This he believed to be contrary to the fact, and though not then in the House he endeavoured to show that it was so. He maintained that the number of scholars was far greater than it was supposed to be, and he endeavoured to prove that at that time, 1846-7, one out of every eight or nine children was at school. But it was constantly asserted in that House that only one in every thirteen or fourteen was at school. They were then wanting good statistics on the subject, and that led to many misconceptions. Another thing was that it was supposed that in Prussia and other foreign countries the system of education was much superior to ours, and it was urged that it was a shame this country should be left so much behind. Now, they were told, the education they were giving was of too high an order, and that they were neglecting the elementary and more important branches. He would admit that a great amount of good had been done. The standard of education was higher than formerly; they had obtained better qualified teachers and splendid schoolhouses—indeed, in some instances too splendid. It would be strange if some good had not been done when equal to nearly £5,000,000 had been spent upon it. But now that they had reached this point, he put it to the country whether the system was to be permanent—whether they were to continue a system resting on the taxation of the country, or whether they might not trust more to the people themselves, and if they did so whether they would not have a higher and better education than at present. The hon. Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) had said that great masses of the people and great districts of the country were without education. He (Mr. Baines) denied it, and challenged the right hon. Baronet to point out the part of the country where such a state of things existed. What did the Report of the Commissioners say? It told them that the number of children in the day schools throughout the country was 2,535,462, and that the number of schools was 58,975, and that gave an average of nearly six years' education to every child in the entire country. Surely that was a state of things which could not be regarded as very alarming. The Commissioners themselves said—

“Most of the children who, being able to attend, do not belong to any school appear to be the children of in-door paupers, or of parents viciously inclined. With these exceptions almost all children in the country capable of going to school receive some instruction.”

Then the Commissioners gave them a comparison as to the proportion of children going to school in this and other countries. In Prussia, where education was compulsory up to a certain age, the scholars were 1 to every 6.27 of the population. In England it was 1 in every 7.7; in Holland 1 in every 8.11; and in France 1 in every 9; so that this country stood higher than many of those countries which were considered to be the first in letters and civilization. Surely these facts ought to induce them to consider whether it was necessary to maintain the present system in its full extent, whether Government interference could not, at least in some degree, be withdrawn, and whether education could not be safely left to the spontaneous efforts of the people? But it was said that we owed these results to the Parliamentary grants. That was an entire mistake, for the greatest strides had been made before the adoption of that system. The proportion of children at school at the different epochs had been as follows:—In 1803 the scholars were 1 in 17½ of the population; in 1818, 1 in 17½; in 1833, without one sixpence of public money, it had progressed to 1 in 11½; in 1851, to 1 in 8.36, although the annual grants for education only began in 1847. In 1858, it was 1 in 7.7. The first grant of school buildings was in 1833; and the payments for teachers and school expenses were commenced much later. They might rely on other things, independent of Government—the power of religion, of philanthropy, the sense of duty in parents, and above all that inexplicably vast progress, that tide and wave of advancing civilization which had been passing over this country in a way beyond what had been realized in any other age of the world. Besides this there were the Sunday schools, in which there were 2,411,544 children, and 320,000 voluntary teachers giving their time from week to week and from year to year. Having been for forty years engaged in Sunday schools as teacher or superintendent, he had a right to feel proud of that result. Was not that an argument why they should depart from that extravagant system in which they had embarked? Then he thought this was a peculiarly favourable conjuncture for reviewing the educational system. They had repealed taxes on knowledge this year to the amount of £1,500,000, and since 1836 to the amount of from £3,000,000 to £4,000,000, and that was one reason why they should leave education to take care of itself. They might with the most absolute safety leave the work to the people themselves. The people were now in an excellent condition in regard to employment. Poor rates, which in 1831 were at the rate of 9s. 9d. per head, had fallen in 1859-60 to 5s. 6d. per head. Then, again, let them look to the number of educational establishments of an auxiliary kind. There were now 1,200 Mechanics' Institutions, with 200,000 members. Since 1831 newspapers had increased 273 per cent, while the population had increased only 40 per cent, and during the same period a cheap literature, of a religious, moral, and scientific character, had sprung up, such as did not exist when most of the Members of that House were young men. It was a fact, indicative of the great advance which had been made in this direction, that the circulation of Bibles, through the instrumentality of one society alone, had increased, since 1831, 307 per cent, and that of religious tracts 276 per cent. The number of letters passing through the Post Office had increased 560 per cent in twenty years, and during the last thirty years the number of depositors in savings banks had increased 250 per cent, and the amount of deposits 184 per cent. There were now £40,000,000 sterling laid up in the savings banks of this country by 1,503,916 depositors. The Provident Institutions had £3,000,000 of deposits, and possessed capital to the amount of £11,360,000. The Temperance Societies contained 3,000,000 of members, of whom one-half were children under the age of fifteen. Then, as to the diminution in the amount of crime, while the commitments in 1831 were 19,647, in 1859 they were only 16,674. There was now a great amount of authority to show that the cost of education, if they went on at the same rate as they were now doing, would shortly be upwards of £2,000,000 annually. The capitation grants, which in 1854 amounted only to £5,000, had this year reached the enormous sum of £77,000. There appeared to him to be a vice in the training of schoolmasters at the public expense. He saw no better reason for doing so than for training, lawyers, doctors, or farmers, at the public expense. A number of the persons who had been thus trained were in the habit of leaving the profession, and taking other employments to which the training they had got enabled them to aspire. Boys were selected for their literary efficiency before their characters or principles were established, and brought up as schoolmasters, though, as had been shown by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire, in such a position moral qualifications were infinitely superior to cleverness. He would appeal to the Government to give some weight to the opinion of those Gentlemen, who from the beginning had been connected with the system, and who had now come forward to warn them of the lengths to which, if unchecked, it would proceed. Sir James Kay Shuttleworth, who might be regarded as the founder of the system, stated that he expected that after a few years—

“A new series of operations might commence, by which the charge of public education might be gradually transferred from the Consolidated Fund to the local sources of income—school pence and subscriptions.”

Mr. Harry Chester, formerly Assistant Secretary of the Committee of Council on Education and Vice President of the Society of Arts, in an “Address to the United Association of Schoolmasters of Great Britain,” 27th December, 1860, says—

“Parliamentary grants appear to have a natural inevitable tendency to extend themselves upwards; and we must be prepared to see the area of their incidence constantly extended, not only from little children to young persons and adults, but also from the poor by degrees to the middle classes. The line of the Poor Law—the line of destitution, is a clear line of demarcation between classes; but above that line I believe it is not possible to draw permanently any satisfactory line of demarcation between those whom the State ought and ought not to assist in procuring education.”

Mr. Chester condemned the “stereotypic power” of governmental action—its “too great rigidity of regulation”—the “monopoly which it gives of the privilege of teaching with a salary derived partly from the national funds”—“the cramping and dwarfing of power” of a system of “protection” in education, equally as in agriculture, shipping, and manufactures; and he says the voluntary system of education is much more likely than the governmental one “to produce a robust, masculine, character,” and “power of self-government.” He adds—

“I conceive that the time has arrived when all the grants of the Committee of Council on Education should be made on a slowly expiring scale, in order that the promoters of schools might clearly understand that the aid of the Government was not to be permanently given; but was intended to enable them to grow up to independence.”

Mr. Tremenhore, a gentleman of great ability and experience, who had been Inspector of Schools from 1839, and was now Inspector of Mines, in his letter to the Education Commissioners, proposed to reduce the education grants by at least two-thirds of their whole amount within ten years. He maintained that the large expenditure on the training of teachers and capitation grants was unnecessary, a waste of public money—not successful in its results—not giving the best kind of teachers—greatly diminishing voluntary subscriptions to schools and training colleges, and injuring the independent spirit of the people. Mr. Tremenhore further said—

“If the contributions from voluntary sources in support of training colleges were brought back to and only moderately increased beyond what they were in 1853, the training of the whole required number of teachers could be provided for without Government aid.”

He showed that the incomes of twenty-eight training colleges from voluntary sources in 1853 was £45,000, whereas the incomes of twenty-six of them had in 1858 fallen to £22,000; and he thought the system of pupil teachers better fitted to produce clever teachers than teachers “whose moral character, disposition, taste, and inclinations best fitted them for that sphere of duty.” The statements contained in the Report of the Commission had also had the effect of inducing Dr. Vaughan, the editor of the British Quarterly Review, who in 1847 strongly supported Government aid to education, to state that in his opinion popular education had now acquired such a position that the Government might safely leave it for the future to the community; and he also complained of over-education, and educating the middle classes at the public expense. He (Mr. Baines) would conclude by reminding the House that the views of a minority of the Commissioners of Education had been expressed in favour of the entire discontinuance of Government interference. That minority held that in a country like England the Government had ordinarily no educational duties, except towards those who were the victims of destitution, vagrancy, or crime; that the Government should abstain from making grants in aid of education, except towards the building of schools, and that the present annual grants should be gradually withdrawn, the Government confining its aid to Union schools, reformatories, &c., and to developing the sources of public charities which might be applicable to popular education. The minority further stated their opinion to be, that it was unwise to take off a burden which rightfully appertained to parents, and to impose it upon the State, and that the Government would not be able to control the growing expenditure which the development of the present system would necessitate. Having given expression to these views, he (Mr. Baines) would content himself by saying that while he was a firm friend of popular education, and should never feel satisfied till it became universal, he was convinced it would be better for the country, and that it was sounder in principle, that the system of education should be one of perfect freedom, and that the Government should leave the people, as in religion, the press, and industry, entirely to their own independent exertions. He was convinced that in a country like this, freedom would ultimately produce higher education and higher national character than any system which placed education under Government support and control.

MR. HENLEY: As I interrupted the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Education in his remarks respecting the National Society I wish to say a few words in explanation. I now hold in my hand the printed terms of union of that society, and the first is that children are to be instructed in the Scriptures and Catechism of the Established Church. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to think that the Committee of the National Society had been hardly acting fairly by the subscribers of that society. But he omitted to state that the original terms were these—instead of “the children,” the words “every child” were used. That was deliberately altered for the purpose, and it was altered not to “the children” but to “all children” about ten or eleven years back. It was again altered to “the children” for the express purpose of meeting cases which occurred in the country, where it might be desirable, under the discretion of the clergyman, to let in children without the strict application of the rules. The second rule of the society is this—“With respect to such instruction the school is to be under the superintendence of the parochial clergy.” It goes on to say that if any dispute arises between the clergyman and the managers the matter is to be referred to the Bishop of the diocese, and his decision is to be final. This matter having been so formally brought before the Committee, though without any notice to the National Society, I thought it could not be wrong to state the views of the National Society, and, therefore, I will state their opinion, expressed so recently as the 5th of December, when they came to the conclusion that the rules which relate to the giving of religious instruction in the schools are so framed as to allow clergymen liberty in the application of them to the several children, and also to enable the clergymen, in the several parishes, to make alterations in the practice of the schools, so as to adapt them to the wants and circumstances of the place, due regard being had to an honest conformity to the purposes for which the society is incorporated.

MR. H. A. BRUCE said, he had heard with pleasure the fairness and the moderation of tone in which the case of the Dissenters and the National Society had been put by the right hon. Gentleman. The National Society was not asked to give up its rights of teaching the Catechism. All that was asked was that when Dissenters were called on to assist in the formation of a National Society's school in a district in which there was a large body of Dissenters, a conscience clause should be inserted. The right hon. Gentleman said that Dissenters as a body did not object to learn the Catechism. He admitted that vast numbers of them went to national schools, and a large proportion did learn the Catechism. The question, however, having now been formally raised, must be settled, and it was most important that it should be settled in reference to parts of the country like that from which he came, where nine-tenths of the population were Dissenters, but where the proprietors of the land and the largest contributors to the schools were Churchmen. In the majority of cases the clergymen did not insist upon the Church Catechism being repeated by Baptists, for instance; and if that was so, why should they not square the theory with the practice. The case of the ragged schools was a proof that the interests of religion would not be neglected, though there was no connection with any religious denomination. There was no religious difficulty in these schools, nor need there be in any case where religion was taught irrespective of denominational distinctions. He knew personally that that was so, for it had been tried in a school with which he was connected. Anybody who had heard the speech of the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Baines) would have supposed they were embarked in a course of reckless expenditure, but that was, in truth, by no means the case. It had been shown that in 1859 they expended £761,000 upon 821,000 children; whereas, in 1861, they expended £803,000 upon 941,000, showing an increased expenditure of only £40,000, with an increase of 120,000 children. He considered that the four or five millions which had been expended had been well spent in raising the standard of education. It was asked why should they take the step they were about to take, when they had so lately removed the taxes upon knowledge; the answer was that they wished people to be rendered able to avail themselves of the increased means of acquiring information. The effect of the spread of education was shown in this, that within the last three years especially there had been a great diminution of crime; and money could not be better spent than in producing such a result. His own opinion was that the schoolmasters were not at all too highly educated, for it was desirable that a high class of education should be in some degree disseminated among the working-classes. He should support the proposition of the Government, but he joined in the regret that the very poorest classes were not reached to the extent that was desirable; although, no doubt, a great deal had been done in this direction, for the larger portions of the grants were given in large towns where the poorest classes were.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he did not mean to enter upon the general question, though he felt himself tempted to reply to the hon. Gentleman who last spoke that it did not follow, because the poorest classes were to be found in our large towns, and that the principal grants were made to the towns, that, therefore, the very poorest classes in those towns were reached. He would not enter upon the topics referred to in the interesting speech of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe), for, though his explanation was very clear, it was difficult to understand exactly what the working of the Minute to which he had referred would be on many points till it was laid before them. He confessed he was surprised to find that the Government were prepared so soon to express their opinions on the recommendations of the Commissioners. He had thought that those recommendations would have required longer consideration than they appeared to have received from the Government. But he only rose now to call the attention of the Committee to the mode in which the Education Estimates were prepared and submitted to the House. In other departments the Estimates were prepared and submitted to the Treasury, and the Treasury had the power of exercising some discretion regarding them. But in the case of the Education Estimates neither the Treasury nor even the department itself could exercise hardly any control over them, because they did not, like other Estimates, depend on what was estimated might be required for the year, but on what the public might demand in the shape of grants in the course of the year. It was highly important that all Minutes involving the expenditure of money should be submitted to the Treasury, and approved of by them before they were published. He presumed that the opinion of the Cabinet and of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was taken upon the Minute, but he must urge upon those who had the control of the Educational department that the Treasury ought always to be consulted on the framing of these Minutes, since they really governed the expenditure.

MR. WHALLEY thought the House incurred great responsibility in voting so large an amount of money over the expenditure of which it had no control. The relation in which the Privy Council stood to the inspectors deserved attention. Certain gentlemen recently wrote to the Committee of Privy Council to complain of irrelevant and inaccurate statements in the report of one of the inspectors. It might have been supposed that it was the duty of the Privy Council to supervise and check these reports and to keep the writers within proper bounds. The secretary of the Committee of Education, however, was directed to inform these gentlemen that the Committee of Education could not answer for the statements of individual inspectors, and must leave the matter to such notice as it might receive in Parliament. So that Parliament, with its other multifarious duties, had thrown upon it the duty of examining the reports of these inspectors. No less than £162,000 had been granted for the education of Roman Catholics exclusively, and it was left entirely to Roman Catholic inspectors to see how that money was expended. One of these inspectors had gone so far as to show how much more admirably was the influence of Romanism on social and moral conduct of nations and individuals than Protestantism. He (Mr. Whalley) looked upon that as a great breach of duty upon the part of the inspector; he had no right to make use of the public time and money for the purpose of entering into a disquisition on the relative merits of Protestant and the Roman Catholic religions. If the grant was to be administered in such a manner it would afford an additional argument in favour of the views of the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Baines), who, representing the common sense and feelings of the great majority of men practically acquainted with the subject, maintained that the public purse should be gradually closed against the demands made upon it for education. He would now move that the capitation grant No. 4, for England and Wales, which was put down as £77,000 this year, be reduced by £12,000, when it would stand at the same amount as last year. He had been informed that in the neighbourhood of London these capitation grants had been demanded, and granted, by those who had intended to use them for purposes at variance with the intention of Parliament—namely, for the establishment or sustenance of nunneries in connection with the schools for which the grants ought to be applied.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That the item of £77,000, for Capitation Grants in England and Wales, be reduced by the sum of £12,000.”

MR. HENNESSY said, he wished to remind the hon. Gentleman that the Vote he proposed to cut down affected all the schools. The discussion that had taken place had been most instructive to Irish Members. Hon. Members on both sides of the House had agreed that they would not vote money for public instruction unless provision were made in the schools for the religious education of the children. Schools for secular instruction were not to receive one farthing of the public money which was to be distributed by the religious denomination for religious instruction. The principal was in his view a sound one. But what would hon. Members do when the Vote of £280,000 for education in Ireland came before them? There the principle adopted was diametrically opposite, for in Ireland any school in which religion was taught was deprived of the grant. This Vote differed from every other item in the Civil Service Estimates in many respects, and he contended that the object for which the money was given could be promoted by other means than the expenditure of public money. They had been told that the repeal of the taxes on knowledge was a step in the way of promoting education, and he believed that the opening of the whole of the Civil Service to free competition would create a great stimulus to education in the country.

MR. DILLWYN said, he took exception to the declaration of the hon. Member, that there was a general agreement in favour of the state giving religious instruction to the people. A large minority in the House adopted a different view. He believed that education could be given more effectually if combined with religion, but it was not the business of the State to take upon itself the religious instruction of the people. How could the State, if it did so, teach any other religion but its own—the religion of the Church with which it was exclusively connected? The business of the State was to provide the means of instruction to the poorer classes, but not to give instruction, except to the criminal and pauper population, with respect to whom the State stood in loco parentis. He concurred with the hon. Member for Peterborough in objecting to an increase of the capitation grants; for he did not desire that the State purse should be used for the purpose of educating those who were able to educate themselves. He was afraid that in working out the proposed Minute the expenses would be increased.

MR. PEASE said, he was of opinion that no case had been made out for the withdrawal of the capitation grants, and he thought that the Committee would not constitute itself the judge of the sincerity of the different professors of religion. According to the principle on which the money was given the Roman Catholics were entitled to their share. He did not concur in the opinion of the hon. Member for Leeds as to the power of voluntary efforts to meet the necessary expenses; but he held that education would be the cheapest thing in the world provided it was conducted on the right principle, for it tended to diminish crime, and to reduce the expenses of the convict establishments.

MR. LOWE said, he agreed with the hon. Member for Peterborough, that the remarks of the inspectors to which he had called attention were irrelevant. He had taken measures to prevent the repetition of such observations, and he hoped that after this explanation the hon. Member would withdraw his Amendment.

(2.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £77,484, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Expenses of the General Management of the Department of Science and Art, of the Schools throughout the Kingdom in connection with the Department, and of the Geological Surveys of Great Britain and Ireland, &c. to the 31st day of March, 1862."

MR. LOWE explained that the Vote included a sum of £6,000 for the Royal Dublin Society. It was his intention, if the Committee would permit him, to take that sum and hold it until the Government could come to some terms with the society as to the opening of the gardens at Glasnevin on Sundays. But a short time had elapsed since the debate which took place the other night, and he should be unwilling to omit the Vote. He would, however, take care that the money was not spent until the society had been placed in a proper relation to the State.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he objected to the holding of the withdrawal of the grant in terrorem over the society to compel it to accede to the wishes of the Government. It was a novel principle, and, he thought, an objectionable one. He would, therefore, move the omission of the item from the Vote.

MR. GREGORY said, that the same thing was done a short time ago with respect to the Vote for the Hibernian Academy. He was glad that the right hon. Gentleman was about to take the course which he had now proposed, because he believed that the object which they all had at heart could be accomplished without acting harshly towards the society, which was one of the most useful which existed either in Ireland or in this country.

LORD NAAS said, he thought it would be a great misfortune if a petty quarrel about the opening of the gardens should cause inconvenience to such a valuable institution as the Royal Dublin Society. He hoped the dispute would soon terminate, and from letters he had received he had reason to know that many of the members of the society were willing to throw the responsibility of opening the gardens on the Government, and place them under the same regulations as those governing Kew and other public gardens, and it was to be hoped that no further obstacle would be offered to an amicable arrangement being come to.

MR. LEFROY said, he thought that if Parliament had earlier pronounced a decided opinion the present unpleasant position of affairs might have been avoided. He trusted that the dispute would be amicably arranged.

MR. CARDWELL said, that the course which had been adopted by the Government had been dictated by a sincere desire to show to that excellent society all the respect to which it was entitled. By one of its resolutions the society expressly recognized the right of Parliament to prescribe the mode in which the money voted should be spent, and he hoped that after the decided opinion which had been expressed by the House there would be no further difficulty in regard to this matter. In the case of the Hibernian Academy no Vote was taken, but after arrangements had been made the money was advanced by the Treasury and voted in the following year. In this instance, considering the importance of the Royal Dublin Society, the amount of the Vote, and the many other useful undertakings in which the society was engaged, he thought that it would be better to adopt the course which was now proposed.

MR. KINNAIRD said, that as he understood that anything like a threat was abandoned, he would withdraw his opposition to the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman.

LORD WILLIAM GRAHAM said, he would move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £15,000, which was asked for the erection of schools and residences at South Kensington. If these buildings were constructed according to Captain Fowkes's plan, they would involve the erection of an architectural elevation which would cost £200,000 or £300,000, and upon which Parliament had had no opportunity of pronouncing any opinion. If the schools and residences were to be erected, let them be so built as not to involve the necessity for an ornamental frontage. The plan, however, involved two ornamental frontages, one to the west and the other to the south. The schools and residences for which the Vote was now asked would occupy almost the whole frontage towards the Exhibition building. The Government would not, he thought, be justified in committing the House to the adoption of the plan without further inquiry, and, that being his opinion, he should move that the item of £15,000 be omitted.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the item of £15,000, for Schools and Residences at South Kensington, be omitted from the proposed Vote."

MR. LOWE said, the buildings to which the noble Lord alluded would in themselves be perfectly plain and unornamented, so that they might be adapted to any style of frontage which might be decided upon. It was an error, therefore, to suppose that the Committee, in assenting to the present Vote, would be pledging themselves to the erection of an ornamental frontage.

LORD WILLIAM GRAHAM said, he was satisfied with the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman, and would withdraw his Amendment.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. CARDWELL said, the total amount of the Vote for Public Education in Ireland, which it was his duty to ask the Committee to grant for the present year, was £285,377, which showed an increase of £14,350 over the Vote of last year. That increase came for the most part under three heads:—The salaries of teachers, in which there was an increase of £9,950; the distribution of books, on which the increase was £3,000; and the model schools, in connection with which the increase was something about the same amount. The principal items of the Vote were those for the salaries of the teachers, £186,000; for the model school department, £33,000; and for inspection, £23,000. For that sum of money there had been maintained in the course of the year 1860 a number of schools amounting to 5,623, the total number of pupils at any one time in connection with the board having amounted to 804,000, while the average daily attendance during the past year was 252,000. In adverting to that point he might observe that for the first time in the history of those schools there had last year been a small decrease occasioned in the number of pupils in attendance, owing, he believed, almost exclusively to the unusual inclemency of the weather. Last year he pointed out to the House the satisfactory circumstance that the number of pupils who had been calculated upon when the system began upon a population of 8,000,000 had been obtained upon a population not amounting to 6,000,000, evidencing an amount of popular education not equalled perhaps in any other country. There had been an increase of 136 in the course of the year in the number of schools maintained, the number in the former year having been 5,496, and in the year that had just closed 5,632. Nor were the benefits of the system confined to any particular part of Ireland. On the contrary, the schools numbered in Ulster, 2,064; in Munster, 1,405; in Leinster 1,325; and in Connaught, 838; so that they might be said to be scattered equally throughout the country. He might also state that the total number of new schools brought into connection with the board amounted last year to 230; of which 114 were in Ulster; 43 in Munster, 30 in Leinster, and 43 in Connaught. Those schools had been taken up by 186 patrons, of whom there were 30 clerical belonging to the Church of England and 20 lay; Presbyterians, 18 clerical and 9 lay; Dissenters, 4 clerical and 4 lay; of Roman Catholics, 90 clerical and 11 lay—a remarkable proof that the public support which the system so abundantly deserved had not been withheld in any part of the island or by any section of the community. An examination of the number of pupils for the last quarter of 1860 afforded evidence of the same nature. In that quarter of the whole number of pupils, which was 548,000, of Roman Catholics there had been 455,000; of the Church of England, 30,800; Presbyterian, 59,000; and of other denominations, 2,670. Taking the whole year upon a population of less than 6,000,000, there had been not less than 668,000 Roman Catholic pupils, 86,000 Presbyterians, 45,000 of the Church of England, and 3,800 of other denominations, making in the whole 804,000 pupils, or, in other words, 668,000 Roman Catholics, and 135,000 Protestants, a result such as no other system of education probably could show. But it had been said, and a great deal of discussion had taken place upon the point in that House and in Ireland, that the system was falsely represented to be a mixed system—that the Protestants were brought up by themselves, and the Roman Catholics by themselves—that it was thus practically a denominational system. But what was the meaning of a mixed school? Was the term confined exclusively to schools where the pupils were mixed? If so, it must follow that the benefits of the mixed system could not be applied to that large part of the country where the poor population was exclusively of one denomination. Neither in regard to the historical nature of the system, nor in regard to its moral advantages was it just to limit its benefits in that manner. So long ago as 1846 the Commissioners reported that the system of national education which was really designed to be established, and which, in fact, had been established, did not exclude children of any denomination; they might admit, without doing violence to the conscience, all those who wished for education, whatever might be their religious creed. That was the true principle of the system, and the one best adapted to the circumstances of the country. It was of great importance to train the rising generation of the country on a system of education common to them all as Christians, so that they might acquire those general principles and habits which would enable them to work together in all the relations of after life as fellow-citizens. A return moved for by the hon. Member for Youghal showed that of 5,411 schools in operation in Ireland 2,898, or more than half the number, were mixed schools. Of 91,486 Protestants and 478,000 Roman Catholics receiving education, 80,117 of the former and 215,000 of the latter were educated in mixed schools. It was alleged as an objection that there was only a small minority of Protestants in some schools and of Roman Catholics in others, so that they were not properly "mixed;" but when did pupils require protection more than when they were in a minority like that? In point of fact, however, these minorities were by no means so frequent as was alleged; and did not detract from the "mixed" character of the system. Another test of the efficacy of the system was that in mixed schools the average attendance was 102, while in the separate Protestant or Roman Catholic schools the attendance varied from ten to fifty. He contended that these were results, in a country circumstanced like Ireland, which the founders of the system never could have been so sanguine as to have anticipated would have been brought about by that time.

The next question was whether the system had any hold on the affections of the people. Originally it was almost exclusively confined to the class for whose benefit no doubt it was chiefly designed—the Roman Catholic majority of the country. In 1840 the Presbyterian body became firmly attached to the system; and in 1859 it received the adherence of the Wesleyans—a body important not from its numbers but from its position and principles. In 1860 took place that correspondence with the venerable primate with which the House was acquainted, which resulted in the accession of many additional schools belonging to the Church of England to the national system. In short, the increase in the number of schools was due not to this denomination or to that, but to all collectively, and to clerical as well as lay patrons. Thus had the system grown and prospered until it now embraced the whole country, every province, and every creed; and in spite of the opposition which still remained in certain quarters, he had no doubt that it would continue to strengthen its hold on the affections of the Irish people and on the confidence of Parliament. The education which was afforded in Ireland would bear strict comparison with that in England. It was given with great skill and ability, and the Irish school-books, it was well known, were used wherever the English language was spoken. It must be owned, however, that the system was defective in regard to the irregular attendance of children. While a large number of pupils were on the books only about a half were in average daily attendance. The power of dealing with that evil was by improving the quality of the masters, because on the ability of the masters the attendance must depend. The hon. Member for Dungarvan had given notice of his intention to call attention to the remuneration of the masters, but he thought the Committee would agree with him, that a good deal had been done during the last two years to improve their condition. The average payment to the male class teachers was £26 11s. 4d., and to females £22 12s. That was the payment from the funds voted by Parliament, but it was not the whole payment, nor was it intended that it should be the whole payment, because those schools flourished best where a small voluntary payment was made by the parents for the attendance of their children. It was desirable that the children should pay, and he hoped that the local contributions would increase as the system was extended. It was encouraging to find that the local contributions had increased from

£26,000 in 1832, to £43,000 in 1860. The average increase of payment to masters and mistresses from local contributions was only £8 15s., and, therefore, he was not prepared to contend that their position was as good as it ought to be. Great efforts, however, had been made by Parliament to better their condition. Large sums had been liberally given by Parliament, and he trusted that the growing liberality of private individuals would supply the deficiency of their salaries. In obtaining this Vote last year the Government stated what changes they intended to introduce. A great controversy on the principles of the system had arisen from many quarters, but, confirmed by the knowledge of the firm purpose of Parliament, the Government felt it their duty to return a firm, yet courteous, refusal to every proposal which invited them to break into the cardinal principles of that system. At the same time, the Government expressed their perfect readiness to make any change which, consistently with those principles, might extend the usefulness of that system. With regard to the model schools, they stated that when the Commissioners had completed the building of twenty-six, those Commissioners should engage themselves to build no more without the express sanction of Parliament obtained on the proposition of the Government. In the course of last year strong applications which had long been made from the important town of Enniskillen were acceded to by the Commissioners, and now the number of twenty-six model schools having been completed no more would be built, except with the direct sanction of Parliament. With regard to the books, they had attained an amount of general circulation and popularity such as no other books for the education of children had ever reached. But it was thought that, in order to keep up with the progress of knowledge since they were written, they ought to be reviewed. It was also thought that in the books there was an absence of attractiveness and of everything local, national, and patriotic as regarded Ireland, which might be easily remedied, while retaining the spirit and usefulness of the books. It was interesting to find that they had anticipated the conclusion since announced by the Royal Commissioners, who had examined into the system, and who said schoolmasters had reason to complain that the books abounded in words needlessly abstruse, and beyond the comprehension of children; that the poetry was selected from inferior sources; that the dry outlines of geography were unsuitably introduced; that the history epitome was destitute of picturesqueness, and incapable of striking the imagination or awakening the attention of a child, and that science was not explained, as it should be, in familiar language, and with illustrations from real life. Confirmed by that authority the Board were about to appoint a committee of their own body to remedy the defects which had been pointed out by the Commissioners. The next point was the change of the rules by which aid for building would in future be given, as formerly, not merely to the schools vested in the Commissioners in their corporate capacity, but to schools vested in trustees, and approved by the Board. Every one who had seen the Irish school-houses must have been struck by their inferiority to those in England. It was most important in a sanitary view that they should be commodious, and it was desirable that there should be divisions of class-rooms and school-rooms suitable for the purpose of teaching. For years past there had been a practical prohibition of any aid from the State towards building schools in Ireland, and last year it was proposed to remove the restriction by the arrangement to which he had referred. The subject had been under the consideration of the Board, and he hoped to hear that they had adopted resolutions to carry the intentions of the Government into effect. There remained the last and most important question—the constitution of the Board itself. The Government felt that in a country circumstanced like Ireland half should be of one religious communion, and half of the other. The principle had been carried out, and the list of members contained names which must command respect and affection in Ireland, and earn the confidence of the House of Commons. The Board consisted of six members of the Established Church and four Presbyterians, making together ten Protestants, and ten Roman Catholics. The names which had been added were those of Lord Dunraven, Chief Justice Monahan, Chief Baron Pigot, Mr. Waldron, M.P. for Tipperary, Mr. Lentaigue, and Mr. O'Hagan, and the Board was so constituted as to represent every class of opinion among the supporters of the system of national education. The system, planned thirty years ago by the Earl of Derby, and supported by every Government which had succeeded since, was an institution which owed its success to the great desire of the Irish people to acquire knowledge, and to the admirable manner in which it had been conducted through the liberality of Parliament. It had met with difficulties, but he hoped those difficulties had been in a great degree surmounted, and he trusted the Committee would grant the money then asked for with that ready cordiality with which they had voted it on every former occasion.

MR. BUTT said, he thought the Committee could not enter into a discussion of the general question of national education in Ireland at midnight. He was, therefore, disposed to move that the Chairman should report Progress; but he would be satisfied with an assurance from the right hon. Chief Secretary that before the Vote was finally taken he would give the House an opportunity of discussing the great question whether Ireland was entitled to the same freedom in religious instruction which England enjoyed. The Vote for education in Ireland had gradually risen from £30,000 to nearly £100,000, and it now comprised various items which he was sure Parliament never contemplated. Considerable sums of money were now asked for normal establishments, training departments, model schools, model literary schools, railway model national schools, navigation schools, agricultural schools, industrial agricultural schools, and model industrial schools. In many of those schools there were teachers of music and teachers of drawing. Such items did not properly belong to a Vote intended for the education of the poor.

MR. CARDWELL stated, that the industrial and agricultural schools were not new items; they had appeared in the Estimates before. Complaints used to be made that the schools were not industrial enough, and the Government had reduced the amount for agricultural schools. He hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would permit the Vote to be taken to-night, reserving what he had to say on the general question till the Report.

MR. LONGFIELD said, he hoped the debate would be adjourned at once. He could not consent to pass the Vote then, and allow the discussion to be taken upon the Report. The discussion of the general question should be finished before the Vote was agreed to. He dissented from almost every word which had fallen from the Chief Secretary. He denied that the national system of education prevailing in Ireland had any hold, as the right hon. Gentleman had remarked, upon the affections of the people of Ireland. He asked whether the single Protestant Bishop who had associated himself with it was one most esteemed for his learning and his judgment? He would not say anything upon that point himself; but he was sure nobody else would answer the question in the affirmative. The fact was that the system was thrust upon the Irish people whether they liked it or not. None of the most eminent prelates of the Roman Catholic Church had at all countenanced it. It was a subject of the deepest interest to Ireland, and he was happy to say there was nothing sectarian in the opposition. [Cries of "Progress."] He knew how unpalatable the subject was, especially after the long discussion they had had on the English system; but he wished to say a few words on the objections that were entertained to the system. He denied that it could at all answer the religious wishes of the Irish people, which could only be met by adopting the denominational system, as adopted in England; and he might refer to the Report of the English Education Commissioners as condemning by implication the Irish plan. The right hon. Gentleman had described it as a common system. It was no such thing. It only professed to be a system of common secular education and separate religious instruction. The principle which was held to be essential and vital in England, was altogether discountenanced in Ireland. All parties disapproved it. The memorial of the Irish Roman Catholic Prelates also condemned the system because religion did not run through the whole course of instruction, but was confined to separate and isolated seasons. As a proof that that was the rigid practice of the Board, he might refer to a letter from Mr. Dalton, asking whether, if he placed his school under the National Board, he would be allowed, in the ordinary hours of education, to make any reference to the Bible, and after a good deal of fencing he was at last told that the use of the Bible or the communication of religious instruction in the ordinary school hours was incompatible with the National system. He felt that he might say much more but for the lateness of the hour; but he must enter his protest against the right hon. Gentleman's assertion that the system was at all popular in the country.

MR. HENNESSY moved that the Chairman should report Progress.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he hoped, after the long discussion which had already taken place on the subject, and as hon. Gentlemen would have another opportunity of speaking on the Report, the Vote would be allowed to be taken that night.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he was astonished at the statement of the noble Lord. The long discussion was confined to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman and the speeches of two hon. Members. There was no question of more importance to be discussed in that House than the Irish system of education, and if it were not the Irish Members had a full right to discuss a system which at least materially affected themselves.

MR. BUTT said, he felt himself perfectly justified in making an appeal to the noble Lord. He could assure him that the question excited the deepest interest in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cardwell) challenged discussion, and he (Mr. Butt) would, therefore, appeal to the noble Lord whether it was fair to stop it. He hoped the hon. Member would persevere in his Motion that the Chairman report Progress.

MR. CARDWELL said, he was sure that the lively style of the noble Lord opposite would command attention either now or at any other time of night; but if the Irish representatives wished for a fuller discussion of the Vote it was only fair that it should be allowed them. He would, therefore, agree to the Motion for reporting Progress.

Whereupon Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again," put, and agreed to.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported this day.

Committee to sit again this day.

SALMON AND TROUT FISHERIES BILL. COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 (Application of Act),

MR. KENDALL said, that unless Cornwall were excepted from the operation of the Bill its extensive mining interests would be destroyed. The Commissioners stated that to extend the Bill to that country would be to preserve the salmon at a preposterous cost. He begged, therefore, to insert "in the county of Cornwall" after the word Ireland.

MR. CLIVE said, that no precedent could be found for excluding an English county from the operation of a general Bill; and to admit the Amendment would be fatal to the measure, because other counties would immediately put in a claim for a similar indulgence. The Bill contained a proviso in a subsequent clause to the effect that persons should not be liable to penalties where they could show that they had used the best practical means in their power to render such matters harmless, and that would not be very difficult to proprietors of such undertakings as the Cornish mines do. He was ready to insert in the clause words limiting the expenses of applying a remedy to the sum of £200.

MR. KENDALL said, that £200 was a very large sum, but he would agree to £100.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN protested against damaging the great commercial interests of the country for the sake of preserving a few fish.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3 (Commencement of Act),

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, the date at which the Act was to commence was the 1st of September; whereas some of the fisheries were actually let till the middle of October, the close season being in some rivers much later than in others. He would move to insert the words "except as hereinafter provided," in order to enable him to move Amendments at a later stage.

MR. CLIVE said, he believed that the idea that the season in different rivers was different was unfounded.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to; as was also Clause 4.

Clause 5 (Penalty on mixing poisonous substances in rivers),

MR. AYRTON said, that as representing a large constituency who dwelt on the banks of the Thames, he would appeal to the common sense of the Committee and of the country against the provisions of this extraordinary Bill. The issue raised by the clause was whether the people of the country were to live by their industry, or whether industry was to be suppressed that salmon might flourish. It seemed to him that, under the clause, where a manufacexpended £761,000 upon 821,000 children; whereas, in 1861, they expended £803,000 upon 941,000, showing an increased expenditure of only £40,000, with an increase of 120,000 children. He considered that the four or five millions which had been expended had been well spent in raising the standard of education. It was asked why should they take the step they were about to take, when they had so lately removed the taxes upon knowledge; the answer was that they wished people to be rendered able to avail themselves of the increased means of acquiring information. The effect of the spread of education was shown in this, that within the last three years especially there had been a great diminution of crime; and money could not be better spent than in producing such a result. His own opinion was that the schoolmasters were not at all too highly educated, for it was desirable that a high class of education should be in some degree disseminated among the working-classes. He should support the proposition of the Government, but he joined in the regret that the very poorest classes were not reached to the extent that was desirable; although, no doubt, a great deal had been done in this direction, for the larger portions of the grants were given in large towns where the poorest classes were.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he did not mean to enter upon the general question, though he felt himself tempted to reply to the hon. Gentleman who last spoke that it did not follow, because the poorest classes were to be found in our large towns, and that the principal grants were made to the towns, that, therefore, the very poorest classes in those towns were reached. He would not enter upon the topics referred to in the interesting speech of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe), for, though his explanation was very clear, it was difficult to understand exactly what the working of the Minute to which he had referred would be on many points till it was laid before them. He confessed he was surprised to find that the Government were prepared so soon to express their opinions on the recommendations of the Commissioners. He had thought that those recommendations would have required longer consideration than they appeared to have received from the Government. But he only rose now to call the attention of the Committee to the mode in which the Education Estimates were prepared and submitted to the House. In other departments the Estimates were prepared and submitted to the Treasury, and the Treasury had the power of exercising some discretion regarding them. But in the case of the Education Estimates neither the Treasury nor even the department itself could exercise hardly any control over them, because they did not, like other Estimates, depend on what was estimated might be required for the year, but on what the public might demand in the shape of grants in the course of the year. It was highly important that all Minutes involving the expenditure of money should be submitted to the Treasury, and approved of by them before they were published. He presumed that the opinion of the Cabinet and of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was taken upon the Minute, but he must urge upon those who had the control of the Educational department that the Treasury ought always to be consulted on the framing of these Minutes, since they really governed the expenditure.

Mr. WHALLEY thought the House incurred great responsibility in voting so large an amount of money over the expenditure of which it had no control. The relation in which the Privy Council stood to the inspectors deserved attention. Certain gentlemen recently wrote to the Committee of Privy Council to complain of irrelevant and inaccurate statements in the report of one of the inspectors. It might have been supposed that it was the duty of the Privy Council to supervise and check these reports and to keep the writers within proper bounds. The secretary of the Committee of Education, however, was directed to inform these gentlemen that the Committee of Education could not answer for the statements of individual inspectors, and must leave the matter to such notice as it might receive in Parliament. So that Parliament, with its other multifarious duties, had thrown upon it the duty of examining the reports of these inspectors. No less than £162,000 had been granted for the education of Roman Catholics exclusively, and it was left entirely to Roman Catholic inspectors to see how that money was expended. One of these inspectors had gone so far as to show how much more admirably was the influence of Romanism on social and moral conduct of nations and individuals than Protestantism. He (Mr. Whalley) looked upon that as a great breach of duty upon the part of the inspector; he had no right to make use of the public time and money for the purpose of entering into a disquisition on the relative merits of Protestant and the Roman Catholic religions. If the grant was to be administered in such a manner it would afford an additional argument in favour of the views of the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Baines), who, representing the common sense and feelings of the great majority of men practically acquainted with the subject, maintained that the public purse should be gradually closed against the demands made upon it for education. He would now move that the capitation grant No. 4, for England and Wales, which was put down as £77,000 this year, be reduced by £12,000, when it would stand at the same amount as last year. He had been informed that in the neighbourhood of London these capitation grants had been demanded, and granted, by those who had intended to use them for purposes at variance with the intention of Parliament—namely, for the establishment or sustenance of nunneries in connection with the schools for which the grants ought to be applied.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the item of £77,000, for Capitation Grants in England and Wales, be reduced by the sum of £12,000."

MR. HENNESSY said, he wished to remind the hon. Gentleman that the Vote he proposed to cut down affected all the schools. The discussion that had taken place had been most instructive to Irish Members. Hon. Members on both sides of the House had agreed that they would not vote money for public instruction unless provision were made in the schools for the religious education of the children. Schools for secular instruction were not to receive one farthing of the public money which was to be distributed by the religious denomination for religious instruction. The principal was in his view a sound one. But what would hon. Members do when the Vote of £280,000 for education in Ireland came before them? There the principle adopted was diametrically opposite, for in Ireland any school in which religion was taught was deprived of the grant. This Vote differed from every other item in the Civil Service Estimates in many respects, and he contended that the object for which the money was given could be promoted by other means than the expenditure of public money. They had been told that the repeal of the taxes on knowledge was a step in the way of promoting education, and he believed that the opening of the whole of the Civil Service to free competition would create a great stimulus to education in the country.

MR. DILLWYN said, he took exception to the declaration of the hon. Member, that there was a general agreement in favour of the state giving religious instruction to the people. A large minority in the House adopted a different view. He believed that education could be given more effectually if combined with religion, but it was not the business of the State to take upon itself the religious instruction of the people. How could the State, if it did so, teach any other religion but its own—the religion of the Church with which it was exclusively connected? The business of the State was to provide the means of instruction to the poorer classes, but not to give instruction, except to the criminal and pauper population, with respect to whom the State stood in loco parentis. He concurred with the hon. Member for Peterborough in objecting to an increase of the capitation grants; for he did not desire that the State purse should be used for the purpose of educating those who were able to educate themselves. He was afraid that in working out the proposed Minute the expenses would be increased.

MR. PEASE said, he was of opinion that no case had been made out for the withdrawal of the capitation grants, and he thought that the Committee would not constitute itself the judge of the sincerity of the different professors of religion. According to the principle on which the money was given the Roman Catholics were entitled to their share. He did not concur in the opinion of the hon. Member for Leeds as to the power of voluntary efforts to meet the necessary expenses; but he held that education would be the cheapest thing in the world provided it was conducted on the right principle, for it tended to diminish crime, and to reduce the expenses of the convict establishments.

MR. LOWE said, he agreed with the hon. Member for Peterborough, that the remarks of the inspectors to which he had called attention were irrelevant. He had taken measures to prevent the repetition of such observations, and he hoped that after this explanation the hon. Member would withdraw his Amendment.

Notices required by the Standing Orders of the House prior to the Introduction of the Bill to Parliament."

LORD PORTMAN had given notice to move as an Amendment,

"That when in any Bill a Provision is inserted authorizing any Company to subscribe towards, or to guarantee, or to raise any Money in aid of the Undertaking of another Company, which Bill is not brought in by the Company so authorized, Proof shall be required before the Examiner whether the Company so authorized has any Bill before Parliament in which such a Provision could be inserted; in the event of there being such a Bill before Parliament the Examiner shall report the Name or short Title of such Bill to the House; in the event of there being no such Bill before Parliament the Examiner shall report whether Proof has been given that the Company so authorized has consented to such Subscription Guarantee, or raising of Money at a Meeting of the proprietors of such Company, held specially for that Purpose, and that such Provision was approved by the Proprietors of the ordinary Shares of the Company, present in Person or by Proxy, holding at least Three-Fourths of the paid-up Capital of the Company represented at such meeting, such Proprietors being qualified to vote at the Meeting in right of such Capital only; in case no such Proof has been given no such Bill shall proceed without the special Order of the House."

The noble Lord said, that he had the same object in view as the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees, but he thought his proposal would avoid the very large expense which would be entailed in the case of small lines, if the great Companies who were to assist were made joint promoters of the Bill, in the manner suggested by the original motion. He intended by the words in the last paragraph to provide that the Bill should not proceed in the absence of proof of the Order being complied with, precisely in the same way as when the Examiner reported that the Standing Orders of the House had not been complied with; and if those words did not give effect to that intention he had no objection to alter them. Any suggestion from the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees came with great weight, and any counter-proposal from another Peer came with greatly diminished weight; but he thought the safest course would be to be well-advised before either Resolution was adopted, and in a matter of such difficulty as this he hoped his noble Friend would consent to the appointment of a Select Committee, who, in a few hours, might consider the point and advise the House upon it.

LORD EBURY said, he regarded the ordinary shareholders in a railway company as the mortgagors and the debenture holders as mortgagees; and he, therefore, thought the former should have a voice in any increase of debt which would diminish the value of their reversion. All lines of railway conferred great benefits, especially on the working classes, who were enabled to travel over them, and many lines could not be undertaken without the assistance of larger companies. He trusted, therefore, that their Lordships would pause before they threw difficulties in the way of the construction of these small lines, which were often of the greatest value to agricultural districts.

EARL GREY said, that no one could dispute that railways were the source of immense advantage to the country, but it was greatly to be lamented that so many millions of capital had been uselessly wasted on those undertakings. It was quite clear that if there had been a proper system of railway legislation a greater amount of accommodation would have been afforded to the public at the same time that a higher amount of interest would have been secured to the shareholders. Both the noble Peers who had spoken concurred in stating that under the existing system there was great abuse, and it was the duty of Parliament to guard against that abuse as much as possible. Parliament ought not to be asked to pass Bills for branch railways on the faith that great companies would subscribe unless the question was fairly brought before the shareholders of those companies whether they would subscribe or not. The directors should not be permitted to engage in undertakings which could not pay, and which could only result in loss to their shareholders, without first having their sanction. It was not very material in what manner the difficulty was met, but on the whole he preferred the Amendment, with the omission of a few words towards the conclusion of it.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, he was not surprised that their Lordships should have digressed into a discussion of much more importance than the consideration of a Standing Order. There had been a great waste of money upon railways as compared with the accommodation which they afforded, and this was partly owing to the vicious tribunal which dealt with them, and partly to the assistance given by the great companies to new lines, not in consideration of the wants of the districts, but of the extent of territory which they could thereby secure against their rivals. He agreed that the shareholders in large companies should give their assent to any scheme on which it was proposed that their money should be lent, and he thought the Amendment of the noble Lord (Lord Portman) would give effect to that object in a more temperate manner than the original proposition of the Chairman of Committees. It was mostly on compulsion that the great companies had given their assistance to the small lines. Their Lordships ought to be very cautious how they imposed further checks on the construction of small lines, which were essential to the improvement of the country.

THE EARL OF LUCAN hoped their Lordships would pause before they adopted either noble Lord's Resolution. He had had considerable experience of railways in Ireland, and if this Resolution had been in force for the last eight or ten years the progress of the railway system in that country would have been very much impeded.

EARL GRANVILLE said, there could be no doubt that the tendency of this Standing Order would be to check the promotion of branch lines, which, in many cases, were very advantageous to the country. The two noble Lords who had spoken first on this subject agreed as to the existence of the evil, but differed as to the remedy to be applied, and of the two he thought it would be much safer to appoint a Select Committee, composed chiefly of noble Lords who were in the habit of taking part in the private business of the House, than to rush into the adoption of the Resolution which the noble Lord opposite had moved.

LORD REDESDALE said, he was perfectly prepared to acquiesce in any proposition which would tend to remove the evil of which he complained, and if noble Lords would give their time and attention to a Select Committee he should be very glad to have the matter referred to it. He must protest, however, against the doctrine that great Companies should be compelled to subscribe their money to make lines which were in no way profitable to them. It was not fair that because many of their directors happened to be mixed up a great deal with persons who were concerned in getting up these schemes that, therefore, the shareholders should be injured by having their money subscribed to lines which could be no benefit to them.

The small remuneration which railway property now earned was owing chiefly, he believed, to competition to get hold of districts which did not enter into their original schemes. Railway companies had shown too great eagerness to become great concerns, and with that view had undertaken matters which did not repay them the price they had to pay. What he desired was that railway companies should carefully consider all these points before they came forward to undertake new schemes. He would consult with the noble Lord opposite as to the appointment of a Select Committee.

Motion (by Leave of the House) withdrawn.

Select Committee appointed,

"To inquire into the Manner in which Companies shall be authorized to subscribe or guarantee any Money to be employed in the Undertaking of any other Company." The Lords following were named of the Committee; the Committee to meet on Monday next, at Four o'Clock:—

STATE OF TURKEY—ADDRESS FOR PAPERS.

VISCOUNT STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE, moved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for

"Copies or Extracts of any Correspondence which has passed between the Foreign Department and Her Majesty's Embassy at Constantinople in the last and present Years on the Subject of Financial or Administrative Reforms in Turkey, especially of such as were proclaimed in the late Sultan's Hatt-i-homayoon of the Year 1856, and more particularly since the Accession of the reigning Sultan,"

The noble Lord said, it will be within your Lordships' recollection that about a fortnight ago I put a question to the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs relative to the late demise of the Sultan Abdul Medjid. I did not anticipate at that time that it would be necessary for me to go at any length into the question, because the answer which I received was sufficiently satisfactory; but it may also be within your recollection that my noble and gallant Friend opposite (the Earl of Hardwicke), stimulated by the interest which he takes in all public matters, and especially in this particular subject, made what I may be allowed to call an onslaught, not upon me

In several cases during the present century England has interfered, not only by her counsel and mediation, but with fleets and armies. And it is natural to ask the question whether all these costly sacrifices are to be thrown to the winds, or whether we are further to seek to realize the results for which we have so strenuously endeavoured. The alternative presented to us is, whether we will see the whole of that part of Europe engaged for a lengthened period in a sanguinary struggle, and perhaps ourselves take a share in the spoliation, which must be the result of that struggle; or, whether we will take such measures as may prevent the contingency of such a struggle arising at all. I think we should expose ourselves to just reproach, and incur a deep responsibility, if, at a moment of so much importance, we left it at all in doubt whether the policy we have always pursued is to be continued. From the accounts recently received from Constantinople I am inclined to think the course of the present Sultan has been satisfactory. He seems to have acted in a manner that does credit to his wisdom and sense of justice. But, at the same time, we must not confide too entirely on these reports. I think some of these statements are founded on great exaggerations. Thus, we have heard that nearly 2,000 ladies have been dismissed from the late Sultan's seraglio. Now, there are only four of the wives of the Sultan who are recognized by law, but there is a minor rank of wives that extends to three others. But even if we double this number, which would be a fair allowance, we must suppose that each of these ladies had seventy or eighty attendants. I have no doubt that my noble Friend has more authentic information than I can possess, and I trust that he will be able to tell us whether present appearances are such as to justify the hopes which are entertained. Such being the case, it is most important that there should be no mistake as to the opinion of this House. The Sultan will be exposed to unpopularity amongst persons connected with his own immediate circle in prosecuting the reforms which have been promised; it would be most disastrous if that unpopularity were encouraged by any mistaken idea of the feelings of this House, and it would on the other hand, no doubt, cheer him to find that his policy meets with the cordial support and sympathy of Her Majesty's Government. I trust your Lordships will allow that the view I have taken of this subject is consistent with historic truth and with the policy which has long been pursued by this country. I cannot exaggerate the importance of continuing in the same line of policy. But we are told that that policy is useless—that the Turkish Government is exposed to so many dangers that it is impossible to prevent them entirely, and that our utmost efforts cannot guard against that catastrophe which we all dread. There is no doubt as to the extent of the danger to which the Ottoman Empire is exposed, arising from a long continued system of mal-administration, which has reduced that country to its present unsafe, and, in some respects, degraded condition. Still, as I have said, there has been progress in recent times. Strangers who have visited the country have noticed improvements, and have published their observations upon them—especially improvements in the condition of that part of the population which is most entitled to our sympathies—the Greek population. I remember the time when the establishment of a Greek kingdom was a most popular idea in this country. There were then persons who thought that we were dealing a violent blow to the existence of our old ally by the part we took in the contest which led to the formation of the kingdom of Greece. I took a different view of the matter, and thought I saw ground for expecting great improvement in the condition of the Turkish Empire from the establishment of an independent Greece. How could it have been possible to establish an independent kingdom of Greece without compelling the Turkish Government to improve the condition of the Greek subjects who still remained under its sway? And, again, how could the condition of their Greek subjects be ameliorated without involving an improvement in the condition of the Mussulman population? I believed that I saw a prospect of vast improvement throughout the East. If all the hopes I then entertained have not been entirely realized considerable progress has been made towards their fulfilment, and when we look around us and see what are the reforms attempted in other parts of Europe, and what great changes have taken place during the present century, we must admit that there have been great difficulties in the way of effecting reforms, and that time was required to carry them into complete operation. On the whole, I think that the present aspect of affairs in Turkey is calculated to encourage our hopes, that by persevering in the policy which is disapproved by my noble and gallant Friend we may yet avoid the evils which are apprehended, and succeed in establishing peace and order in that empire. There is another circumstance which we must bear in mind. Notwithstanding the degree of weakness into which Turkey has fallen, there is no doubt about her vast resources; and if, by the due execution of those reforms which have been recorded in treaties, a better state of things could be brought about, those resources will be opened out more fully than they are at present. There is hope of that result being arrived at if we persevere in the same course of policy which we have hitherto adopted. A large portion of the Turkish population are very fanatical in their opinions; and, in order to obtain the complete carrying out of the reforms which have been promised, and which alone can lead to the full development of the resources of Turkey, there must be a steady, friendly, but sufficient pressure upon the Turkish Government. But I admit that all these motives for perseverance would be inadequate to prevent hesitation as to our policy if there was not another reason. Beyond the reasons I have given, I must remark that we are positively bound by solemn obligations to support and assist the Turkish Empire to the last extremity. I maintain that the honour of England under our present engagements requires us to use our arms and expend our treasure to prevent the Turkish Empire from falling to pieces; just as we made sacrifices and incurred great risks to redeem our pledges to Portugal early in the present century. If the Turkish Empire is in danger, if it be true that we have a great interest in seeing that Empire placed in a more secure position, it is, I say, only consistent in us to do all that lies in our power to redeem our pledges to that country in order to prevent the occurrence of the apprehended mischief. It seems, therefore, plain that we ought to persevere in the policy which we have so long adopted. The House will hardly be surprised that I, although one of the least worthy of its Members, should attempt, before it is too late, to elicit from them an expression of opinion in favour of the maintenance of the Ottoman Empire, in order that the statement of my noble and gallant Friend may not go forth without being accompanied by some declaration of this House that we should continue to follow that course of policy which has already been attended with great results, and which justifies sanguine hopes for the future. This is the more important, because, in preparing for an apprehended evil, we are not called upon to make any immediate sacrifice nor to embroil ourselves with any other Power; but, in persevering in the course I have suggested, we shall obtain, if not the complete fulfilment of our hopes, yet great beneficial results, by giving additional security to our commercial relations, and giving greater stability to the empire which we have undertaken to support. My Lords, I have been unwilling to enter into details on a subject which, in its general bearings, is so well known to all of us; but which, at the same time, is not known to the country at large to the extent that could be desired—a subject, indeed, in respect to which so great a degree of ignorance prevails, that one of the most intelligent writers on such questions has lately made a remark which I take the liberty of reading to your Lordships. The work to which I refer is written in French, and this is its opening sentence—

“ Il est remarquable que, dans l'état actuel de la politique en Europe, la Turquie, malgré l'importance de son rôle, malgré la navigation à vapeur, malgré les progrès de la statistique moderne, continue à être aussi peu connue comme elle l'était durant les deux derniers siècles.”

Although it would be great presumption on my part to suppose that I could convey any instruction in this matter to your Lordships, and still less to Her Majesty's Government, yet it is to be feared that a very large proportion of the people out of doors, who have the means of learning what passes in this House, are in want of information in regard to it. It is of great consequence that the country at large should understand the nature of our relations and interests connected with the Turkish Empire—what is the policy that we have pursued for many years, the obligations under which we have been placed, and the danger against which we have to provide; because, how can we expect Her Majesty's Government to feel themselves at liberty to adopt a stronger policy, and, above all, to incur any immediate sacrifices, should that unfortunately be necessary, unless they have an intelligent and instructed public to back them? I humbly conceive, therefore, that I am discharging a duty in drawing attention, even beyond the precincts of this House, to a subject of so much importance, and which, in times like these of great and sudden changes, may perhaps be brought home to our own doors sooner than we expect. It is, my Lords, with much reluctance that, even without entering into details, I have trespassed on your notice, especially at this advanced period of the Session; and most happy should I be if, in retiring from your Lordships' presence, I should feel that I had so fully discharged my duty towards this question that, whatever may happen hereafter, I should never again have to open my mouth upon it. If I have the good fortune to have impressed your Lordships' minds with the truth of the facts and the correctness of the arguments which I have brought forward, I shall hope that, upon reflection and fair consideration of the great and leading points of the question, I shall have the satisfaction of eliciting from Her Majesty's Government a declaration sufficient to answer the expressions which lately proceeded from a noble and gallant Earl opposite; and to show that the Turkish Government, in its new circumstances, will be adequately encouraged and sustained in the arduous task which it has undertaken, but which it has hitherto been so imperfectly executed. It is surely no exaggeration to say that, in the present state of the world, the Government and the Parliament of England have a great duty to perform in this matter, and that a heavy responsibility must attend any indifference or negligence in its performance. The mission which they have to fulfil is one of the most solemn and sacred nature. It is a mission of knowledge, of freedom, of humanity—a mission dictated by the purest motives, and, I may add, sanctioned by Christian principles. For its due fulfilment, the power and influence which we possess as a nation have been entrusted to us; and it should ever be remembered that any apathy or lukewarmness in respect to that great end may involve the forfeiture of the means. I thank your Lordships for the kindness with which you have listened to me, and beg to conclude by moving the Address of which I have given notice.

LORD WODEHOUSE said, that his noble Friend spoke with so much authority on all subjects relating to Turkey that it was with some hesitation that any one must differ from him; yet he ventured to think that the present moment was not peculiarly opportune for raising a discussion on internal reforms in the Turkish Empire. He quite agreed with the noble Lord in the general necessity for those reforms in that country; and probably there was not one Member of that House who had paid any attention to the subject who was not of that opinion. Having had occasion more than once to trouble the House with observations of his own on this matter, he was the more reluctant now to repeat what he had already stated; but while concurring in the general necessity of reforms in Turkey, he thought that at the present moment, when there had been a recent change in the reigning Sovereign of that country, and when the Government had had, as they conceived, distinct proofs that the new Sovereign was disposed to inaugurate his reign with salutary reforms, it was more becoming in foreign Powers to wait and see whether the Sultan persevered in the course he had commenced, than by advice which would now be unreasonable and premature, to deprive him, in the eyes both of his own subjects and of Europe, of the credit which he would naturally reap from having begun his rule as he had done. The new Sultan had proclaimed his intentions in the most authoritative manner, by what was called a hatti-scheriff, and from that document, as published, their Lordships would perhaps allow him to quote one or two sentences. The Sultan says—

“I am firmly resolved on what all the world knows it is, with the help of God, my most earnest desire to increase—the prosperity of the State and the well-being of all my subjects without distinction; and I have confirmed in their entire fulness all the fundamental laws which have up to the present been promulgated and established with a view to promote this happy end, and to insure to all the inhabitants of my dominions life, honour, and the enjoyment of their property.”

And his Majesty concluded in these words—

“I also firmly proclaim that my desire for the prosperity of my subjects will know no distinction, and that those of my people who are of different religions or races shall find in me the same justice, the same solicitude, and the same perseverance in assuring their prosperity. The progressive development of the rich resources with which God has endowed our empire, the true progress of the welfare which is to result therefrom for all who live under the shadow of my imperial power, and the independence of my great empire, shall be the object of my constant thoughts.”

It was impossible that a more distinct assurance than this could be given that it was the intention of the present Sultan to maintain the laws established by his predecessor, and, what was more to the pur-

year, that he would not have been able to have done so, if he had not been so convinced, as he trusted he was, that the reforms which he had introduced were necessary to the safety and welfare of his empire, and showed that he entertained that conviction, he would produce in effect upon his Mussulman subjects and obtain an influence over them such as could not be obtained by any other means. The adoption of reforms by him was suggested by his subjects to him, and he had been urged upon him by foreign Powers. He agreed with his noble Friend that this was a most important crisis in the history of the Turkish empire and of its relations with foreign Powers. He was anxious that the Turkish Government should have full leisure to carry out the measures of reform which had been promised, but at the same time, he admitted that, considering the interest which we must take in the preservation of the independence and integrity of the Turkish Empire, in the maintenance of our treaties, and in the promotion of everything that would conduce to the prosperity of that empire, it would ill become Her Majesty's Government—and he was sure that it was far from their intention—to lose sight of these reforms, to the adoption of which we attached the greatest importance, and which he trusted that the present Sultan would soon carry into effect. If his noble Friend would consent to alter the terms of his Motion, so that it might not include Correspondence during the reign of the present Sultan which was of such extremely recent date, he should have no objection to the production of the papers moved for.

The EARL OF HARDWICKE said, that he was very much tempted to reply to many of the arguments of his noble Friend opposite; but the noble Lord the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs had made so clear and distinct a statement that the Sultan was to be allowed to conduct his affairs as an independent Sovereign that he did not think it necessary to prolong this discussion. He was anxious that, in carrying out any reforms which he might be disposed to adopt, the Sultan should receive all the support which Her Majesty's Government could give; and he hoped that in giving this Correspondence the noble Lord would also produce that which took place during the visit of his noble Friend opposite to the Sultan.

out consultation with his noble Friend at the head of the Foreign Office, promise to give this Correspondence.

VISCOUNT STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE had no objection to alter his Motion as suggested by the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State. He had no desire to rush into the councils of the Sultan; his only object had been to show that he ought to be encouraged to the utmost extent by Her Majesty's Government in making the reforms which he had promised.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

LABOURERS' COTTAGES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF DEVON moved that this Bill be read a second time. Its object was to promote the building of improved cottages for labourers, by giving, in certain cases, greater facilities for borrowing money to be applied to that purpose. No fact was more firmly established than that inadequate and impure cottage accommodation was the source, not only of physical, but of moral degradation to the inmates. The estate, also, suffered from the imperfections of the cottages upon it, and would be benefited by their improvement. There were many cases where proprietors with large estates, through having only a limited interest or legal disability, could not procure the funds to carry out improvements. The object of the Bill was to enable persons so situated, through the intervention of the Inclosure Commissioners, to apply a limited sum of money, under certain sanctions and conditions, to the erection of cottages, and to charge the expenditure on the inheritance. That principle had been repeatedly recognized, both in public and private Bills, and Parliament had also acknowledged that the improvement of the houses of the working classes was worthy of encouragement. As no novel or startling principle was involved in the measure, and as its object was one which their Lordships must approve, he hoped they would give it their sanction.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^a.

LORD PORTMAN thought that their Lordships would do well to pause before they committed themselves to such a public Bill founded on the principle that the tenant for life should be allowed to charge the inheritance of his estate with the outlay for improvements and repairs of cottages which he had made. The subject had been under the consideration of various Committees, but none of them had admitted that cottage property was of that permanently beneficial character which would entitle expenditure on that head to be charged against the heir, but had held that such wills were peculiarly the duty of the tenant for life. The Bill fixed the amount to be laid out on a cottage at not more than £120; but after deducting £20 or £50 for the expense of putting in motion the ill-considered machinery of this Bill, a sum would be left which might suffice for a Devonshire cob house, but scarcely for a substantial cottage. He believed that the machinery of the Bill as developed in the Clauses, was of so cumbersome a character as would render it practically inoperative, and many of the clauses cannot be amended in consistency with the privileges of the House of Commons. He, therefore, moved that it be read a second time that day three months.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and insert ("this Day three Months.")

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY reminded their Lordships that the principle of the Bill had been already sanctioned by Parliament in an Act which was passed last Session in reference to Scotland. It was very desirable that the erection of good cottages should be facilitated; and he hoped the House would at least read the measure a second time. It might be modified in Committee, if necessary.

LORD REDESDALE thought that what was proposed to be done by means of this Bill could already be done under several Acts of Parliament through the Inclosure Commissioners; and there were also some provisions in reference to persons possessing the fee-simple which seemed to him to be useless. Nobody was more desirous than himself that the cottages of labourers should be improved, but he thought it was hardly desirable to pass this Bill for the purpose of instituting a new way of raising money for the purpose.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON said, it was important in a moral point of view that cottages should be erected which would conduce to the comfort and health of the occupants, and as many persons in possession of estates could not afford, to make the necessary outlay, he thought it desirable that they should be assisted, if it could be done without detriment to the inheritance. He did not approve some of the details of the Bill, but it seemed unfair not to allow it to be committed.

On Question, That ("now") stand part of the Motion? their Lordships divided:—Contents 18; Not-Contents 16: Majority 3.

Resolved in the negative, and Bill to be read 2^a, this Day Six Months.

BOOK UNIONS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD BROUGHAM, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said it simply extended to libraries and book societies the principle of the art unions act, which had been found very useful in cultivating the taste of the working classes. Every subscriber would receive a book of the value of his subscription and a chance at the end of the year of gaining by a raffle a choice of books of specified value from a catalogue. No money would be given, and every precaution would be taken that, in encouraging reading, they should not encourage gambling. The Bill came from the other House, where it was unopposed, and, was supported by the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

Moved, that the Bill be now read 2^a.

EARL GREY said, he doubted whether in respect to art unions the principle legalized by Act of Parliament was a wise one. But there was this reason in their favour—that it was impossible for many persons fond of art to purchase pictures for considerable sums, and as purchasers were found for them by the system of combination art was encouraged. The same reason did not apply to books, because there was no difficulty in printing any book which was worth it. If the principle that they ought not to encourage lotteries or games of chance were a sound one, no reason could be assigned for departing from it in the case of books. It was highly inexpedient to depart from the recognized principle of our law without a proved necessity, and he should, therefore, move that the Bill be read a second time that day three months.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and insert ("this Day Three Months.")

Lord DENHAM supported the Bill.

EARL GRANVILLE was sorry to oppose any Bill proposed by his noble and learned Friend, but if the noble Earl pressed his Amendment to a division he should feel compelled to support him.

Viscount Dungannon

LORD BROUGHAM said, that when the Bill was in the other House, the Home Secretary not only voted for it but spoke in its favour. He did not bring the measure forward as one of necessity, but of expediency, and of great advantage, not to booksellers, printers, or authors, but to readers. It would tend very much to encourage reading among a class who, at present, were not much given to it. He wished it to be distinctly understood that it was not owing to any fault of his that the Bill was lost.

On Question, That ("now") stand Part of the Motion?

Resolved in the Negative; and Bill to be read 2^a this Day Three Months.

House adjourned at a quarter before Eight o'clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

PAROCHIAL AND BURGH SCHOOLS (SCOTLAND) No. 2 BILL.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 9 (Parochial Schoolmasters not to be required to sign Confession of Faith or Formula, but to make a Declaration and to undertake to conform to the Shorter Catechism).

MR. HADFIELD objected to the test proposed in the clause, and said that he would take the sense of the Committee upon that proposition. The paltry sum of £35 a year which was paid to these persons ought not to be made the means of violating the principles of civil and religious liberty—the very weakness of such persons ought to be a protection against such legislation. The present Bill was a renewal of the Test Act in its most odious forms. It was an act of gross cruelty to stultify a poor schoolmaster, and demoralize him by applying to him this test and calling upon him to take a solemn oath, which throughout the whole of his life would bear heavily upon his conscience. He appealed to the learned Advocate General not to insist upon this test. Entertaining a strong opinion to the principle embodied in the clause, he should move its omission from the Bill.

Question put, "That Clause 9, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 45; Noes 9: Majority 36.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 10 (Jurisdiction of the Presbytery in cases of immoral Conduct or Cruelty transferred to the Sheriff),

Mr. DUNLOP objected to the omission in this clause of charges for neglect of duty, which instead of being transferred along with those for immoral conduct and cruelty to children were still left to be tried by the Presbytery, and contended that neglect of duty, like other charges, should be tried by the sheriff. He proposed the insertion of words which would have that effect. Presbyteries, he maintained, were the worst possible tribunals for judicial functions, and the result of the jurisdiction allowed them by the Act 1803 had been that, although their sentences were declared by the statute final and not subject to revision, yet their blunders in procedure, and not keeping within the Act, had so constantly laid them open to challenge, and so many of their sentences had been quashed after long litigation, the expenses of which fell on the mentors or the Presbytery themselves, that scarcely any process was ever instituted now against a schoolmaster, and many improper parties were thus allowed to continue in office. Besides, it would be a mockery to open the parish schools to teachers of other denominations and leave them liable to be tried and deposed by the church courts of that establishment.

THE LORD ADVOCATE objected to the Amendment. The jurisdiction of the sheriff was confined to criminal cases, and the general superintendence of the Presbytery was preserved by the Bill. He would not object to take from the Presbytery the power of deposing a schoolmaster, but he thought cases of neglect of duty ought to be under the superintendence of the Presbytery.

Mr. BLACK said, that the position of these unfortunate schoolmasters appeared to be very hard indeed; for, not content with compelling them to pass through the meshes of numerous examinations, it was proposed to establish something like a police in the shape of the Presbytery to watch over him as though he were a person not fit to be trusted. He could not help thinking that the whole Bill was a mockery and a delusion, and one which would not be attended with any beneficial result to the cause of education in Scotland. He hoped that the time would soon come when they would have a Ministry not afraid to deal with this question in a liberal spirit. It would be very much better if the Bill were lost, and they had to wait a little longer for a better measure.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, it was no doubt quite true that the Bill did not go so far as could be wished, but still it was a step in the right direction, and one which would open the schools to the children of both classes, and would form a useful basis for future enlightened and liberal legislation.

Mr. BUCHANAN considered that, although the Bill was not altogether satisfactory, he still regarded it as a step in the right direction, and hoped that the hon. Member for Greenock would not press his Amendment.

Mr. DUNLOP said, that his Amendment was, in his opinion, essential to the good working of the Bill, and declined to withdraw it.

Sir EDWARD COLEBROOKE attached great importance to the Amendment, and thought that they ought to deprive the Presbytery of every rag of judicial power which they now possessed, in order that the Dissenters might be convinced that justice would be done to them in the management of the schools.

Mr. MURE said, the Bill had been framed with a view to the satisfaction of all parties, and to secure its passing in that and the other House. If they were to deprive the Presbytery of all power of interference in the case of neglect of duty, they would reduce them to a state in which they would have no power of superintendence whatever.

Mr. BLACKBURN said, the effect of the Amendment would be to separate the schools from the Church altogether. That would be entirely opposed to the object of the Bill.

Mr. CARNEGIE had no fears that the Presbyteries would abuse the power granted to them by the Bill, and opposed the Amendment.

MAJOR CUMMING BRUCE asked why they should deprive the Presbytery of that remnant of connection with the schools which they had so long enjoyed? It was to the Church they owed the schools, and it was the connection of the Church with them that had led to the happy union of secular and religious teaching which had so long distinguished the schools of Scotland.

COLONEL SYKES would support the clause as it stood, as it was only by preserving it in its integrity they could hope to pass the Bill.

MR. G. W. HOPE thought they should at least leave the Presbytery to judge of the daily doings and shortcomings of the schoolmaster. They had deprived them of every other power in connection with the school; but, as they must be the best judges of the schoolmaster's conduct, he thought they should be allowed to retain the superintendence that was still left to them.

MR. DUNLOP would withdraw his Amendment, provided the Lord Advocate would consent to take from the Presbytery the power of libelling the schoolmaster.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON thought each side ought to make concessions on this question; but he begged to observe that the withdrawal of powers from the Presbytery proposed by this Bill would create pain among many persons in Scotland.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he was prepared so to amend the Bill, that the Presbytery should be invested merely with the power of censure and suspension, and not with the power of dismissal.

LORD STANLEY asked how long the suspension of a schoolmaster might continue, and whether it would involve a loss of salary?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that the suspension, like an ecclesiastical censure, could be prolonged indefinitely, and that it would involve a loss of salary as long as it continued.

MR. G. W. HOPE said, that there was no reason to apprehend that the heritors would allow the school to be closed for any length of time; so that practically the power of suspension would not be of an indefinite extent.

LORD STANLEY suggested that some positive limit should be placed on the power of suspension.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he was ready to adopt that suggestion. He would limit the power of suspension to a period of three months; and he hoped that under those circumstances the hon. and learned Member for Greenock would not press his Amendment.

MR. DUNLOP said, that in answer to the appeal of the Lord Advocate, he would withdraw the Amendment. He felt less difficulty in doing so, as he had reason to think that, on a division, he would not receive the support of many of those Members who agreed with him upon the general principle.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. DUNLOP proposed the insertion of words which would entitle the Presbytery to institute proceedings against a schoolmaster on the application of the heritors and minister, or of any six heads of families in the parish who had children attending the school.

THE LORD ADVOCATE accepted the Amendment.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON thought the Amendment would give power to persons in the parish needlessly to annoy a schoolmaster.

Amendment agreed to.

On the Motion of Mr. MURE, words were added to deprive a schoolmaster of his salary when under suspension, and to appropriate it towards providing a substitute.

Clause as amended, agreed to, as was also Clause 11.

Clause 12 (Repeal of Clauses of the recited Act requiring an Estimate of the Value of Grain to be made at successive Period),

THE LORD ADVOCATE proposed to add words to the effect that the right of electing a parochial schoolmaster jure devoluto, conferred by a 15th section of the recited Act on the Commissioners of Supply of the county after the expiration of four months from the time when the vacancy in any parochial school had taken place, should not arise or accrue to the Commissioners of Supply until the expiration of six months from the time of such vacancy.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 13 omitted.

Clause 14 (Schoolmaster's House to consist of Four Apartments),

MR. LOCKHART proposed the addition of words to enable heritors to take ground for the schoolmaster's house, &c., and to provide an adequate supply of water.

THE LORD ADVOCATE objected to the Amendment, which would impose a heavy expenditure in many instances.

LORD STANLEY said, the words proposed gave a very great power to a very limited body. They would enable the heritors to take any ground they might fix upon.

Amendment withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 15 agreed to.

Clause 16 (Schoolmasters in Royal Burghs not to be required to sign Confession of Faith or Formula of Church of Scotland),

MR. DUNLOP moved to insert, in line 12, after "thereof," the following words, "nor shall any such schoolmaster be subject to the trial, judgment, or censure of the presbytery of the bounds for his sufficiency, qualifications, or deportment in his office."

THE LORD ADVOCATE assented to the Amendment, and the clause as Amended was agreed to.

Clause agreed to, as were also the remaining Clauses.

MR. DUNLOP moved a new Clause to enable heritors from time to time to discontinue existing side schools.

Clause agreed to.

MR. DUNLOP moved a new Clause to enable the heritors to appoint a female teacher.

Clause agreed to.

MR. DUNLOP moved a Clause to the effect that teachers might be required to resign, provisions being made for them during life.

Clause agreed to.

MR. DUNLOP moved a Clause to enable the electors of schoolmasters to choose more than one candidate to be tried by examiners.

Clause negatived.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON moved a Clause to the effect that, upon agreement between the heritors and schoolmaster, the office of schoolmaster might be declared vacant, a retiring pension being provided.

Clause agreed to.

THE LORD ADVOCATE proposed that the following should come after Clause 9 :—

"It shall be competent for the Presbytery of the Bounds, or for the heritors, whensoever they shall see cause for instituting proceedings against the schoolmaster of any parish for contravention of the said declaration, to present a complaint to one of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State against such schoolmaster; and it shall be lawful to the Secretary of State thereupon to appoint a Commission to inquire into the said charge, and to censure, suspend, or deprive such schoolmaster, as they shall find to be just, provided that no such sentence shall take effect until it has been confirmed and approved by the Secretary of State."

MR. BLACK objected to the clause. He believed it would not be put in force; but if proceedings were never taken under the clause it would be a mere sham, and ought not to be enacted.

MR. ADAM also objected to the clause, and contended that the only true course was to separate religious from secular teaching, and leave the people to say what religious teaching should be given to their children.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, the people of Scotland were divided in opinion upon many things, but they all agreed in this, that secular and religious teaching should not be separated from each other.

MR. ADAM did not mean to exclude religion from the schools; but held that the people should be left to choose religious education for themselves and their children.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE objected strongly to the test that had been introduced into the Bill.

Clause agreed to.

MR. ADAM moved a Clause to the effect that where a schoolmaster was absent for more than three weeks continuously, except in vacation time, it might be lawful for the heritors to appoint a substitute to be paid out of the salary and fees received by such schoolmaster—absence from ill-health not coming within the meaning of the clause.

Clause negatived.

On the Motion of MR. LESLIE, a Clause was adopted to the effect that on the retirement of a schoolmaster the house and premises of the school should be made over within a certain time to the successor, and where the house and premises formed part of the retiring allowance, the heritors should make reasonable compensation to the ex-schoolmaster.

Clause agreed to.

A Clause was added, on the Motion of Mr. MURE, providing for the resignation of a schoolmaster declared by the inspectors to be incompetent to discharge his duties from infirmity or old age, also providing for the resignation of a schoolmaster, who from negligence or inattention shall fail efficiently to discharge his duties; and providing for the payment of a retiring allowance when the resignation shall not be caused by any fault of the schoolmaster.

Preamble agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered on Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 243.]

IRREMOVABLE POOR BILL. COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 9 the following addition, moved by Sir JOHN PAKINGTON on Tuesday, was again proposed—

“Provided also, that extra-parochial places which have heretofore paid no contributions to the common fund of the unions in which they are comprised shall, notwithstanding anything herein contained, be hereafter exempt from such contributions.”

MR. HENLEY said, it was impossible to discuss this important clause and Amendment at that hour—half-past three; and he, therefore, moved that the Chairman should report Progress.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, the right hon. Gentleman who proposed the Amendment (Sir John Pakington) was not present to press it, although he expected that it would be settled that day. He begged to remind the Committee that the Amendment received no support on Tuesday.

LORD JOHN MANNERS was surprised to hear it stated that the Amendment of his right hon. Friend (Sir John Pakington) had received no support. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carlisle and other Gentlemen certainly stated that they would support his right hon. Friend's proposition as he had altered it.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, there was no support given to the original proposal made by the right hon. Member for Droitwich, but he admitted that some support was given to it in its modified form. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Droitwich had informed him that he could not be present, but that he expected his Amendment would be decided upon that day.

Motion made, and Question put, “That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.”

The Committee divided:—Ayes 33; Noes 115: Majority 82.

Amendment again proposed,

MR. KNIGHT, amid cries of “Divide,” opposed the Amendment.

MR. PEACOCKE moved that the Chairman leave the chair. It was now near four o'clock, and the right hon. Gentleman must see that it was impossible to make any progress with the Bill that day.

Motion made, and Question put, “That the Chairman do now leave the Chair.”

The Committee divided:—Ayes 24; Noes 104: Majority 80.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again on Tuesday next, at Twelve of the clock.

PUBLIC WALKS.—QUESTION.

MR. SLANEY said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works, If permission will be given to open the Terrace at the back of Somerset House for respectable persons to walk there, at such hours and under such rules as shall be thought right, according to the recommendation of the Committee on Public Walks in 1833; and if there is any prospect of a Public Walk or open Ground being made in the south-east of London, near Bermondsey, or in Southwark, as suggested by that Committee?

MR. COWPER, in reply, said he was anxious that every public place in London which could afford a pleasant view, or promote or provide for the recreation of the public, should be turned to the best account. Doubtless the terrace in front of Somerset House would afford a pleasant lounge to a great number of persons if it were thrown open to the public; but there were certain objections made to that public use of it in consequence of the nature of the occupation of Somerset House. At the present moment, he had not satisfied his own mind that those objections could be altogether obviated. With regard to the proposal for another park, no doubt any one who saw the great delight that was caused by Battersea Park to thousands of the inhabitants of London would, like the hon. Gentleman, wish for another park at the south-east side of London. But he was unaware of any fund which could be appropriated for that purpose, and, therefore, he could not hold out any distinct prospect of such an excellent arrangement being adopted.

PORTERS' RESTS.—QUESTION.

MR. SLANEY said, he would now beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If the Metropolitan Board of Works or the Vestries of different parishes in the Metropolis, will assist in placing Porters' Rests for poor persons bearing heavy burdens in proper places; or would suggest proper places for those willing to erect Porters' Rests, and seats near, at their own cost?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: Sir, this is a matter over which the Home Department has no control. Neither have I any reason to believe that the Metropolitan Board of Works have power or means applicable to such a purpose. But I believe the Vestries, if they are so disposed, can erect these rests for porters. In certain cases they have done so; and I have no doubt, if proper representations were made to them, that they would be willing to extend these advantages.

GOVERNMENT SCHOOL AT BERHAM- PORE.—QUESTION.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether any Papers have been sent home relative to an application made by Mr. Martin, Principal of the Government School at Berhampore, to the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal, for permission to open a Bible Class in the School under his charge; and, if so, whether he has any objection to lay them upon the Table of the House? And if they have not been received, whether he will direct their early transmission in order to lay them upon the Table?

SIR CHARLES WOOD replied that some Papers on the subject had been received, but not from the Government of India, and he was not prepared to lay them on the Table. He would, however, write to India on the subject.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.—QUESTION.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he wished to ask the Chairman of the Standing Orders Committee, If, after the experience of the plan for facilitating Public Business in the House of Commons recommended by the Select Committee during this Session, it is his intention to move for a Committee to revise the Standing Orders?

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, he was not authorized by the Committee on Standing Orders to make any Motion of the kind. Having consulted Mr. Speaker, the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir James Graham), who was Chairman of the Committee on Public Business which sat in the early part of the Session, and other hon. Members, he found it to be the impression that the House had not had sufficient experience of the recommendations of that Committee to warrant him in moving for a Committee to revise the Standing Orders. If those recommendations had not been favourable in some of their results, unquestionably they had been so in others. It had been supposed by more than one hon. Member that the plan of putting Supply down for Tuesday evenings would prove abortive; but the experience of Tuesday last afforded ground for supposing that the fact would be otherwise. Under these circumstances, he should not move for a Committee to revise the Standing Orders. Indeed, under any circumstances he should scarcely feel justified in taking such a step, after the appointment of a Committee presided over by so distinguished a Member of the House as the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle.

CHURCH RATES AMENDMENT BILL. QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES DOUGLAS said, he wished to ask the hon. Member for Preston, What course he intends to pursue respecting his Bill for the Amendment of Church Rates, which stands for the 24th instant; and whether, after the opinions expressed on the withdrawal of a similar Bill on the 10th instant, he will persevere in moving the Second Reading at so late a period of the Session?

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, he had received a letter from his hon. Friend expressing his surprise and mortification at finding that some of his friends in London had expressed an opinion that, owing to the advanced period of the Session, it was not desirable to proceed with the measure; but that, under the circumstances, he should on Wednesday next move that the Order of the Day for the second reading of the Bill be discharged.

A BENGALLI PLAY.—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether the Government has received any information relative to the circulation by the Government of Bengal, in official envelopes marked "On Her Majesty's Service," of an English translation of a "Bengalli Play," containing attacks on British settlers connected with the manufacture of Indigo in Bengal, on their wives and families?

SIR CHARLES WOOD replied, that if his hon. Friend had any curiosity to read the play, he would send him a copy; but he had received no information whatever that it was of the character which his hon. Friend described.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee (Supply) read.

THE FRENCH AND BELGIAN TREATY. QUESTION.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, The cause of the delay of the Belgian Government in applying the new Tariff Arrangements between France and Belgium to this Country? The House was, no doubt, aware that the trade between this country and Belgium had been very much diminished by the peculiar policy of the Government of Belgium. It was not merely a protective policy in favour of their own manufactures, but a policy of preference of almost every other country over this country, and especially a preference of France. He much feared that the disadvantages of this policy would be increased in consequence of the commercial treaty between this country and France, from which, in other respects, we derived considerable advantages. On the conclusion of the commercial treaty between France and this country, negotiated by the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Cobden), France offered almost the same terms to other countries, and amongst others to Belgium. The result was a commercial treaty between France and Belgium, by which French goods would be admitted to Belgium on much more favourable terms than English. That treaty was not extended to England; and the result would be that the differential duty against English goods and in favour of French goods would be very much increased. In worsted and woollen goods, with which he was best acquainted, the present duty on French goods was 22 per cent; after the 1st of October it would be 15 per cent, to be reduced to 10 per cent in 1864. The duty levied on English goods of a similar description was about 35 per cent. So that while the differential duty against us was at present about 50 per cent, it would be increased to 130 per cent in October, and in 1864, if no new arrangement took place meanwhile,

Sir John Shelley

to 350 per cent. He believed the same was the case with regard to cotton, and also with linen. The duty on French silk was 4 francs per kilogramme; after the 1st October it would be 3 francs. On English silks the duty was 11 francs 60 centimes; so that the duty on English silks was now about three times as much as on French silks, and would soon be four times as much. He could understand why the Belgians might be afraid of English woollens; but their course with regard to the admission of silks appeared to him to be an especially unfriendly action, giving as it did a large preference to French over English silks. But we laboured under a disadvantage not only in the amount of the duty but in the mode in which it was levied. One of the greatest benefits of the treaty between England and France consisted in the substitution of ad valorem for specific duties. If anybody wished for proof of the disadvantageous working of the system of specific duties he would obtain it by observing the working of the importation into Belgium. The hon. Member read a letter from Huddersfield describing the evils attendant on the levying of duties in Belgium. The Belgium tariff in English goods, the writer said, was a very complicated one, and minute specifications were required; the Custom House officer put his own construction on these, and if he considered the specification inaccurate a heavy fine was levied, one-half of which went to the Custom House officers themselves. Not only, then, had the French goods an enormous advantage in point of amount of duty, but after October of this year, they would have the great additional advantage of an ad valorem instead of a specific duty. The manufacturers did not contest the right of the Belgian Government to adopt either a protective or a differential duty; but they did not expect that Belgium, towards which this country had always showed such a friendly feeling, and who had received, he might say, so many obligations at our hands, would have placed this country at a disadvantage as compared with others. It was not to France alone, but to other countries, that preference was shown, for Belgium had a general tariff on the admission of the goods of all countries; but there were special exceptions in favour of France, Holland, Luxemburg, and the Zollverein, so that English goods almost alone remained subjected to the general tariff. The reply of the Belgian Government to the remonstrances of our Foreign Office was that they intended to remove this preference, but that they were waiting till the expiration of the special treaty with France. That special treaty expired on the 1st of March last, and, as it was understood that a new and more favourable treaty was in contemplation, the Chamber of Commerce of Bradford memorialized the Foreign Office that it would use its exertions to put our manufacturers on the same footing with France. This was in November; but the Foreign Office did not reply till January. He did not complain of this, as he had no doubt that the noble Lord was otherwise much occupied about that period; but it was matter of regret, for he had no doubt that during those two months the terms of the treaty had been arranged between Belgium and France. On the 11th of January the noble Lord directed Mr. Hammond to assure the Bradford Chamber of Commerce that the Belgian Government had given assurances that they had no intention to make the slightest distinction between the woollen manufacturers of France and those of Great Britain, and that no concession would be made to the manufacturers of any country which was not also conceded to the manufacturers of Great Britain. Still nothing more was heard of the matter. In May the Treaty with France was completed, and a fresh memorial having been addressed to the Foreign Office, the following answer was received on the 31st of May:—

“Foreign Office, May 31, 1861.

“Sir, in reply to your letter of the 27th instant, I am directed by Lord John Russell to acquaint you that there is no discrepancy between the letter dated the 11th of January last, which you received from Mr. Hammond, and that which I addressed to you on the 22nd instant. Her Majesty's Government had in January last received, and have lately again received, from the Belgian Government, assurances that there was no intention on their part to make any distinction between the import duties on French woollens and those on woollens the produce of Great Britain, and Her Majesty's Government are now in communication with the Belgian Government, with a view to concluding a new treaty of commerce, which shall give effect to those assurances.

“I am, Sir, your most “Obedient humble servant,

Since that time a law had passed the Belgian Chambers sanctioning the treaty with France, but nothing whatever was said about a treaty with England. He wished now to ask the reason for this delay, and he hoped that the reply he should receive would be a satisfactory one. He could hardly sit down without stating that such were and had all along been the relations between this country and Belgium that they had a right to expect the conclusion of a treaty of commerce as favourable as with any country in the world, not even excepting France. It was under the guidance of the noble Lord now at the head of the Government that the Kingdom of Belgium was established; no one knew better than he what a prominent part the British Government had taken in assisting that Government—none knew better the obligations under which this country was placed with regard to it—indeed, the noble Lord occasionally reminded them of some of which they were not before aware—and he would only say that if the Belgian Government wanted to retain the friendly feeling of this country they had better trust to a good commercial intercourse than to any parchment obligations, however strong they might be.

MR. PAGET rose to confirm the statement of his hon. Friend as to the great anxiety with which our merchants and manufacturers regarded the new treaty between Belgium and France. They felt that the French manufacturers were formidable competitors with them in ordinary circumstances, and they looked with regret, and with some degree of indignation, on a treaty which admitted the goods of their competitors at an unfair advantage.

MR. HEYGATE begged to add a few words on behalf of his constituents, who were deeply interested in this matter, and who entirely concurred in the representations of his hon. Friend the Member for Bradford. He would not repeat all that had been urged by his hon. Friend, but the facts of the case were shortly these:—For years past the products of Great Britain had been subject to higher rates of duty on admission into Belgium than similar manufactures imported there from France and other countries. Almost every country except England enjoyed certain exemptions and privileges in Belgian tariffs, whilst England alone came in under the general tariff. Now, there was no possible reason or pretext for any such distinction. Not only were we on terms of the closest amity with Belgium, but if there was any one country more than another from whom we had a right to expect a different treatment it was from Belgium, to whom we had always afforded the advantage of our friendship, and which enjoyed the blessings of a free Government and liberal institutions nearly identical with our own. Unfortunately, however, a liberal commercial policy did not in this case follow, as might have been expected, from those institutions, and so far from being admitted upon terms equal to those of the most favoured nation, our trade was marked out by them for special hostility. And if the trade with Belgium had been hitherto in a languishing state, it followed that when the new Franco-Belgian tariff came into operation on October 1, that trade would be annihilated. The duty on French woollen yarn was now 45*f.* per 100 kilogrammes, and would be then further reduced to 30*f.* to 40*f.*; whilst the duties on corresponding English goods remained at 116*f.* So, too, as regarded woollen manufactures, the present French duty on which was to be reduced from 225*f.* per 100 kilogrammes to a 15 per cent ad valorem duty, whilst the duty on English was 38*f.*, equal to 37½ ad valorem. England asked no privileges or special advantages, but only the opportunity of free and fair competition. It was true Lord Wodehouse had written, on May 31, that the Belgian Government assured us they had "no intention to make any difference between the import duties on French woollens and those produced in England," but, meantime, nothing was done, and they had reason to ask the cause of this delay. He would add one other reason why the Foreign Secretary should urge this matter forward as rapidly as possible—namely, that owing to the unhappy civil war now raging in America, and the restrictive tariffs adopted by the Northern States, the American trade in the midland districts was nearly annihilated; considerable distress was already the consequence, and that distress would be greatly aggravated unless some modification of the Belgian tariff should be made so soon as the new Franco-Belgian Treaty came into operation. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, too, was deeply interested in the matter, for unless something was done to save this trade he would himself be disappointed in the sanguine Estimates of Customs revenue which he had formed, and which he (Mr. Heygate) earnestly hoped might not be unequal to the results hitherto anticipated.

MR. NEWDEGATE wished to state that the depression in trade in the district which he represented, especially in Coventry and for eight miles round it, was not in the least degree abated. The manufacturers were in great measure ruined, and the operatives were now, as a last resource, emigrating. Several of them had emigrated lately from the parish adjoining that in which he resided, and from the parish adjoining. This rendered it the more important that their manufactures should have the advantages referred to by the hon. Member for Bradford, to whom he begged to offer his thanks for having called attention to the subject.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he could not altogether wonder at the complaints made with respect to the conduct of the Belgian Government. When early in the year Her Majesty's Government applied to the Belgian Government they were told that they were negotiating a treaty of commerce with France, and that, until the terms of that treaty were arranged, it was not convenient to be negotiating with different Powers on the same subject at the same time. But at the same time they always assured Her Majesty's Government that whatever terms were granted with respect to French manufactures should also be conceded to English manufactures. On that assurance Her Majesty's Government relied—namely, that as soon as terms were arranged with France the Belgium Government would make the same terms with Great Britain. The negotiations between France and Belgium were considerably protracted, and it was not without difficulty that the provisions of the treaty in regard to the questions respecting woollen manufactures and other articles were carried through the Belgian Chambers. When the British Government again expressed their expectation that the same terms would be extended to this country, the Belgian Government answered that it was too late, at the end of the Session, to submit to the Belgian Chambers concessions to this country, and that without a law any concessions made by the Belgian Government would be of no value. According to that statement the Belgian Government had not chosen to introduce any Bill on the subject, and he thought that the British Government had reason to complain of that conduct. For his part he considered such conduct very unfriendly to this country; for he conceived that it might have been possible to protract the sitting of the Chambers for a fortnight or three weeks, and it appeared to him that the concession to this country of similar terms to those granted to France was what the British Government had a right to expect on grounds of general policy, and seemed, after the assurances given, to be only matter of good faith. The British Government had always behaved with the greatest liberality in these subjects. For the last ten years we had effected changes in the tariff without making them matter of bargain, and when we recently concluded a commercial treaty with France we extended the same terms to all the nations of Europe. Consequently, though the Belgian Government had not granted to this country all the advantages it had a right to expect, they enjoyed themselves all the advantages resulting from the changes made in the English tariff. The British Government had again very recently remonstrated with the Belgian Government, and had asked them immediately to conclude a treaty of commerce which would place this country on an equal footing with France, and he did not think that they could fairly take any objection to that course; but he was sorry to say that, as the Belgian Chambers were not sitting, nothing could yet be definitely done on the subject.

DENMARK AND HOLSTEIN. OBSERVATIONS.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he rose to call the attention of the House to the Correspondence on the Affairs of Denmark, Schleswig and Holstein of 1860 and 1861. The hon. Baronet said he thought that England was called upon to interfere in the dispute as a mediating Power, and that we were in a much more advantageous position than France and other Powers for bringing about a peaceful solution. The hon. Baronet, whose statement was very imperfectly heard, referred at some length to the occurrences of 1849 and 1850, and said that the German Bund had undertaken to obtain for the Duchies the rights and privileges for which they had taken up arms, and that in 1852 the King of Denmark had engaged to maintain a separate national existence for Holstein, and equal rights for the Danish and German population of the kingdom. These promises had been openly and systematically broken, and the consequence was that there had been excited in Germany a strong feeling which might induce the German nation generally to take up arms to restore to Schleswig and Holstein those rights which they claimed to be entitled to. The hon. Gentleman then proceeded to read extracts from communications of Mr. Ward, who was now Consul-General at Hamburg, and whom he characterized as a most able and trustworthy public servant; of Mr. Howard, and others, to show that a considerable degree of oppression was exercised by the Danish Government towards the German inhabitants of Schleswig and Holstein. He had himself met with clergymen who had been compelled to leave their congregations because they refused to Danicize the German inhabitants of the Duchies. The German inhabitants of Schleswig were not permitted to approach the throne with a respectful statement of their grievances. It was stated that the Treaty of London was not binding; perhaps the noble Lord, if he made any reply to these observations, would give his opinion on that subject. The Treaty of London, he believed, was abrogated, so far as respected this country and France towards Russia, by the fact that war had intervened. The effect of that treaty was most hostile to Germany. It would bring a Russian prince to the throne of Denmark after the death of the present monarch. That would be very injurious to the small German interests, and he could not conceive that it would be beneficial to us. He was quite aware that the subject he had introduced to the notice of the House was not very interesting to many Members, but he could not help regarding it as one of the utmost importance, and he begged to thank them for the patience with which they had listened to the extracts he had read.

LORD HARRY VANE said, he was glad that, after having kept the question suspended for some time before the House, the hon. Baronet had at length brought it on for discussion. He could not quarrel with the hon. Baronet for the view he took of the question, but he (Lord Harry Vane) thought it would be desirable that the House should not be led away by partial statements. He did not intend to defend the Government of Denmark in the conduct which they had pursued towards Schleswig; but looking at the matter generally, he thought the House would come to a different conclusion from that arrived at by the hon. Baronet. The hon. Baronet seemed to be under the impression that the Treaty of London had been abrogated, and that it was no longer of any force or validity, because of the war which had since taken place between England and Russia. But the hon. Baronet was in error. Russia was only one of the parties to the treaty, and the subsequent war could not cancel it. Besides, there was an ancient treaty, dated in 1720, between France, England, and Germany, which was in force, and which guaranteed Schleswig and Holstein as part of the possessions of the throne of Denmark. Much might be said about the succession to the crown of Denmark. But it was thought at the time when there was a probability that the succession to Schleswig and Holstein might become doubtful, that it would be better it should be settled; and seeing that Denmark was but a small State and held the keys of the Baltic, it was, in his opinion, wisely decided by the great Powers, that the succession to Denmark and the Duchies should descend to the same Monarch rather than that Schleswig and Holstein should be separated from Denmark. The question of Schleswig and the question of Holstein were totally distinct. Holstein had, no doubt, been a part of the German Empire up to the time of its termination in 1806. But since 1815 the Duchy had been in the position it now occupied, and the rights of Denmark over Holstein were very limited. As regarded Schleswig the case was very different, and the difficulties between that Duchy and Denmark had arisen in consequence of a large German population having become inhabitants of the Duchy. There were in the Duchy two parties, which were to a certain extent hostile to each other, and unhappily nothing but time would entirely remedy all the complaints made, and smooth down the feelings which existed among the people. The Danish Government had lately shown a disposition to remedy all complaints which were well founded, and quite ready to do full and equal justice to both nationalities. In his opinion the best course to pursue would be for Denmark to allow the autonomy of Holstein, and for the Government to fix a certain sum as the contribution of the Duchy towards the general expenses of the kingdom. He also thought it right that new laws binding Holstein should be submitted to the Holstein Diet before being put into force. No Danish statesman would consent that Schleswig should be disunited from Denmark—

The noble Lord proceeded:—When he was interrupted he was calling the attention of the House to the management of the finances of Denmark and Holstein, and he thought the only true mode would be to stipulate that there should be a vote of a certain sum by the Diet of Holstein for the general expenses of the Government, and that all votes required over and above that should be specially submitted to the Diet of Holstein. No doubt there was a very strong feeling on the question, both in North and South Germany. But the Germans were bound to respect in others the feeling of nationality that animated themselves. They were bound to respect the Scandinavian feeling, that was not confined to Denmark; Sweden had expressed its readiness, under certain circumstances, to come to the aid of Denmark. It was impolitic on the part of Germany to raise a question that might hereafter bring down an intervention with which she would find it difficult to contend. It was most desirable that some definitive measures should be taken to settle this question. He hoped the Foreign Secretary would be able to tell them that a disposition existed on the part of Germany to accept proposals for a settlement, but it could only be effected by Germany respecting the rights of Denmark.

SIR MORTON PETO said, he did not believe there was any part of Germany in which more liberty was enjoyed than in the Duchy of Holstein. All that had been said about the language to be used in schools and churches and the restrictions on private education no longer applied. The state of things that had been complained of had been done away with. He believed the Danish Government felt that it had been wrong to permit such a state of things to exist. Denmark wished to obtain the good offices of England, and was ready to grant the Duchies a liberal Constitution; but the great difficulty in the way of a settlement was the contribution of Holstein. He believed it might be necessary to separate the Customs' duties of Holstein and the Duchy of Schleswig. The people of Denmark were strongly impressed with the necessity of free trade; but in Holstein, as in the greater part of Germany, the feeling was of an opposite kind, and it might be necessary to establish a line of Customs on the Eider. As for personal freedom in the Duchy of Holstein it was complete. Such a thing as a permission to travel or a passport had been unknown for nine or ten years. He earnestly hoped that the good offices of the Government might be successful.

MR. DUNLOP wished to ask a question as to the extent to which the Government held this country bound by the treaty of 1852. It was incomprehensible to him how any Government of this country should ever have entered into a treaty, the main effect of which was to open the way for the speedy accession of the Imperial family of Russia to the throne of Denmark. The possession of Denmark by Russia, and the command of the North Sea and the entrance to the Baltic by that Power, would be dangerous to the interests of this country. But under colour of a treaty for preventing a separation between Denmark Proper and the Duchies of Holstien and Schleswig, we had become parties to an arrangement by which nineteen heirs, standing between the present King of Denmark and the Emperor of Russia, were to be cut off from the right of succession, and only four left, with a limitation too, to heirs male exclusively, which made the failure of the intermediate heirs much more likely to happen. As to the Duchies, the succession was limited to males, while by the Lex Regia, introduced into Denmark in the course of last century, the succession to the Kingdom of Denmark was thrown open to females. On the death, therefore, of the present King and his uncle, neither of whom had heirs male, there would have been a separation of the Duchies and the Kingdom. The simple way of preventing this would have been by doing at once what has been done since the treaty—namely, repeating the Lex Regia in Denmark. But this would not have suited the views of Russia, and so an agreement was come to between the Emperor and the King of Denmark by which the Prince of Ghuhsburg should be declared heir both of the Duchies and the Kingdom, disinheriting no less than nineteen intermediate heirs, and thereafter he himself was connected only by females, limiting the succession in future to heir male, and rendering much more probable the early extinction of his line, and the opening up of the succession to the Emperor of Russia. The consent of the States of Denmark had, after much resistance, been obtained to this scheme, but hitherto those of the Duchies had steadfastly refused to sanction it. Now the question he wished to put to the noble Lord, the Secretary for Foreign Affairs was this:—Did the Government consider that this country was by the treaty of 1852, bound, under all circumstances, on the death of the King of Denmark and his uncle, to recognize the Prince of Ghuhs-burg as Sovereign of Denmark and the Duchies, or was the obligation of the treaty simply this—that if the succession should be lawfully and constitutionally changed by the competent authorities in Denmark and the Duchies, this country would recognize their act to this effect, and not promote the cause of any of the disinherited heirs against the will of the nation? To illustrate what he meant he would suppose that before the death of George IV., he and the other Sovereigns of Europe had entered into a treaty for securing the succession to the throne of Britain as well as to that of Hanover, of the Duke of Cumberland to the exclusion of our present Queen. Such a treaty might be merely an engagement to recognize his succession provided the Legislature of this country should lawfully have adopted it, or it might be a combination to force on the people and Legislature of this country, the heir male in preference to the heir female. Now, he wished to know whether the Government considered this treaty of 1852 to be of the former or the latter character and import? It was a question of the highest moment to the future well-being of this country and to the cause of liberty in Europe, and he trusted that the noble Lord would be able to give a satisfactory answer.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: The House will perhaps allow me, although I have already addressed it, to answer the appeal that has been made to me by the hon. Member for Buckingham and other hon. Members. In doing so it is not my intention either to enter into the arguments as to the rights of the different parties, or of the Germanic Confederation, or of the King of Denmark, or to point out the terms on which I think the existing differences might be terminated. I will confine myself to stating what I consider to be the present state of the question which the hon. Baronet has brought under our notice. I have myself been very anxious with respect to the question of Federal execution. The House is aware that the Germanic Confederation came to certain resolutions, to the effect that if the King of Denmark would not submit to certain propositions within a given time Federal execution would take place. I have been anxious on that subject, because it is one of such a delicate nature, and the passions of men are so much excited, that I could not but fear that it would endanger the peace in those provinces, and that it might eventually cause disturbance in the interior of the country. However, I am glad to hear that it is likely that the King of Denmark will make propositions, either to the Germanic Confederation, or to Austria and Russia, by which it is hoped that Federal execution may be postponed for the present year, and negotiations may be entered on. Now, what those negotiations or what the terms to be proposed by the King may be, I am not able to say, but I think it is perfectly fair and just, the Germanic Confederation having declared that a certain requirement should be complied with by the King, that His Majesty should, on his side, either announce his intention to comply, or give reasons why those requirements cannot be fairly placed before him as conditions to which he ought to subscribe. I conceive that those negotiations may end in a solution of the whole question. The subject is one on which a good deal of correspondence has taken place between the different Powers of Europe. All I can hope at present is that at least some time may be allowed for negotiations, and that Federal execution may not immediately take place. Certainly the subject is one on which I think every State in Europe is entitled to take an interest. With regard to the question of my hon. Friend who last spoke (Mr. Dunlop) I shall not undertake to state on a hypothetical case what might be the interpretation of the treaty signed in 1852, in the negotiation of which I had no part, and the terms of which I have not accurately in my mind now; but, as to the general purpose and scope of that treaty, I may observe that it is quite different from what my hon. Friend apprehends it to be. I believe it was supposed that if different titles could be set up to the Danish monarchy on the death of the present Sovereign, in that case Russia might revive her claim as against other claimants, and that, if she did, she would not be likely to fare the worst among the contending parties. Therefore, it was thought desirable by other Powers of Europe—Russia assenting to the arrangement—that the Danish monarchy should pass in a certain direction, in order that the ambitious hopes of the various claimants—Russia included—might be terminated, and that Denmark might be preserved as one kingdom. No one can tell what may be the effect of that treaty at the time of the death of the King of Denmark. It is binding on the Powers that signed it. It is binding in this way: If the Emperor of Russia, on the death of the King of Denmark, should claim to add Holstein to his dominions, all the other Powers would be entitled to allege that Russia had signed a certain treaty by which she was precluded from putting in that claim. I cannot give any further answer. It is a treaty which is not cancelled. It is in vigour and in force, and it is a treaty to which Great Britain is a party. I will not now enter further into the subject, but will only say that it is not desirable to give any Correspondence at the present moment.

THE DANISH CLAIMS.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. MACAULAY said, he rose to call attention to the several Addresses to the Crown by this House, and the Treasury Minutes issued thereon, empowering the Commissioners for Danish Claims to receive, examine, and judicially determine the claims of certain British subjects for losses arising out of the confiscation by the Danish Government of ships and cargoes in the year 1807; to the fact that after such losses had, in pursuance of Her Majesty's commands, been judicially determined, and the Commissioners' adjudication and Report thereon had been presented to the House, the House of Commons, by its Address, 10th June, 1841, prayed Her Majesty to advance to the claimants the amount of the losses so adjudged, with the assurance that the House would make good the same; to which Address Her Majesty returned a favourable answer; but that, nevertheless, such claims remain unliquidated; and to the Petitions of Thomas Ward and others (presented 26th April, Appendix to Public Petitions, No. 524, also Parliamentary Paper, No. 257, of the present Session), fully setting out the facts, and praying for redress. The persons who urged these Danish claims were the relatives of those whose ships were confiscated on the occasion of the seizure by the English of the Danish fleet at Copenhagen in 1807. The hon. Member said that the subject had been so repeatedly discussed in Parliament, and were so familiar as matters of history that he would not attempt to open the case in any detail. He would only remind the House that an expedition was sent to Copenhagen by the British Government in August, 1807, and possession of the Danish fleet was demanded as a matter of precaution, it being suspected by the British Government, acting upon secret information, that there was an understanding between the Emperors of Russia and of France to take possession of that fleet and use it against this country. The object of the expedition was avowedly kept secret while it was being fitted out, and the Proclamation addressed to the Danes, on its arrival in the Danish waters, was couched in terms, not of hostility, but of friendship; and it was distinctly stated on the part of the English that it was for their own safety that they made the demand. The Danish Government refused the demand made upon them to deliver up their fleet—and, indeed, it was a demand which was scarcely, if at all, to be justified; and on August 16 they did that which was the most ordinary act of retaliation—they ordered an embargo to be laid on British ships and property within their reach. On the other hand, on the 25th of August, by an Admiralty order, an embargo was laid by the British Government upon all the Danish property in the harbours of Great Britain, amounting to 850 ships. Ultimately that embargo was turned into confiscation, and the proceeds of the sales amounted to £1,300,000, which was paid into the Exchequer. Out of these proceedings sprung the claims of those who now prayed the House to consider their case. The case of the claimants was that the proceeds of the confiscated property ought to have been applied, in the first instance, to indemnifying those innocent sufferers, whose losses had been occasioned directly by the acts of the British Government. While the preparations connected with the Danish expedition were proceeding, not only was its destination kept secret, but licences were granted to English ships in the months of July and August to proceed to the Baltic; and which sailed, therefore, without any suspicion that hostilities were about to be commenced, and he believed there was no instance of an insurance being effected upon them. If the English Government thought the English ships in the Baltic were in danger of capture, it was their duty to have left a sufficient convoy to protect them; but, instead of this the whole English fleet left the Baltic, and many English merchant ships were snapped up by the cruisers of the Danish Government. If it was necessary that the Danish fleet should be seized under circumstances so peculiar, and if such reprisals were rendered inevitable on the part of the Danes, it was not right that private persons should be the sufferers, and the State should make good to them the loss brought upon them by a step deemed necessary for the safety of the empire. He was not aware that any legal refinements could be applicable here; but the case should be decided upon the principles of natural justice. This House had intervened time after time in favour of these claims, while the Crown had expressed its willingness that they should be met if the House would furnish the necessary funds. After the return of the English fleet from the Baltic, negotiations were still going on with the Danish envoy, who remained in London till the 16th of November—the bombardment of Copenhagen having taken place on September 7—and up to the middle of November all the acts done were committed without any expression of a determination to proceed to hostilities, unless an arrangement should be come to. It was not till November 4th that the Act for reprisals was issued in this country, and that was considered as the day when the war between England and Denmark commenced. The next step was to appoint a Commission to realize the enormous amount of Danish property on which the embargo had been laid. About this time the Crown Prince of Denmark was addressed by certain Danish merchants who thought their property would be endangered if the Danish Government maintained their embargo on British property. In his answer, dated the 27th November, the Crown Prince stated that the measures of the Government amounted to merely a sequestration of the property, so as not to lead to a condemnation of Danish property by way of retaliation. By this answer the Crown Prince limited the action of the Danish Government to a mere sequestration of the property of English merchants, in order that by so moderating their own measures the English Government might be induced to moderate theirs. He would now call attention to the manner in which those claims had been treated from 1807 up to the present time. In 1808 Lord Sidmouth brought them before the House of Lords in the form of Resolutions—[Hansard's Debates (First Series), vol. x., p. 645]—in which he called in question the justice of the proceedings—that there was neither right nor honesty in the seizure of this property—still less in the confiscation—unless it were done for the purpose of compensating those of our fellow-subjects who had suffered by the Danish confiscation. For a period of twenty years afterwards the English sufferers were incessant in their applications to the Treasury for compensation. It was the seizure under the embargo of the 16th August which formed the ground of those claims, and the claims put forward for compensation arose in three different ways—First, in respect of book debts due by Danish to English subjects; secondly, in respect to goods on shore belonging to English subjects; and thirdly, in respect to the property of English merchants in the shape of ships and cargo afloat. In 1834 the question was brought before the House of Commons by Mr. John Parker in the shape of a Motion for the appointment of a Committee. Lord Althorp, who was then Chancellor of the Exchequer, expressed himself very strongly against the right and title of those persons being considered by the Crown at all, but the tone of the House on that occasion was evidently in favour of something being done in the matter. Lord Althorp seeing that, induced Mr. Parker to withdraw his Motion, on the promise that the Government would take the matter into their consideration. The Executive took action by the appointment of a Commission. Several Treasury minutes followed, in which the Government expressed a readiness to carry out the wishes of the House, coupled, however, with a determination not to go beyond the limits prescribed by Parliament from time to time. Lord Althorp directed the Commissioners to inquire into the claims arising in regard to book debts and goods on shore, and drew a distinction adverse to the claims of those who had suffered from the seizure of their ships and cargoes afloat. The first Treasury Minute, dated November 4, 1834, authorized the Commissioners to receive, examine, and classify all the claims that might be brought before them, in order that the House of Commons might have the fullest information whenever its attention should again be drawn to the subject. The Commissioners were required also to bear in mind that all the Government undertook to do was to afford the parties the opportunity of establishing the fact of their losses, and that the Lords of the Treasury were not pledged to recommend the grant of compensation to any of them. Upon the issue of that Minute the Commissioners proceeded to adjudicate on the amount of book debts, and goods on shore, and between 1835 and 1837 Votes for compensation to the amount of £280,000 were passed by Parliament. The Commissioners, however declined to examine beyond those claims for book debts and goods on shore. In 1838 Mr. Cresswell (the present distinguished Judge) brought before the House of Commons the case of the claimants in respect to the ships and the cargoes, and moved an Address to the Crown praying that the Commissioners might examine into their claims. On that occasion the whole merits of the matter were most amply discussed, and after two or three divisions the Motion for the Address was carried, and a favourable answer was received from the Crown, consequently the Government referred the examination of those claims to the Commissioners, and passed a Minute, dated June 22, 1838, desiring the Commissioners to report on the subject, in order that the Report might be laid before the House of Commons. Under this reference the Commissioners did not conceive themselves to be at liberty to proceed to a judicial investigation of the matters, but made a rough estimate of the claims, which was of no use to any one. After this, Mr. Cresswell, in 1839, moved another Address to the Crown praying that the Commissioners might be directed to proceed to a judicial investigation, and after one division the Address was carried; and on the 5th of April a Minute was passed by the Government directing the Commissioners to make an adjudication on each individual claim, but giving notice to the parties that they would not be bound by this adjudication to bring forward any Motion in the House of Commons for a Vote of money. Step by step the Government had, on the part of the Crown, acceded to each thing done by the House of Commons, avowing at the same time that they would go no further if they could help it. On the occasion of the Address for the adjudication of the claims being carried, Mr. Spring Rice, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, stated that he objected to the House requiring a judicial inquiry into the claims unless the House came to some Vote involving the grant of money; and he advised the House not to put the claimants into a fool's paradise by making them suppose that they would be compensated, when all that they would get would be the right to enter into an expensive process, which would end in nothing to them. The language of the then Chancellor of the Exchequer was in strict conformity with that which the Government had used in various Minutes. The adjudication, however, took place, and on the 12th of May, 1840, the Commissioners presented their Report; but the Government took no steps in conse-
